Evidence in prosecution for the crime of possession of a still used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor held sufficient to sustain conviction.

3. Jury ⚷59(3)—Relation of landlord and tenant between coroner summoning jurors and prosecuting attorney did not require discharge of panel (Pen. Code, §§ 1064, 1074).

Relation of landlord and tenant existing between coroner summoning jurors to serve at trial and deputy district attorney prosecuting the case held not to require discharge of entire panel, under Pen. Code, § 1064, since section 1074, authorizing challenge of juror standing in relation of landlord and tenant with defendant, does not provide for such challenge based on relationship with attorney for party.

4. Indictment and information ⚷144—Motion to set aside information will not be granted on ground defendant had not been legally committed; remedy being by habeas corpus.

Motion to set aside information will not be granted on ground defendant had not been legally committed by magistrate because of lack of evidence on preliminary examination to warrant commitment; remedy available for such situation being writ of habeas corpus.

5. Criminal law ⚷475—Expert witness held properly permitted to state opinion to effect that apparatus introduced in evidence would produce intoxicating liquor.

In prosecution for possession of a still used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, witness qualifying as an expert was properly permitted to state his opinion to effect that apparatus introduced in evidence would produce intoxicating liquor.

6. Criminal law ⚷576(6)—Motion to strike testimony on ground information was filed 17 days after commitment held properly denied (Pen. Code, § 1382, and § 809, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1045).

Motion to strike testimony for lack of jurisdiction because of filing information 17 days after commitment held properly denied, since, though Pen. Code, § 809, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1045, provided information should be filed 15 days after commitment, Pen. Code, § 1382, providing for dismissal unless information was filed within 30 days, was not amended.

7. Criminal law ⚷576(5)—Motion to strike testimony on ground information was not seasonably filed must be made before trial.

Motion to strike testimony on ground information was filed 17 days after commitment must be made before trial, and motion made after large part of evidence had been received was not seasonable.

8. Criminal law ⚷824(13)—Failure to instruct defendant need not be witness in own behalf held not erroneous, in absence of request.

Failure of trial court to instruct jury that defendant need not be a witness in his own behalf and that his failure to be a witness should not be considered against him held not erroneous, in absence of request therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Tom Mitsunaga was convicted of possession of a still used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William R. McKay, of Hanford, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Clarence H. Wilson, Deputy Dist. Atty., for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Appellant was accused by information filed by the district attorney of Kings county of the crime of possession of a still used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor. Following his conviction by a jury he filed motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. He now appeals from the orders of the court denying these motions and from the judgment.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and that the corpus delicti was not proved. These contentions may be considered together. By the evidence presented by the prosecution it was established that defendant was arrested in the nighttime when he was the sole occupant of a house near the city of Hanford, in which there was, according to the testimony of the arresting officer:

> "One complete still; 39 quarts of 'jackass'; about 15 empty sacks—just a minute; about 15 sacks of empty bottles; two bottlers, or rather, cappers, two machines for putting caps on bottles; two funnels, one glass; that is, one glass funnel, I mean; one full barrel of Egyptian corn, rye, and sugar mash; two barrels partly filled; one barrel filled with water; one 10-gallon earthen jar; one 15-gallon earthen jar; one 1-gallon glass jug."

When the officers approached the house a light was burning, but the light was extinguished as soon as the officers drove up. The front door was locked. A new padlock, which was on the outside of the back door on the day before the visit of the officers, had been removed, but the door was locked from the inside. The defendant had been in the house on the occasion of a previous visit by the officers. Upon their arrival on the occasion of the arrest, the officers announced who they were and what their business was, and called out to anybody who might be in the house to open the door. There being no response to this request, the officers tried to open the back door with a pass-key, but failed, and finally "pinched it open with a jimmy." In the house they found the defendant standing in the dark facing away from the back door. George F. Bohlken, a chemist, testified that five bottles or jars of liquor which he took from the thirty-nine different containers indiscriminately were intoxicating liquor containing from 40 to 45 per cent. of alcohol by volume. He also testified that the still introduced in evidence contained all the essential elements of an apparatus for distilling intoxicating liquors. Counsel for appellant argues that the facts shown are consistent with the innocence of the accused. If this be conceded, it does not necessarily follow that the facts are insufficient to support the verdict. In People v. Martinez, 20 Cal. App. 343, 128 P. 952, the court said:

> "Where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by an appellate court any more than does a verdict based upon direct conflicting evidence. * * * It is only where the evidence obviously does not warrant the inference of guilt that the court will interfere."

In the case at bar there is abundant justification for the inference of guilt drawn by the jury.

[3] The sheriff being disqualified, the county coroner by order of the court summoned jurors to serve at the trial. Defendant presented a motion for the discharge of the entire panel upon the ground that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the coroner and Clarence H. Wilson, the deputy district attorney who prosecuted the case. The ruling of the court denying this motion was not erroneous. Section 1064 of the Penal Code provides that:

> "When the panel is formed from persons whose names are not drawn as jurors, a challenge may be taken to the panel on account of any bias of the officer who summons them, which would be good ground of challenge to a juror."

Section 1074 of the same Code provides that a juror may be challenged if he stands in the relation of landlord and tenant with the defendant or person alleged to be injured by the offense charged, or on whose complaint the prosecution was instituted. No provision is made for a challenge for implied bias based upon a relationship with an attorney for a party. See order denying a hearing by the Supreme Court in People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 788, 122 P. 450, 457.

[4] Appellant contends that the trial court should have granted his motion to set aside the information on the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate, asserting that there was no evidence adduced at the preliminary examination to warrant the commitment for trial in the superior court. It was held in People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 149 P. 821, that a writ of habeas corpus, if timely sought, is the only remedy available in such a situation, and that the reason stated by defendant is "not included in the grounds specified in the statute for the setting aside of an information."

[5] George F. Bohlken, after qualifying as an expert, was allowed over the objection of the defendant to state his opinion to the effect that the apparatus introduced in evidence (the still) would produce intoxicating liquor. The ruling was correct. In 10 California Jurisprudence, 959, we find this statement:

> "There are two classes of cases in which expert testimony is admissible. To one class belong those cases in which the conclusions to be drawn by the jury depend on the existence of facts which are not common knowledge and which are peculiarly within the knowledge of men whose experience and study enables them to speak with authority upon."

The court was justified in holding that our citizenship does not have common knowledge of the workings of a still for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

[6, 7] After a large part of the evidence had been received, defendant moved the court to strike out the testimony admitted on the ground that, as alleged, the court had no jurisdiction, it appearing from the clerk's filing marks that the information had been filed seventeen days after the commitment by the magistrate. The court properly denied the motion. The Legislature of 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1045) amended section 809 of the Penal Code by providing that it shall be the duty of the district attorney to file an information within fifteen days after the commitment instead of thirty days, the time fixed before the amendment. The Legislature did not, however, amend section 1382, which provides that the court must, "unless good cause to the contrary is shown," order the dismissal of a prosecution if an information is not filed within thirty days. Moreover, the motion was not seasonably or properly made. In cases where dismissals would be proper under this provision of the Code, motions for such action by the court should be made before trial. People v. Newell, 192 Cal. 659, 221 P. 622; People v. Hawkins, 127 Cal. 372, 59 P. 697; Ex parte Apakean, 63 Cal. App. 438, 218 P. 767.

[8] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant need not be a witness in his own behalf, and that his failure to be a witness should not be considered against him. The record discloses that no request was made for these instructions. It is well settled that defendant cannot complain before the reviewing court of the failure of the trial court to give the instructions referred to if no request was made at the trial. People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 P. 102; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 P. 143.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed. The appeal from the order denying a motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed.

Agreement between executors of will whereby plaintiff executor agreed that her share of $500 partial allowance for commissions was received in full compensation for work she had done, and would do in future, as one of executors, because she was moving to another city, held valid.

2. Executors and administrators ⚷501—Probate court decree awarding compensation to executors held not to apportion sum equally between them (Code Civ. Proc. § 1618).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Katie Kelly against James Conroy. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Jacoby, of San Francisco, for appellant.

James M. Hanley and Prosper Reiter, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment in an action to recover moneys had and received.

The following facts are not disputed: Pursuant to an order made by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff and defendant were appointed executors of the last will and testament of Dennis Kelly, deceased, and during the administration of the estate they applied for, and on October 4, 1921, were granted, a partial allowance of commissions in the sum of $500, which was divided equally between them. On February 8, 1923, a decree settling the final account and granting final distribution of the estate was entered, wherein it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed, among other things, "that the sum of $2,000 be and the same is hereby fixed and allowed as compensation to said executors for their services in said estate and that the unpaid balance thereof, to wit, the sum of $1,500 is hereby ordered to be paid to said executors." The entire latter sum was subsequently paid to defendant by check drawn upon the funds of said estate and signed jointly by plaintiff and defendant as such executors, not without question by plaintiff, however; and, some time after the check had been cashed, she instituted the present action, claiming to be entitled to one-half of the money so received by defendant.

In his answer to the complaint, defendant alleged, in substance, that at the time the partial allowance of $500 was divided plaintiff declared her intentions to move to Los Angeles, and that she then and there agreed that the sum of $250 received by her "was in full compensation for the work she had done and would do in the future as one of the executors of the estate"; that she did in fact move to, and thereafter continued to reside in, Los Angeles, and consequently performed no further services in the settlement of said estate except the perfunctory signing of papers prepared and sent to her by defendant; "that by agreement between the plaintiff and defendant this formal duty of signing papers already prepared was to be considered as having been compensated for by the sum of $250 heretofore recited as having been received by the said plaintiff; that by said agreement between the plaintiff and defendant the compensation of $1,500 awarded by the above-entitled court as executor's fees on the 8th day of February, 1926, belonged to the defendant as compensation for his services furnished from and after the time the said plaintiff left the city and county of San Francisco." Plaintiff in her testimony denied the truth of the foregoing allegations; but, in view of the judgment in defendant's favor, it must be assumed on appeal that the issues raised by said allegations were resolved by the trial court in defendant's favor; and there appears to be ample testimony to support its conclusions thereon.

[1] Plaintiff contends, however, that, even if said agreement was made as alleged, it was invalid. The question as to the validity of such an agreement does not appear to have been expressly ruled upon by the reviewing courts of this state, so far as our attention has been called; but it is held generally in other jurisdictions that several representatives of an estate may legally contract between themselves as to the apportionment of the commissions to be thereafter allowed by the court, provided such contracts do not contravene the statute, and their purpose is not to relieve any one of them from the responsibility of his trust (Guthrie v. Crews, 286 Mo. 438, 229 S. W. 182; John v. John, 122 Pa. 107, 15 A. 675; Bassett v. Miller, 8 Md. 548; Brown v. Stewart, 4 Md. Ch. 368; In re Aston, 5 Whart. [Pa.] 228; 24 Cor. Jur. 993); and although, as stated, no case has arisen in this state wherein the question of the validity of such agreements has been directly ruled upon, the right to enforce the same in separate actions was apparently recognized by the Supreme Court in the Estate of Carter, 132 Cal. 113, 64 P. 123, 484. There, at the time of the settlement of the final account, a joint executor claimed the entire amount of the commissions pursuant to a contract claimed to have been made with his coexecutor, but the court apportioned the commissions equally between them. He appealed from the order of settlement, and, in disposing of the question of the asserted contract, the court said:

> "The appellant's first claim is to the effect that he had a contract with his coexecutor and the devisees, whereby he was to receive all the commissions allowed to the executors. There is some evidence upon both sides of this claim, but the court holds the matter to be one of no importance. What particular contracts may have been entered into between these parties as to the apportionment of the executors' commissions is a matter which should be heard in another forum. The hearing of a final account by the probate department of the court is not the place to settle disputes of this character. These parties are not entitled to litigate a question of that kind upon the hearing of the settlement of a final account. The existence of that character of contract, and its validity after being made, are matters of no interest to the estate, and must be heard and determined at some other time and in some other proceeding."

We find nothing in the case of Firebaugh v. Burbank, 121 Cal. 186, 53 P. 560, cited and relied upon by plaintiff, which sustains her contention that the agreement under consideration was illegal. The facts of that case show that, at the time of the settlement of the final account and the rendition of the decree of final distribution, the probate court fixed the amount of commissions the surviving executor and his attorney should receive for their services. The surviving widow, being dissatisfied with the distributive share of the estate awarded her, sought and obtained a reversal of the decree, and, under the judgment of reversal, became entitled to the entire estate. Thereafter said attorney procured from her on behalf of himself and the surviving executor, under circumstances indicating duress, a contract calling for the payment to them of an additional sum of money greatly in excess of the amount already allowed by the court, and much larger than the maximum fees fixed by the statute. The contract therefore violated the provisions of section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, besides fixing the amount of maximum fees, provides that all contracts between an executor or administrator and an heir, devisee, or legatee, for a higher compensation than that allowed by this section, shall be void; and, in holding said contract to be unenforceable and void, the Supreme Court said:

> "The provision in section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure, making void all contracts for higher compensation between an heir and an executor, is not limited to contracts made directly between the executor and the heir, but includes all contracts or agreements by which the executor will receiver either directly or indirectly any greater compensation than has been fixed by the statute, or any compensation other than such as may have been previously ascertained and determined by the court, and applies to every contract which has for one of its objects the payment of such greater compensation, as well as to those which are made solely for such payment."

It will be observed, therefore, that the point of that decision was that the contract violated said Code section because it was procured from the sole beneficiary of the estate by an attorney for the estate, obligating her to pay to him and the executor additional fees much larger in amount than those already fixed by the court, and also in excess of the maximum amount fixed by statute. We have no such contract in the present case; the agreement here being one made between the coexecutors themselves with reference to the apportionment of the remainder of the fees which might be afterwards allowed by the court within the limitations of the statutory provisions. True, the record discloses that plaintiff was also an heir at law of the deceased and a legatee under his will, but this fact becomes unimportant, because the contract in question purported to call for the payment only of such fees as might be thereafter legally allowed by the court.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the contentions made by plaintiff against the validity of said agreement are without merit.

[2-5] Section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure also provides that, if there are two or more executors, "the compensation shall be apportioned among them by the (probate) court according to the services actually rendered by them respectively"; and plaintiff claims that, in awarding the sum of $1,500 "to the executors," the probate court in the present case did in fact apportion said sum equally between the coexecutors pursuant to the power granted under said section, and that therefore the judgment entered in the present action denying plaintiff one-half of said commissions is in conflict with the operation of the decree in probate, and in effect constitutes a collateral attack upon the integrity thereof. In our opinion, the construction of the decree plaintiff contends for cannot be sustained, for it may be fairly assumed that, if the probate court had intended, as plaintiff claims, to apportion the fees equally between the coexecutors, an express declaration to that effect would have been inserted in the decree. It has been repeatedly held that there is no rule of law or equity declaring that executors, without regard to the time spent, responsibility assumed, or services rendered, are entitled to an equal share of the statutory fees (Speirs v. Wisner, 88 Mich. 614, 50 N. W. 654, 26 Am. St. Rep. 306; Chase v. Lathrop, 74 Colo. 559, 223 P. 54; Hayward v. Plant, 98 Conn. 374, 119 A. 341; Wickersham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 67; Groover v. Ash, 132 Ga. 371, 64 S. E. 323, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1119, 131 Am. St. Rep. 201; Estate of Carter, supra); also that when, as here, a stated sum is allowed to the representatives without assuming to pass upon the apportionment, the question of such apportionment is left open to future determination (Slingerland v. Norton, 136 Minn. 204, 161 N. W. 497; 12 Cal. Jur. 271). Therefore, the present action having been instituted by plaintiff for the purpose of recovering a portion of said fees, and the trial court having decided upon evidence legally sufficient for that purpose that she was not entitled to any part thereof, she is concluded by such decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action by P. L. Burr against the Peppers Cotton Lumber Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: RICHARDS and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Tebbe & Tebbe and B. K. Collier, all of Yreka, H. S. Young and Frank Thunen, both of San Francisco, and W. S. Dwinell, for respondents.

BARTLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Siskiyou county, California, sustaining demurrers of various defendants to plaintiff's complaint, without leave to amend, and from the judgments entered in favor of defendants. The action was brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien on a certain railroad and its right of way and improvements thereon in Siskiyou county, California; the facts upon which the action is based set forth in the complaint being substantially the following:

Defendant Peppers Cotton Lumber Company, constructed a railroad, commonly known as the "Peppers Cotton Lumber Company Railroad," about seven miles in length, leading from Macdoel to the mill of the lumber company, in Siskiyou county. Plaintiff was the contractor who built the railroad. His employment had its inception on October 5, 1920, in a letter specifying his duties and compensation for the grading of the roadbed, which letter was addressed to the railroad company, and the terms of which were accepted by the company. Thereafter plaintiff was employed by the company to haul, place, and lay the ties and rails, and build the bridges and culverts, and surface and ballast the railroad, and to act as purchasing agent in San Francisco of the lumber company in construction of the railroad. The lumber company was to pay all costs and expenses of construction, including all materials and labor. Plaintiff was to receive for his services a flat sum fee, a certain percentage amount based on the estimated cost of the work, a division of any savings under the estimated cost prices, and also repayment of any sum of money paid, laid out, or expended in the construction of the railroad. Plaintiff expended various sums of money in connection with the construction of the road, and it is for the balance due on the money so expended that he claims the mechanic's lien on the railroad properties sought to be enforced in this action.

The moneys claimed to have been expended, on which the right to a lien in plaintiff's favor is based, are alleged to have been for amounts and purposes as follows: $7,958.25 for wages of various workmen employed on the railroad work; $1,918.50 for necessary supplies furnished the workmen; $3,072.62 for steel rails furnished the railroad; $182.27 for freight or materials and equipment; $31.50 for telegrams in connection with carrying supplies, materials, and labor; $370 for railroad fares for various workmen to and from the railroad right of way; $374.93 for workmen's compensation insurance on said railroad work; and $278.86 for railroad charges for transportation of plaintiff incurred in connection with his work. In the lien filed and in the complaint it is stated:

> "That said respective sums of money and each of them were paid, laid out, and expended by this plaintiff to and for said defendant Peppers Cotton Lumber Company on said railroad, and on said rights of way, between the 5th day of October, 1920, and the 25th day of August, 1921," and "that no part or portion of any of said expenses or pay rolls or wages was or were to be paid by this plaintiff and that each and all thereof was and were to be paid by said defendant Peppers Cotton Lumber Company."

On May 20, 1921, plaintiff ceased work and notified the lumber company that he did so because of its "failure, refusal, and neglect to pay the various demands and charges, bills, and expenses for wages and labor and materials done or furnished to and for said railroad work and in connection with said work and the performance thereof."

But one question for solution is presented by this appeal. Does the California mechanic's lien law give a lien to secure repayment of moneys voluntarily advanced by a contractor in payment of claims against an owner which the contractor is not obligated to pay by his agreement? Appellant has submitted an exhaustive and elaborate brief, in which the law and decisions, both of California and of many other states, are discussed and reviewed, in an endeavor to support his claim that the law, as it now stands, permits a mechanic's lien in favor of plaintiff securing the payment of the moneys claimed to have been advanced by him for work and materials used in the construction of the railroad.

Much attention is given to an examination of cases involving the distinction between liens that are direct and liens by subrogation. Such cases are not material in point concerning this case, for, if appellant has a lien, it is necessarily a direct one arising by virtue of the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, as it now stands, was enacted in 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 1313. That act, which amended section 1183 and a number of the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure previously enacted by the California Legislature, concluded with the following declaration of legislative intent:

> "The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed with a view to effect its purpose. They are not intended as a re-enactment of the provisions of former statutes, with the policy heretofore impressed upon the same by the courts of this state, but are intended to reverse that policy to the extent of making the liens provided for direct and independent of any account of indebtedness between the owner and contractor, thereby making the policy of this state conform to that of Nevada and the other Pacific Coast states." Section 14.

[1] The right of a mechanic's lien is created by organic law, and must be considered as a part of the fundamental law of California, by reason of section 15 of article 20 of the state Constitution, which reads:

> "Mechanics, materialmen, artisans, and laborers of every class shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material for the value of such labor done and material furnished; and the Legislature shall provide by law for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens."

[2] This provision of the Constitution gives a lien upon properties to four classes of persons contributing material or labor upon real property, and in pursuance of the direction to the Legislature to enact laws for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens, section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure and subsequent sections of that Code have been enacted. The constitutional provision did not enlarge the classes of persons entitled to a claim of lien additional to those who before its enactment in 1879 had been allowed liens through various legislative acts passed before the adoption of the present Constitution. By the terms of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure a lien is given on property because the person claiming the lien has bestowed labor, or furnished materials or appliances, teams, or power, upon property sought to be charged. Appellant seeks a direct lien in this case, not because of personal labor, nor because of any personal furnishing of materials used in the construction work, but because he advanced his own money in paying for a portion of the labor and materials bestowed and furnished by persons other than himself.

[3] The right to a lien is a personal one. That the right to claim it cannot be assigned is clearly announced in Mills v. La Verne Land Co., 97 Cal. 254, 32 P. 169, 33 Am. St. Rep, 168. The facts in this case are in some respects similar to those in a Cadenasso v. Antonelle, 127 Cal. 382, 59 P. 765, where moneys were advanced to pay for labor and material used in the construction of a tunnel and suit was instituted against the bondsmen of the contractor to compel payment of the money advanced. The court gave a judgment for plaintiff, which was reversed on appeal. In the opinion (page 386 [59 P. 766]) the court says:

> "Money is not labor, and it is not material 'furnished' in the sense of the undertaking and the complaint."

[4] Appellant strenuously insists throughout his argument that the expression of legislative intent announced in the last section of the act of the California Legislature in

1911, hereinbefore set forth, has made inapplicable certain doctrines declaring who are entitled to mechanics' liens, under the former decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. The declaration of intent set forth in the statute does not support this contention. The policy intended to be reversed by the statute was to make any liens allowed by its provisions independent of the account of indebtedness between the owner and contractor and the direction that the provisions of the act should be liberally construed was intended to require that such species of construction should be given the remedial portions of the act to claimants coming within the classes entitled to the benefit of its provisions. The rule of construction as to whether it should be liberal or strict, applicable to mechanic's lien laws, is clearly stated in Corpus Juris, at page 53, § 14, vol. 40:

> "It is held in a number of cases that provisions relating to the creation, existence, or right to the lien, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed, while provisions relating to the enforcement of the lien after it has once attached, being remedial in character, should be liberally construed."

The placing of appellant, by reason of his alleged acts, within the classes afforded a lien under the California statute, would give any one advancing moneys, which paid for supplies or material, in effect, a mortgage or trust deed upon property. That such is not the rule is announced both in text books on the subject of mechanics' liens, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, § 114, says:

> "A statute giving liens to those furnishing work or material does not extend to those furnishing money with which the work and materials are paid for. * * * And a contractor who makes, in the name and on the credit of the owner of the building, a contract with a third person to do certain work on the building, and pays him therefor, has no lien for such work, since the work was furnished by the owner, through the contractor as his agent, and the contractor merely furnishes the money with which to pay for the work."

In James on the Law of Mechanics' Liens upon Real Property in California, § 68, the California rule is given as follows:

> "One who advances money to the contractor, although for the payment of materials and labor devoted to the erection of a building, is not entitled to a mechanic's lien."

The leading case upon this question is that of Godeffroy v. Caldwell, 2 Cal. 489, 56 Am. Dec. 360, which states:

> "The mechanic's lien law provides exclusively for the security of materialmen and laborers; and one who advances money as a loan, although it is expressly for the payment of materials and labor devoted to the erection of a building, can have no claim to the benefit of the law."

The case of Sweet v. Fresno Hotel Co., 174 Cal. 789, 164 P. 788, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 346, was to enforce a claim of lien made up of moneys paid out for labor by a contractor acting under two separate contracts. Sweet, the lien claimant, acted as superintendent of construction of a hotel building for the Fresno Hotel Company; the contractor being Farley & Co., a corporation. Sweet had three different contracts for work on the building. One of these was made on April 1, 1911, and on this the trial court allowed a lien for $628.30. This contract of April 1, 1911, after reciting a contract of February 1, 1911, which Sweet had partly performed, and by which he had earned $358.58 more than had been paid to him, and declaring that the same was canceled, saving the debt for $358.58 and a lien to Sweet on the building therefor, proceeded:

> "In consideration of the above release and cancellation, and of the further payments and considerations hereinafter mentioned, Isaac Sweet hereby assumes and agrees to pay all of the wages due to carpenters and common laborers employed in the erection of the Fresno Hotel, until the same is completed, which said amount shall be returned to Isaac Sweet in the manner as follows: Seventy-five per cent. * * * of the payrolls each month, together with 10 per cent. commission on each weekly payroll, payable on the following month, between the 1st and 5th of the month and the balance, 25 per cent., 35 days after the acceptance and completion of the building, weekly payrolls to be made out by Farley & Co. and signed by them and delivered to said Isaac Sweet each week; Farley & Co. to have the right to hire and discharge any and all men, but their names shall be placed on the pay rolls when employed. Sweet to act in the capacity of superintendent, and to see that the work progresses."

Speaking of this contract, the court says on page 795 of the opinion (164 P. 790):

> "This, on its face, is not a contract by Sweet to perform labor on the building or to have labor performed thereon by others in his employment. It is, on his part, an agreement to assume and pay all wages due to certain classes of laborers employed on the building, and on the part of Farley & Co. an agreement to return to him the money advanced for that purpose. The laborers to be paid thereunder were to be hired and discharged by Farley & Co., who was to make out weekly payrolls for Sweet's information as to the amount to be paid to the men. So far as the work is concerned, Sweet's only function was to act as superintendent and to pay the wages due from the contractor to the men. He was not the employer. In effect he was loaning money to the contractor and performing service as superintendent of the work, for which service he was to receive an amount equal to ten per cent. of the wages earned by the men. The law does not allow a lien for money loaned to a building contractor to enable him to carry out his contract. Godeffroy v. Caldwell, 2 Cal. 489, 56 Am. Dec. 360. The lien claim states, with respect to this contract, that > it is for 'carpenter labor and common labor' performed under it. This must be understood to refer to the labor performed by the men employed by Farley & Co., and whose wages Sweet paid. It does not cover compensation for his own services as superintendent. It follows, therefore, that the claim did not embrace anything for which he was entitled to a lien and none should have been allowed thereunder."

The contract of June 1, 1911, between Sweet and Farley & Co., which the court upheld as affording Sweet a lien for money paid out for labor of carpenters and common laborers, was different from that of April 1, 1911, above referred to. The court says (page 796 of the opinion [164 P. 791]):

> "The defendant claims that the same rule should apply to the contract made on June 1, 1911. By the contract of June 1st, Sweet expressly 'agrees to furnish all common labor and carpenter labor necessary to the construction and completion of said building and to pay all wages that may become due to the carpenters and common laborers * * * paying such laborers weekly or at such other times as their wages may become due.' Farley & Co. agreed 'for such labor furnished in the erection of such building' to pay to Sweet, between the first and fifth day of each month, the amount of the wages Sweet had paid to such laborers during the preceding month. The contract further declares that Farley & Co. shall make out weekly payrolls and deliver the same to Sweet at the end of each week, and that it was 'understood that all men employed, upon, in, and about said building shall be satisfactory to said' Farley & Co. 'and that they shall have the right at * * * all times to discharge any one not satisfactory to them and to replace the same by persons selected by themselves.' We cannot agree to the proposition that this contract was a mere reiteration or renewal of the previous contract of April 1, 1911. Its language was different from the previous contract in a very important particular, and was presumably made so with the purpose of changing its effect.
> "It may be true, as contended by the defendant, that the actual mode of carrying on the work and paying the men after June 1st did not differ materially in appearance from that practiced before June 1st. But this similarity was not fatal to the validity, or destructive of the effect, of the new contract. The old contract was, in effect, an agreement by Sweet to advance money to pay the debts owing by Farley & Co.; the new one was an agreement by him to bestow labor upon the building, hiring the men himself and paying their wages. It was a lawful contract, for a lawful purpose. He had the lawful right to make it, notwithstanding the effect was to give him a right to the lien under the mechanic's lien law which he did not have under the contract of April 1st. * * * The provision that Farley & Co. should have the right to discharge men that were not satisfactory to it and to replace them by other persons selected by itself did not make it the employer of the new men thus selected; it merely empowered it to make the selection of the men to be employed by Sweet. We think the plaintiff, Sweet, was entitled to a lien for the value of the labor furnished under this contract."

The facts in the case at bar put appellant in the same position as was Sweet in the case above discussed, under the contract of April 1, 1911. In fact, Sweet was in a more favorable position for urging the privilege of a lien claimant than is appellant, for Sweet in the contract of April 1, 1911, assumed and agreed to pay all wages due carpenters and common laborers employed on the building, while here appellant does not claim that he ever agreed to pay the costs of labor and material, but on the contrary avers:

> "That no part or portion of any of said expenses or pay rolls or wages was or were to be paid by this claimant, but that any and all thereof was and were to be paid by said Peppers Cotton Lumber Company."

[5] The payments for which foreclosure of a mechanic's lien is sought in this action cannot be regarded as other than advancements of money voluntarily made by appellant to the Peppers Cotton Lumber Company to pay debts owing from said company to persons other than appellant under the allegations set forth in the complaint. In view of the decisions in Godeffroy v. Caldwell, 2 Cal. 489, 56 Am. Dec. 360; Cadenasso v. Antonelle, 127 Cal. 382, 59 P. 765; and Sweet v. Fresno Hotel Co., 174 Cal. 789, 164 P. 788, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 346; the action of the trial court on the demurrers to the complaint in this action was the proper adjudication of the questions presented.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

WILLMON v. POWELL et al. (Civ. 5606.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 11, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑57—Municipal corporation can exercise only powers expressly granted, necessarily or fairly implied therefrom, or essential to declared objects of corporation.

Municipal corporation can exercise only those powers granted in express words, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to powers expressly granted, and those essential, not simply convenient, to declared objects and purposes of corporation.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑58—Any fair reasonable doubt of municipal power is resolved against corporation.

Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning existence of power in municipal corporation is resolved against it, and the power denied.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑59—Municipality may do subsidiary acts incidental and necessary to exercise of express power.

Express power conferred on municipal corporation to accomplish some result carries with it authority to do such subsidiary acts as are necessary and incidental to exercise of such power.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑176(1)—Charter provisions for housing commission to eliminate overcrowded tenements, etc., held to relate to "municipal public purpose" (Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253; Const. art. 11, § 8).

Provisions of Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253, for municipal housing commission to eliminate overcrowded tenements, unhealthy slums, etc., thereby tending to preserve health of all of city's inhabitants, held to relate to a municipal public purpose within Const. art. 11, § 8.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Purposes.]

5. Municipal corporations 🔑176(1)—Charter provision for appointment of directors of municipal housing commission from largest bondholders held not objectionable as establishing private control of public property (Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253).

Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253, held not subject to objection as establishing private control of public property by providing that twelve of fifteen directors of municipal housing commission established thereby shall be appointed from twenty-four largest registered holders of commission's bonds; no bonds having been issued nor any contention made that holding thereof would disqualify citizen from being member of commission, while mayor may disregard such direction in making appointments, without affecting commission's existence and powers, if such limitation be invalid.

6. Statutes 🔑64(4)—Charter provision for appointment of directors from largest bondholders held not to invalidate entire article establishing municipal housing commission, even if invalid as imposing property qualification to hold office (Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, § 430; Const. art. 1, § 24).

Provision of Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, that twelve of fifteen directors of municipal housing commission established thereby shall be appointed from twenty-four largest registered holders of commission's bonds, being easily severable from remaining clauses, does not invalidate whole article, even if invalid as in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 24, prohibiting property qualification to hold office, especially in view of section 430.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑176(1)—Article of charter establishing municipal housing commission held not invalid as giving city no control over commission's business (Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253).

Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253, establishing municipal housing commission, held not invalid as giving city no control over conduct of commission's business, in view of provisions for appointment of directors by mayor, removal thereof for cause and approval of sales of property acquired by commission by council.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑58—Elimination of overcrowded tenements, etc., by municipal housing commission, held not purely "commercial or industrial enterprise" (Los Angeles Charter, § 2, subd. 7, and § 3, subds. 2, 15; art. 25, §§ 250–253).

Elimination of overcrowded tenements, unhealthy slums, etc., for which municipal housing commission was established by Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253, is a public and charitable purpose, not a purely commercial or industrial enterprise within Charter, § 2, subdivision 7 thereof, section 3, and subdivisions 2, 15, thereof, limiting city's power to engage in such enterprises.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑58—General charter provision, prohibiting city from mortgaging its property, is controlled by particular provisions authorizing municipal housing commission to issue bonds constituting lien on commission's property (Los Angeles Charter, § 3, subd. 2; art. 25, §§ 250–253).

General provision in Los Angeles Charter, § 3, subd. 2, that city shall have no power to mortgage its property for any purpose, is controlled by particular provisions specially authorizing municipal housing commission, created by article 25, §§ 250–253, to issue bonds constituting lien on property of such commission alone.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑192—Members of Los Angeles housing commission are city officers (Los Angeles Charter, §§ 5, 63; art. 25, §§ 250–253).

Members of municipal housing commission, created by Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, §§ 250–253, are officers of city, though not listed as such in section 5, in view of sections providing for commission and appointment of its members, section 251 (a), (b), stating their duties and functions, and section 63 authorizing them to compel attendance of witnesses and administer oaths.

11. Officers 🔑1—Persons having duties and functions of public officers are such officers, though not directly so designated.

That persons' duties and functions are those of public officers is sufficient to establish their legal status, though not designated in direct terms as officers.

12. Municipal corporations 🔑918(1), 931—Los Angeles housing commission bonds may be issued without submission to voters and secured by specified property alone, though contrary to general procedure (Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, § 251 (a), (b); art. 1, § 3, subd. (4).

Under Los Angeles Charter, art. 25, § 251 (a), (b), bonds may be issued by municipal housing commission and city council, without submission to electors for approval, and secured by specified property alone, though contrary to procedure prescribed for creation of bonded indebtedness generally by article 1, § 3, subd. 4.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and C. B. Penn, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ, for City of Los Angeles.

CONREY, P. J. This cause is presented on general demurrer to the petition. The facts are admitted to be those stated in the petition.

Article 25 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles (including sections 250, 251, 252, and 253 of the charter), by its terms established a municipal housing commission, consisting of fifteen directors to be appointed by the mayor, subject to confirmation by the city council. It was provided (section 251) that the said board shall have the right and power:

"(a) To incur indebtedness by the issuance of bonds in the name of the city of Los Angeles, under such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the council by ordinance, for any of the purposes for which the board is authorized to provide, or, for carrying out any of the powers possessed by said board; provided that such bonds shall be a lien upon the property of the municipal housing commission alone and the city shall not be liable on account thereof.

"(b) To provide by purchase, lease, condemnation, construction or otherwise, and to improve, rent, manage, sell and repurchase lands, dwellings, apartment houses, lodging houses or tenement houses, for the purpose of improving the health, safety and welfare of the inhabitants of said city, by providing homes for those who might otherwise live in overcrowded tenements, unhealthy slums, or the most congested areas, provided that none of said property or improvement shall be sold except by a majority vote of the members of said board, approved by resolution adopted by a majority vote of the council; and provided further that whenever any of such property shall have been transferred into private ownership the same shall immediately become subject to taxation."

The municipal housing commission had been duly appointed and organized prior to the adoption of an ordinance of November 17, 1925, providing for the issuance of $1,000,000 of bonds of the said commission. It is a conceded fact that said ordinance and the various proceedings thereunder, down to and including the point where the treasurer refused to sign, and the clerk refused to affix the city's seal to bond No. 901, series No. 2, were duly and regularly conducted in accordance with the formalities prescribed by article 25 of the charter and the said ordinance. The questions raised by the refusal of the respondents and argued in support thereof challenge the authority of the municipal housing commission and of the city of Los Angeles to issue such bonds. In other words, it is admitted that, if such authority exists, the proceedings adopted in exercising that authority are in due form when tested by the procedure outlined in article 25 of the charter and by said ordinance.

The first proposition stated by respondents is that the purpose for which the municipal housing commission was established is not a municipal affair. Counsel refer us to section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, providing for charters of cities, and particularly to the following sentence contained therein:

"It shall be competent in any charter framed under the authority of this section to provide that the municipality governed thereunder may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to general laws."

[1-3] The controlling principles which determine the extent of the powers of a municipal corporation have been stated as follows:

" 'A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: 1. Those granted in express words; 2. Those necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to the powers expressly granted; and, 3. Those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied.' 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 89. This is the approved rule in this state. (Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 157 [38 P. 682]; Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585 [84 P. 41]; Oro Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 477 [147 P. 118].) 'If an express power to accomplish some result has been conferred, it will carry with it the authority to do such subsidiary acts as are incidental and necessary to the exercise of that power.' Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 157 [38 P. 682]." City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 175 Cal. 575, 166 P. 333.

If the subject-matter of the charter provisions relating to the municipal housing commission is within the description of a municipal affair, it will follow that the powers sought to be exercised by the commission are authorized by the Constitution, and are granted in express words by the charter. It is argued by respondents that the business of providing homes for private individuals, even if they be "those who might otherwise live in overcrowded tenements, unhealthy slums, or the most congested areas," constitutes a commercial enterprise unaffected by any public use, and therefore cannot be a municipal affair. It is further argued that the stated purpose is not a governmental purpose because it is limited to a certain restricted class, and does not include those other citizens of Los Angeles who might not otherwise live in overcrowded tenements, etc. On the other hand, it is admitted by counsel for respondents that proprietary purposes of a municipality, such as furnishing public utilities, are within the police powers, and therefore are municipal affairs, and affect all the people generally.

[4] Primarily, it is necessary to determine whether the objects and purposes of the housing commission are within the description of a public purpose. If the public nature of the enterprise is recognized, there remains little difficulty in accepting it as a municipal public purpose. In Veterans' Welfare Board v. Jordan, 189 Cal. 124, 208 P. 284, 22 A. L. R. 1515, the Supreme Court had before it for consideration the statute enacted for the purpose of creating a fund to carry on the operations of the veterans' welfare board which had been created to carry out the provisions of the Veterans' Welfare Act (St. 1921, p. 969). For the determination of the questions arising in that case, the court found it necessary to consider at length the field of judicial decision wherein it has been attempted to determine what is a public purpose. We refer to that case, beginning at page 141 (208 P. 284) thereof, without making extensive quotations here. Grounding its decision upon the liberal views of the courts to which it referred, our Supreme Court took into consideration the legislative assumption that the legislation in question tended to make "for better citizenship, better notions of necessity for law and order, and a sounder and saner patriotism," and concluded that the provisions of the statute authorizing a bond issue for the purpose of acquiring, subdividing, improving, acquiring water rights for, and selling the land so improved at cost, were valid as authorizing the expenditure of public money for a public purpose. If those observations were justified in that case, with equal reason it may be said that an enterprise of the kind contemplated by the charter provisions concerning the municipal housing commission, which has for its purpose the elimination of overcrowded tenements, unhealthy slums, and congested areas, thereby tending to ward off epidemics of disease and preserve the health of all of the inhabitants of a city, is a public purpose.

The fact that in the course of administration of the affairs of the commission private persons will receive benefit, as tenants or otherwise, of houses constructed by the commission, is not sufficient to take away from the enterprise the characteristics of a public purpose. In a somewhat analogous case in Massachusetts dealing with the question whether or not a corporation organized to provide a home for working girls was a charitable institution, the court said:

> "Though not paupers, they are so poor as to make it a work of charity to provide for them a home. The individuals of the class change from day to day. They are sufficiently numerous, and so a part of the public, and so connected with it and with the public welfare, as to give to the work of providing a home for any individuals comprised in the class that quality of indefiniteness in the persons helped, which, with the charitable purpose aimed at, makes a public charity in the legal sense." Franklin Square House v. City of Boston, 188 Mass. 409, 74 N. E. 675.

See, also, Thornton v. Franklin Square House, 200 Mass. 465, 86 N. E. 909, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 486; Collier v. Lindley (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 526.

We conclude that the provisions of the charter for a municipal housing commission relate to a public purpose. And, since the conditions sought to be remedied are those peculiar to a large city, we think that the business of providing such remedy in accordance with the plan stated in the charter is a municipal affair.

[5] The second proposition relied upon by respondents is that the public use of public property cannot coexist with private management and control of such property; and that the charter has attempted to establish such private control by providing that, of the fifteen directors of the commission, twelve shall be appointed from among the twenty-four largest registered holders of bonds of the commission. Manifestly, it cannot be contended that the present commission contains any holders of bonds, since no bonds have yet been issued. Moreover, it is not contended that the fact of holding such bonds would disqualify a citizen from being a member of the commission, and it might well be considered that, if the stated limitation upon the qualification of a part of the members of the commission is invalid, the mayor might disregard said direction in making his appointments, and that the existence and powers of the commission would not be affected thereby. We think that this objection is without merit.

Respondents have referred to the case of Egan v. San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 583, 133 P. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754, where it was held that the public use of public property cannot, under any provisions of the charter of the city of San Francisco or of any statute to which the court's attention was directed, coexist with private management and control of such property. We may assume that the same statement would be true in reference to the charter of the city of Los Angeles. But the facts of that case exhibited a distinct attempt to authorize private management and control of public property of the city, not at all parallel to the provisions now under consideration of the charter of the city of Los Angeles.

[6] It is suggested by respondents that the provision that twelve of the directors (after the commission first appointed) shall be appointed from a list of those who are registered holders of bonds of the commission is in conflict with section 24 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that no property qualification shall ever be required of any person to vote or hold office. From this it is argued that, because the charter provides that twelve of the directors shall be appointed from among the twenty-four largest registered holders of bonds of the commission, it results that the whole article is void because there cannot be a legal board of directors. Assuming for the present purpose that section 24 of article 1 of the Constitution is not limited to the offices created by the Constitution, and that it applies to limitations upon the qualification of municipal officers, this does not necessarily interfere with the existence of the commission. The charter in plain terms establishes the commission, declares the number of its directors, and provides for their appointment by the mayor, subject to the confirmation of the city council. The additional clause concerning ownership of bonds, if invalid, is easily severable therefrom, and may be eliminated without destroying the commission. It cannot, in our opinion, reasonably be claimed that this particular detail bears such a relation of importance to the entire plan that without this particular qualifying clause the article 25 of the charter, covering the subject of a municipal housing commission, would not have been adopted. Moreover, the charter itself (section 430) contains a very specific declaration of its policy and intention in relation to any such matter.

[7] The suggestion of respondents that the city is not given any control over the conduct of the business of the commission is not quite correct. In addition to the power of appointment of the directors, and the power to remove them "for cause," it is provided that none of the property acquired shall be sold by the commission, except when "approved by resolution adopted by a majority vote of the council."

[8, 9] Respondents contend that the commission is not authorized to engage in the business for which it was established. The argument is rested upon certain provisions of the charter which limit the power of the city to engage in any purely commercial or industrial enterprise. Charter, § 2; subdivision 7 of section 2; section 3; subdivision 2 of section 3; subdivision 15 of section 3. This point is answered when we have held that the enterprise is for a public and charitable purpose, and is not a "purely commercial or industrial enterprise." And the general provision in the charter (subdivision 2 of section 3) that "the city shall have no power to mortgage its property for any purpose" is controlled by the particular provisions relating to the municipal housing commission, which specially authorize the issuance of bonds which shall be "a lien upon the property of the municipal housing commission alone."

[10, 11] Incidental to their claim that the municipal housing commission is a privately controlled body, respondents contend that the members thereof are not officers of the city. They point to section 5 of the charter, which lists the officers of the city, and does not include the members of the municipal housing commission in the stated list. Nevertheless, the charter in another section does in terms provide for the commission and for the appointment of its members. The question of their legal status, as officers or not, should be tested by their duties and functions, rather than by their designation in direct terms as officers. If their duties and functions are those of public officers, that fact is sufficient to establish their legal status as such officers. Spreckels v. Graham, 194 Cal. 516, 530, 228 P. 1040; Logan v. Shields, 190 Cal. 661, 214 P. 45.

In addition to the powers and duties of the housing commission, to which we have referred, we find it provided in the charter (section 63) that "each board provided for in this charter" shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses in proceedings and investigations before it, and in connection with those matters each member of any such board shall have power to administer oaths. Unquestionably, this is an official power.

[12] Counsel for respondents has suggested that the bonds in question as proposed to be issued are not serial bonds, and that the proposition of issuing said bonds was not submitted to the voters of the city. It is contended that for this reason the bonds are not in conformity to the requirements of the statutes which provide for the method of creation of bonded indebtedness of municipalities; and it is further contended that, under the provisions of the charter, no bonded indebtedness can be created except by the procedure directed by those statutes. In article 1 of the charter it is provided:

> "Sec. 3. The rights and powers granted by this charter shall be subject to the restrictions set forth in this section, or elsewhere in this charter. * * * (4) The general laws of the state of California establishing the procedure for the creation of bonded indebtedness in force at the time any bonded indebtedness is created by the city shall, so far as applicable, be observed and followed."

If there were no other provisions covering the subject, the general rule stated in said subdivision 4 of section 3 presumably would furnish the controlling rule for the procedure in the creation of such bonded indebtedness. But in section 251 there are the particular provisions hereinbefore set forth, which declares that "the board shall have the right and power" to incur indebtedness by the issuance of bonds in the manner therein stated. The terms and conditions thereof are to be prescribed by the council by ordinance, and the bonds are made a lien "upon the property of the municipal housing commission alone and the city shall not be liable on account thereof." The terms of section 251 in relation to these bonds constitute a particular rule, which must be read together with the general rule stated in section 3. The people of the city, in voting to adopt the charter, determined that the nature of the business of the municipal housing commission was such that, notwithstanding its character as a municipal affair, the bonds to be issued should not create a liability to be met by taxation, but should be secured on the specified property alone. They further determined that under these circumstances the right to issue such bonds should depend upon action by the housing commission and the city council, without submitting such matters for approval by the electors. It reasonably may be inferred that, in the opinion of the framers of the charter and the people who voted for it, the general laws relating to municipal bonds were not applicable to the plan and purpose of creation of these bonds which were to aid in financing the business entrusted to the housing commission. There appears to be no constitutional restriction upon the right of the city, by its charter, to adopt the procedure which the charter has thus established.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion the demurrer should be, and the same hereby is, overruled.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

Daniel O'CONNELL, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al., Defendants and Respondents. (S. F. 12282.)★ Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1928. Department 2. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, J. J. Trabucco, Judge, sustaining demurrer. Affirmed. Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edward F. Moran, of San Francisco, for Thomas F. Boyle. Robert M. Searls, of San Francisco, for Ralph McLeran.

PER CURIAM. Upon a careful examination of the record herein, we are satisfied that the plaintiff's complaint failed to state a cause of action, that the demurrer thereto was properly sustained, and that the judgment in favor of the defendants thereon was correctly given and made, and that this appeal is without merit. The judgment is affirmed.

HUNT v. BOYLE, Auditor, et al.

Supreme Court of California. May 7, 1928.

1. Street railroads 🔑13—Radiating railway lines built at different times, through separate bond issues and separate elections, constituted single municipally owned railway system (City and County of San Francisco Charter, art. 12, § 16).

Several radiating railway lines built by city and county of San Francisco at different times and in each instance submitted to public approval, and made possible through separate bond issues pursuant to City and County of San Francisco Charter, art. 12, contemplating gradual acquisition by city and county of public utilities, held to constitute in actual operation single municipally owned and operated street railway system within section 16, providing for maintenance in city treasury of special fund to be set aside for utility for operating expenses, repairs, sinking fund, extensions, and reserve.

2. Street railroads 🔑13—Proposed addition to municipally owned railway by connecting lines employing same method of operation involved "extension" which might be built without popular vote (City and County of San Francisco Charter, art. 12, § 16).

Proposed construction of addition to the system of municipally owned railways connecting with existing lines and using same method of operation, though not proceeding from existing termini of street railway system, held to constitute "extension" under City and County of San Francisco Charter, art. 12, § 16, permitting maintenance of fund in city treasury for extensions of public utilities, and not to constitute another distinct municipally owned railway, creation of which would have to be submitted to vote of people.

3. Street railroads 🔑13—Depreciation fund provided from earnings of municipal railway held available for extensions, though such purpose was not contemplated by ordinance creating fund (City and County of San Francisco Charter, art. 12, § 16).

City and county of San Francisco, having gradually acquired municipally owned street railway system, under Charter, art. 12, held entitled to use funds provided for and sequestered in so-called "depreciation fund" derived from earnings of municipal railway system, under section 16, for construction of new railway lines constituting "extension" of existing system, even though board of supervisors did not in the original ordinance creating the fund embrace in its purposes that of extensions, since provisions of charter governed uses of the fund.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Reuben G. Hunt against Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, and Timothy A. Reardon and others, as Commissioners of the Department of Public Works and as the Board of Public Works. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., Dion R. Holm, Asst. City Atty., and Frank L. Fenton, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff, alleging himself to be a taxpayer, from a judgment of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, refusing to enjoin the board of public works of said municipality from entering into a contract for the construction of certain municipally owned railway lines therein, and also to restrain the auditor from certifying that there are funds available in the municipal treasury to meet the payments to become due under such proposed contract or to audit such payments as the same become due. The facts are not seriously in dispute. In the year 1909 the city and county of San Francisco, by an ordinance duly adopted by its board of supervisors, undertook to commit its people to the policy of public ownership, control, and conduct of a system of street railways upon and along certain of its principal streets and extending from its business center outward in several stated directions into its main residential districts and suburbs. The ordinances declaring this purpose and providing for the submission of this policy to popular vote were proposed and adopted under the provisions of article 12 of the Charter of the city and county of San Francisco, in the opening clause of which "it is hereby declared to be the purpose and intention of the people of the city and county of San Francisco that its public utilities shall be gradually acquired and ultimately owned by the city and county." Under this and the succeeding provisions of said article, the people of San Francisco approved the foregoing policy as applied to the creation, operation, and control of railway lines upon and along the public streets designated in said ordinances by providing for a bond issue for the cost thereof, and in due course the municipally owned and operated railway system thus provided for began to function. In the year 1913, due doubtless, in part at least, to the plan of the people of San Francisco to create and conduct the Panama-Pacific International Exposition and to the location thereof, certain other ordinances were adopted by the board of supervisors determining that the public interest and necessity demanded the acquisition and construction of "a system of municipal street railways" commencing at certain points on Market street and extending along certain other designated streets to defined terminals, and providing for the submission of the matter of these additions to the already owned and operated system to popluar vote in the form of bond issues to cover the cost of construction. These ordinances also received a vote of popular sanction and the municipally owned railways thus provided for were constructed and put in operation.

[1] An examination of the maps which have been submitted to our inspection carries conviction that these several radiating railway lines, though built at different times, and though in each instance at their inception submitted to public approval and as to their cost made possible by separate bond issues, constitute in actual operation and practical effect but one municipally owned and operated railway system, and as such subject in its entirety to all of the provisions of the aforesaid article of the charter. Under the provisions of section 16 of said article 12 of the Charter it is provided that:

"1. Whenever any public utility shall be operated by the city and county, the receipts from such utility shall be paid daily into the city treasury, and maintained in a special fund set aside for such utility. The supervisors may, from time to time, make appropriations from such funds for the following purposes:

"(a) For the payment of the operating expenses of such utility.

"(b) For repairs and reconstruction.

"(c) For payment of interest and sinking fund on the bonds issued for the acquisition or construction of such utility.

"(d) For extensions and improvements.

"(e) For a reserve fund."

Pursuant to the foregoing provision the board of supervisors of said municipality in the year 1915 adopted an ordinance creating a so-called "depreciation fund" through the appropriation and setting apart of 18 per cent. of the gross passenger revenues of "the municipal railway" for certain purposes designated therein. It is true that in the designation of such purposes in said ordinance the board did not expressly embrace the item of extensions among the purposes to which when necessary and available such sequestrated funds were to be applied; and that, this being so, it might well be that the rule governing the disposition of the moneys accumulated and accumulating in said "depreciation fund" must first have have been devoted to the expressed objects in said ordinance; but it would not follow therefrom that the moneys thus collected in said fund, when the aforesaid expressed purposes of its creation were provided for, might not be applied to "extensions" in the municipal railway system when such were found to be needful, since the section of the charter in question does expressly provide that "extensions" are to be one of the purposes for which said "depreciation fund" is required to be set apart. In the year 1926 the board of supervisors, by an ordinance duly adopted, undertook to recreate the former depreciation fund under the name of "new depreciation fund," the only practical change in which apparently was that of transferring from the accumulations in said fund certain specific amounts to purposes to which under the said charter provision they might be devoted, and in otherwise lessening the amount of the annual deposit to be placed to the credit of such fund. It was not shown upon the trial of this action, nor is it here seriously contended, that there is not at present in the form of accumulations in the aggregate of said depreciation fund sufficient money after all of the purposes which should be given precedence in the distribution thereof have been satisfied to permit the devotion of the money sought to be applied to the purposes sought to be enjoined in this proceeding, provided such purposes are otherwise lawful and being lawfully undertaken.

In the month of March, 1927, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed, and the mayor duly approved, a so-called "declaratory ordinance" relating to "municipal railway extensions." By the express terms of this ordinance it was determined and declared that the public interest and necessity demanded the acquisition or construction of "a number of extensions to the existing municipal street railway system along public streets, private rights of way, and through tunnels being constructed by the municipality, said extensions to be made from the existing municipal railway track" at various specified points thereon, among which was the specification, "From the municipal railway tracks on Market street at Duboce avenue through the Sunset-Duboce tunnel into the Sunset District, and through the Sunset District to a terminal near Ocean Beach, with connecting cross-town service west of Twentieth avenue between said extension and the existing municipal line on Taraval street." Numerous other so-called extensions were provided for in this ordinance, and the board of public works was directed to procure through the city engineer and file with the board of supervisors plans and estimates of cost of original construction and completion "of the extensions to the municipal street railways as herein described." Upon the coming in of the report of the board of public works pursuant to the foregoing direction, it was determined by the board of supervisors that the cost of making and providing for the equipment of all of the extensions to the municipal railway system enumerated in its previous ordinance would be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual revenues of the municipality or out of other available funds thereof devotable to such purposes, and that a bond issue would be required. The board of supervisors accordingly, by proper ordinance, provided for and duly called a special election to be held for the purpose of submitting to the voters of San Francisco the proposition of a bond issue in the sum of $4,700,000 for the making of the proposed municipal railway extensions. Upon the holding of said election, however, the proposed bond issue was defeated by its failure to receive the requisite two-thirds majority of the vote cast, although a large majority of the voters favored the proposition. Thereafter and during the month of September, 1927, the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, proceeding upon the theory that the construction of the so-called Judah street and Duboce tunnel addition to the already existing municipal railway system of said municipality was such an extension of said railway system as was within the contemplation of the provisions of said article 12 of the Charter, and that the power to proceed to construct such extension had been intrusted to said municipal body under the previous acts and resolutions of the board of supervisors, and that there had been or were to be provided and set apart, out of the depreciation fund above referred to, a sufficiency of funds available for the making of said "extension," proceeded to award a contract to Eaton & Smith, a firm of contractors, for the construction of said extension on and along the defined route at a preliminary cost of $248,264. The total estimated cost of said "extension," according to the estimates thereof theretofore made by said board of public works, will be approximately $800,000. The available funds to make and complete said extension and the necessary equipment thereof have been or are to be provided out of said "depreciation fund," through the creation of such fund as stated above in the year 1915, and through an appropriation by the board of supervisors of $500,000 out of said fund made in the year 1921, when the proceedings for the construction of said addition to the then existing municipal railway system were first initiated by said board; and by the subsequent appropriation of the additional sum of $200,000 made by said board of supervisors in the same year; and by the still further appropriation of the sum of $116,000 from the same fund made by said board in 1927. The trial court found that the proposed construction of the Judah street and Duboce tunnel addition to the already existing system of municipal railways was an extension of said system within the purport and meaning of said article 12 of the Charter of said municipality, and further found that the foregoing appropriation, aggregating the sum of $816,000. from the said depreciation fund had been duly and legally made, and that the said aggregate sum was available for the making of said extension, and that the contract therefor with said firm of contractors had been lawfully entered into by said board of public works of said municipality; and, based upon such findings of fact and conclusions of law, the trial court by its judgment denied the plaintiff the relief demanded in his complaint, whereupon he has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

[2] The main and practically the controlling contention of the appellant here is that the proposed addition to the municipally owned railways of the city and county of San Francisco is not an "extension" thereof, but is in fact another municipally owned railway which it is proposed to add to the several already existing municipally owned railways of the municipality; and that this being so the precedure provided by article 12 of the Charter thereof for the creation or acquisition of a new public utility through the submission, of the question of its creation or acquisition to the vote of the people must be pursued; and that such procedure not having been pursued in respect to the construction of the railway line in question, the public officials who are proceeding or threatening to make or to approve such construction, or to devote to it the funds of the municipality from whatever source derived, should have been enjoined.

We are unable to agree with the contention of the appellant herein that the proposed construction of the Judah street and Duboce tunnel addition to the already existing system of municipally owned railways of the city and county of San Francisco is not to be regarded as an extension thereof, within the intent and meaning of article 12 of the Charter thereof. When the people of San Francisco adopted the said provision in said Charter relating to the acquisition of public utilities, they doubtless had in contemplation the creation or acquisition of a system of municipally owned railways which should not only measurably meet the needs of travel and transportation within certain areas of the then existing city, but which should also be made responsive to the increasing needs in the way of travel and transportation of the growing and expanding city; and while it may be true that the governing body of the municipality saw fit upon those earlier occasions when such needed enlargements of the service of its municipal railways were in contemplation to submit the question to popular vote in the form of proposed bonds to meet the cost of their construction, it does not follow that those enlargements of the system were not in truth and in fact extensions thereof, which, having been approved and completed by whatever method, became merely an enlargement and extension of a single and unified system, and as such have been managed, controlled, and operated since their completion. The present proposed enlargement of the existing municipally owned railway system of the municipality is evidently, actually, and in point of practical conduct and operation intended to similarly blend into and form a part of the system and by so doing to form an extension of the facilities of such system corresponding and responsive to the expanding areas of improvement and of population in and about the growing city. The extension when made will branch forth from the designated streets of said city which are already occupied with municipally owned railway lines and will be so connected with such existing lines that the same cars and the same system and method of operation will be employed on the extended as are already employed on and along the existing lines, while travel will move and pass from the one to the other as travel is wont to do over a single and unified line of railway, regardless of differences in the time or method of creation of its component parts. There is no merit in the contention of the appellant that the proposed addition to the municipally owned railway system of the municipality is not to be deemed an "extension" because it does not proceed from existing termini thereof. A system of street railways in any large city is, of necessity, a radiating system, responding in its enlargements to the trend of population and taking off from original laterals at such points of contact as the economics of construction require. It is therefore our conclusion that the proposed construction of the so-called Judah street and Duboce tunnel enlargement of the existing system of municipally owned railways in said municipality was properly treated and stated by the board of public works thereof to be an extension of said system, and that the trial court was correct in so holding in the instant case.

[3] This being so, the only remaining question would be as to whether the funds already provided for and sequestered in the so-called "depreciation fund" derived from the earnings of said municipal railway system under the requirements of section 16 of article 12 of the Charter are to be held available for the construction of such extension. Said section of the charter, as we have already seen, by its express terms sets forth the purposes for which the funds of the public utility were required to be accumulated. Among these purposes is that of "extensions." It is not seriously contended upon this appeal that if the construction of said new railway line or lines constitute an extension of the already existing system of municipal railways from the earnings of which this specific fund has been accumulated it may not, if other demands upon it have been satisfied, be drawn upon for the making of such extensions as the one in question here. The contention of the appellant in that regard is that, since the board of supervisors did not in the original ordinance creating such fund embrace in its purposes that of "extensions," its residue is not now available for that purpose. But, as already stated herein, we think that the provisions of the charter, and not the ordinance of the board, is to govern the uses to which said funds when once created shall from time to time be applied.

In conclusion, it may be stated that we do not consider that any views expressed by this court in the case of Uhl v. Badaracco, 199 Cal. 270, 248 P. 917, or by the District Court of Appeal in Mobley v. Board of Public Works, 44 Cal. App. 167, 186 P. 412, are out of harmony with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion.

Divorce 🔑130—Under evidence, denial of divorce for cruelty held not abuse of discretion.

Where evidence showed that parties had lived together with much misunderstanding and fault on both sides for several years, and court found that acts of cruelty by defendant alleged as grounds for divorce were mitigated or induced by the harassing and annoying conduct of plaintiff herself and that plaintiff's acts did not cause defendant grievous mental anguish sufficient to award defendant a divorce, denial of divorce to either party was not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action for divorce by Addie M. Harp against Henry O. Harp and others, in which named defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment denying a divorce to either party, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

J. M. Walthall, of Modesto, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the trial court denying a divorce to either of the parties to this action. The plaintiff commenced her action for divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty, with numerous specifications as to wherein such alleged cruelty consisted. The defendant answered, denying a number of the averments of the plaintiff as to his specific acts of cruelty, and as to the rest qualifying certain admissions as to his abuse of plaintiff in the use of violent language in certain instances by the statement that he had not used such language to the plaintiff without cause. Upon the trial of the case the evidence showed that the parties had lived a sort of "cat and dog" life for several years, with much misunderstanding and fault on both sides. The trial court upon the submission of the cause filed findings of fact wherein it negatived a number of plaintiff's averments as to specific acts of cruelty, and as to the rest found that, while in a measure true, they were mitigated or induced by the harassing and annoying conduct of the plaintiff herself. As to the defendant's cross-complaint, the trial court held that the actions of the plaintiff shown thereunder were not such as to amount to grievous mental anguish sufficient to justify awarding the defendant a divorce. The trial court therefore, by its judgment, denied a divorce to either of the parties.

The appellant herein contends that the trial court was in error in so doing for the reason, as it is urged, that the whole testimony shows that the two parties cannot live in harmony together. From an examination of the entire record, however, we are satisfied that the trial court did not abuse the discretion with which it was invested in denying a divorce under the facts as presented in this particular case.

WASTE, C. J. In a proceeding in habeas corpus the court below awarded the custody of Agnes Patterson Bruegger, a minor, to her father, the petitioner for the writ. A motion is now made to dismiss the appeal taken by the maternal grandparents, respondents in the court below, upon the ground that there is no right to an appeal in a matter of this character, for which reason, it is contended, the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding.

Until the enactment of section 1506 of the Penal Code, in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1061), it was always the rule in this state that the determination of a court having jurisdiction in proceedings in habeas corpus was not subject to review by any other court in any manner, and that the doctrine of res adjudicata did not apply. appeal to the District Court of Appeal by the people from a final order made upon the return of a writ of habeas corpus discharging a defendant after his conviction in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record. In all other cases the law remains unchanged. In re Alpine (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 947.

Appellants contend that our decisions deal only with cases involving proceedings instituted to secure the release of persons from restraint, and that there is a distinction between such cases and proceedings brought to determine the right to the custody of children. Such a distinction has been drawn by courts in a number of other jurisdictions, where it has been held that an appeal will lie from an order entered in habeas corpus proceedings fixing the custody of a child. Those courts, while recognizing the generally accepted rule that in proceedings brought to secure release from imprisonment or restraint a decision on one writ is not a bar to proceedings upon another writ, hold that, where the facts in a proceeding brought to determine the custody of a child are the same as those determined in a previous proceeding, the former order is res adjudicata. Jamison v. Gilbert, 38 Okl. 751, 135 P. 342, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1133. The latter kind of proceedings they hold, partake of the nature of a private suit in which the public has no concern, and in which the rights of the parties are determined as in any civil action, and the judgment rendered is a final adjudication in regard to the custody of the child. 12 R. C. L. p. 1257, § 75; 29 C. J. p. 185, § 212. This theory, while supported by most respectable authority, is at variance with what has been the general rule in this state. Its weakness, in its application to appeals, lies in the fact that such an adjudication is res adjudicata and binding upon the parties only so long as the facts are the same and the conditions affecting the child's welfare or the parents' rights remain as they were when the hearing was had and the order made. In re Gille, 65 Cal. App. 617, 620, 224 P. 784, and cases cited. While such an order finally determines the question of the custody on facts and issues then before the court, it is in its nature but temporary and interlocutory. The decisions from other jurisdictions are not in agreement on the subject. See R. C. L. and C. J., supra. Some of those sustaining the contention of the appellants are based on statutes giving the right to appeal in these matters; others rest on the distinction we have noted. We have in this state no express legislative provision for an appeal in habeas corpus proceedings, save in the single instance provided by section 1506 of the Penal Code. We deem it to be the definitely settled law in this state that, in the absence of legislative action, an appeal will not lie in such matters. The cases cited so hold. See Matter of Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 366, 113 P. 684.

The primary purpose of the writ of habeas corpus is to provide a summary and speedy mode of inquiring into the legality of imprisonment or restraint. Incidentally, in its application to children, the child's welfare may be inquired into; but the writ would be deprived of its effect if an order made pursuant to the inquiry can be suspended, and the person or parties affected can be compelled to undergo the delay attendant upon an appeal to the higher court.

The motion is granted and the appeal is dismissed.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against her for $2,361.56 in an action for damages for fraud. The facts as found by the trial court are:

That on the 27th day of March, 1924, and at the time of the transfer thereof to defendant Margaret McIntosh, plaintiff was the owner and in the possession of a certain described parcel of real property in Berkeley, Cal., then having a fair market value over and above all liens and incumbrances of the sum of $1,525, which facts were then known to John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh. That in the months of March and April, 1924, and many times prior thereto, at said county of Alameda, state of California, for the purpose and with the intent of cheating and defrauding plaintiff, defendants represented to said plaintiff that said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh were the owners of a certain described piece or parcel of real property in the county of Calaveras, state of California, consisting of 160 acres, and in the month of April, 1924, and prior to the sale of said property to plaintiff, said John McIntosh, acting for himself and as the agent of said Margaret McIntosh, pointed out to this plaintiff a spring of water, and stated to this plaintiff that said spring of water was located on said 160 acres of land then claimed to have been owned by said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh. That many times prior to the 1st day of April, 1926, said Margaret McIntosh and John McIntosh offered to trade said land in Calaveras county, Cal., to plaintiff, subject to the incumbrances thereon, for said property in the city of Berkeley owned by plaintiff, together with the promissory note of plaintiff, payable to said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh, in the sum of $580.

That, relying upon said representations of said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh, and because thereof, said plaintiff accepted said proposal of exchange. That plaintiff believed in and relied upon said representations, offers, and promises made to him by said Margaret McIntosh and John McIntosh, and because thereof, thereafter, subsequent to the 27th day of March, 1924, executed a grant deed granting and conveying to said Margaret McIntosh said real property owned by plaintiff in said city of Berkeley, and on said last named date plaintiff also executed to said Margaret McIntosh and John McIntosh his said promissory note in the sum of $580. That plaintiff received no other consideration, and neither said John McIntosh nor Margaret McIntosh parted with anything for the transfer and conveyance by plaintiff of said Berkeley property to Margaret McIntosh and the execution and delivery of said note for $580, except the said deed purporting to convey to plaintiff said land in Calaveras county, Cal. That neither said John McIntosh nor said Margaret McIntosh, on the 27th day of March, 1924, or at any time thereafter, owned any right, title, or interest in or to said land in Calaveras county, and said spring of water was not on said land, but was situate on other and adjoining land, which latter property was at no time owned by John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh, or either of them—all of which facts were at all times herein mentioned well known to said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh, and unknown to plaintiff, for more than one year subsequent to the execution of said deeds. That, prior to discovery that said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh were not the owners of said real property in Calaveras county, or any part thereof, and that said spring of water was not on said or any land owned by said defendants, and without knowledge of the falsity of said representations made to him as aforesaid, and within six months after the execution by him of said note, said plaintiff paid to said John McIntosh and Margaret McIntosh said sum of $580, named as the principal sum in said promissory note, together with the interest accrued thereon, and said note was thereupon returned to plaintiff. That no part of said sums has been repaid to plaintiff.

That on or about August 15, 1924, said Margaret McIntosh and John McIntosh sold, transferred, and conveyed said real property situate in Berkeley, previously granted to them by plaintiff, to Earl W. and Virginia E. Weber, who ever since have been and now are the owners thereof.

An examination of the record discloses that the contention of appellant that the evidence does not support the findings is without merit. The testimony of the plaintiff supports the findings made by the trial court.

[1, 2] It appears that, after plaintiff discovered the fraud which had been practiced upon him, and threatened to commence criminal proceedings, defendants executed a deed purporting to convey to plaintiff a 200-acre tract of land, located about a mile from the quarter section which they had sold to him; that John McIntosh caused said deed to be recorded, and gave instructions to the recorder to mail said deed to plaintiff. It also appears that the preparation and recording of this deed was all without the knowledge, acquiescence, or consent of plaintiff. Under the circumstances, there was no delivery of this deed to plaintiff. Delivery cannot be made without the consent, express or implied, of the grantee. There is, therefore, no merit to appellant's contention that a reconveyance should have been made by plaintiff as a condition precedent to his recovery in this action.

[3] Appellant attacks the judgment as being in excess of the amount demanded in the complaint. Section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, expressly declares that, where an answer is filed, the court may grant the plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues. In the case of Cassinella v. Allen, 168 Cal. 681, 144 P. 748, it is said:

> "Although the plaintiff, by praying for less than is his due, exposes himself to the risk, in case of default, of having to take judgment for a limited relief, he does not, by the mere filing of his complaint, irrevocably surrender or release the balance of his demand. The complaint is still subject to amendment, and it is also possible that the defendant, by answering, may enlarge the scope of the relief to any extent 'consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue.' Code Civ. Proc. § 580. If the defendant wishes to have the relief limited to that prayed for, he must allow the case to reach the status contemplated by section 580; i. e., that of an application for judgment by default, upon failure to answer."

To the same effect is the case of Potter-Huffman Co. v. Witcher, 48 Cal. App. 96, 191 P. 725.

[4, 5] Certain allegations were made in affidavits filed by defendant upon her motion for a new trial, which allegations either directly or indirectly tended to contradict the testimony of plaintiff in certain particulars. Of course, the substance of these affidavits cannot be considered in connection with the contention of the appellant that the evidence does not support the findings. At the most, the allegations in the affidavits would but create a conflict in the testimony, and such allegations were not before the court at the time of making its findings. As to the refusal of the trial court to grant the motion for a new trial, we are of the opinion that its discretion was properly exercised in this matter, as the defendant should have produced at the trial any testimony available to contradict that offered by the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Solomon Garde against Sybil E. Goldsmith (formerly Sybil E. Lippitt). From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco (Samuel R. Stern, of Seattle, Wash., of counsel), for appellant.

H. U. Brandenstein, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment against him entered upon sustaining a demurrer to the first count of his amended complaint. He was given leave to amend the second count of said complaint, but declined to do so and withdrew the claim made thereunder.

The action was brought upon the following letter, written by Simon L. Selling to the defendant, his niece, and handed to plaintiff in a sealed envelope, to be placed in the writer's safe deposit box, to be opened after his death:

"Tacoma, Wn., Sept. 24, 1923.

"Sept. 24, 1923.

"Sybil E. Lippitt (Lippitt). San Francisco, Cal.—I desire that you pay to Solomon Garde (Solomon Garde) of Seattle, Wn., the sum of $20,000 Twenty Thousand Dollars, and to come from amount I have invested at present in Crown Columbia Pulp & Paper Co., such sum to be paid after my sister's Rose Selling's death.

"Carrie out this wish in full.

"Simon L. Selling.

"I have no witness—I know you will fulfill my wish."

(Reverse side of instrument.)

"Crown Columbia Pulp & Paper Co. Bonds or other securities issuing from amount bought from Bonds that amount came from original amount that came or was procured from amount that I purchased from amount Crown Willamette Pulp & Co. Paper Bonds.

"Simon L. Selling."

Prior to writing the foregoing letter, and in 1918, Simon L. Selling had executed a last will and testament and on July 26, 1923, had executed a codicil. These instruments made substantial bequests, among others, to plaintiff and his wife and daughter, and created a trust for the benefit of testator's sister for life and left the residuum of the estate to the defendant herein, a niece of testator.

Within a few months after writing the letter above quoted, Simon L. Selling died and his sister, Rosa Selling, died one month later. After her death plaintiff claimed to be entitled to $20,000 under the letter written by Selling. In brief, the foregoing is the situation disclosed by the complaint, and it would seem that the demurrer was properly sustained.

[1, 2] The instrument relied upon has no force as a testamentary disposition. It is not executed with the required formalities to stand alone, and it could not become a part of the will and codicil previously executed. An extraneous document cannot affect the terms of a will or in any way restrict testamentary succession to property, unless the document is in existence when the will is made and is so clearly identified in the will itself as to become a part of the will. Estate of Shillaber, 74 Cal. 144, 146, 15 P. 453 (5 Am. St. Rep. 433); Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 342, 55 P. 1011; Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 81, 90 P. 192 (121 Am. St. Rep. 100); Estate of Doane, 190 Cal. 412, 414, 213 P. 53.

[3, 4] It is apparent that the instrument in question did not constitute a gift of the money or bonds, either inter vivos or causa mortis. The only other aspect of plaintiff's case is the trust theory. It is apparent that no trust was created at the time the instrument was written. It was not to be opened until the death of Selling; it did not purport to create a present equitable title in plaintiff. No part or parcel of the title to the money or bonds was parted with by Selling during his lifetime; the letter written by him is entirely testamentary in character. Upon Selling's death, by reason of the will and codicil, the title to the property became vested in the defendant. There was no consideration to support a trust for plaintiff in the property. The letter of Selling imposed but a moral obligation upon the defendant, and its language indicates that Selling understood this and appealed to her to carry out his wish as he had "no witness."

Appeal from Superior Court of Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Cayetano C. Apablasa, sometimes known as Cayetano J. Apablasa, and another, against Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Randall & Bartlett, Rex B. Goodcell, Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, and John W. Luter, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KING, Presiding Justice, pro tem. Plaintiffs are sons of Cayetano Apablasa, who died November 14, 1889, leaving a widow, defendant Concepcion Apablasa, now Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda, wife of defendant Ildefonso A. Sepulveda, mother of the plaintiffs and four other children, who are also defendants.

The action seeks to leave it adjudged that their mother holds certain property which was distributed to her by decree of distribution in the estate of Cayetano Apablasa, with its rents, issues, profits, and proceeds, in trust for the use and benefit of plaintiffs and their brothers and sisters, and for an accounting.

The amended complaint alleged:

That shortly before their father's death he expressed to his wife his desire and intention that all of his property should remain in his family and be devoted to the maintenance and support of his said wife, and the education, maintenance, and support of the said children of himself and the said defendant during the lifetime of said defendant, and upon her death all of said property, together with the accumulated rentals, income, and proceeds thereof, should go to his said children, without sale, partition, or division, deducting therefrom only a sufficient amount to pay for the upkeep and maintenance of said property, and for the education, maintenance, and support of the said defendant and the children of the said defendant and the said Cayetano Apablasa.

That at said time the said defendant promised and represented to the said Cayetano Apablasa that, if he would put said property in her charge on his death, she would carry out his said desire and intention, and would protect the interests of the children of the said Cayetano Apablasa and herself in the matter of said property, and would properly manage said property and provide for the education, support, and maintenance of said children during her lifetime, and that the said children would receive said property upon her death. That the said Cayetano Apablasa believed the said promises and representations of the said defendant, and in reliance thereon, and in pursuance of his desire and intention, he entered into an agreement with the said defendant that he would, by will, place the property in her charge on said terms. That, in pursuance of said desire and intention, and the said agreement of the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda, and in reliance upon her promises and representations, the said Cayetano Apablasa caused a will to be prepared, a copy of which is attached. That said defendant and the said Cayetano Apablasa employed an attorney to draw said will, marked Exhibit 1, and that the said defendant caused the said attorney and did herself advise the said Cayetano Apablasa, that the language and terms of said will marked Exhibit 1 were expressive of the desire and intention of the said Cayetano Apablasa, and in accordance with the agreement between said Cayetano Apablasa and the said defendant, and that the legal effect thereof would be to cause his estate to be dealt with and to be distributed by the courts in pursuance of the desire and intention expressed by said Cayetano Apablasa, as hereinbefore alleged.

Plaintiffs are informed and believe, and therefore allege, that the said Cayetano Apablasa, relying upon the representations of the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda and the said attorney, and believing that said will would have said legal effect, and that the said defendant would perform all of her said promises, and having trust and confidence in the said defendant and said attorney, did, on or about the 15th day of October, 1889, duly execute and publish his last will and testament. A copy of the will is incorporated in the complaint.

After the death of their father, the will was admitted to probate; the mother acting as executrix.

No guardian or representative acted for the seven children, whose ages, at their father's death, ranged from 10 months to 16 years.

The will provides:

"Secondly, I hereby declare that the property in which I now reside on Grandview avenue, in the city of Los Angeles and the interest held by me in the lot on Castelar street in Los Angeles City is community property and that the property on Alameda street in said city is my separate estate—having been acquired by inheritance from my father.

"Thirdly, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Concepcion Apablasa, all my property real and personal wherever the same may be situated, with full power and control over the same to lease, improve and manage the same and collect the rents thereof and use the same as she may deem best without any order or proceeding in any court of tribunal other than such as are required by law to establish this will in so far as I can legally dispense with legal proceedings—and it is my will and desire that my said wife shall not sell any of said property, but shall retain the same and carry on and manage the same for the benefit and support of herself and the education and maintenance of our children John C. Apablasa now aged sixteen years, Cayetano C. Aplablasa aged thirteen years, Mariya Apablasa, aged twelve years, Concepcion Apablasa aged seven years, Sara Apablasa aged three years, Benjamin Apablasa, aged four years and Candelaria Apablasa, aged ten months—trusting to my said wife to make all necessary and proper provision for their support, education and maintenance at all times during her lifetime and it is my wish that my said wife shall by her will or otherwise before her death, vest the title to the property on Alameda street, derived from my father, as aforesaid, in my said children or such of them as may then be living and in the children if any there be of my said children who shall have died leaving issue then living—To the end and with the purpose of keeping said property in my family, for their support and maintenance, without partition, such conveyance to be of undivided interests therein, share and share alike to my said children."

The complaint also alleges:

That on July 28, 1891, the executrix, as such executrix, filed in said matter her petition for distribution of the whole of said estate to her. That she alleged in said petition, and plaintiffs are informed and believe and therefore allege, that she and her attorney represented to the court on the hearing thereof, and thereby led the judge hearing said proceeding to believe, that said defendant Concepcion Apablasa was the sole devisee under the will of Cayetano Apablasa, deceased. That upon such petition and representation, and by reason thereof, the court made and entered its decree of distribution in said matter, distributing the whole of the estate of said deceased to said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda. That the proceedings in said matter were, except as herein stated, regular on the face of the records, and that by reason thereof there is no appeal from said decree of distribution. That neither of these plaintiffs had any actual knowledge of the terms of said decree until the year 1923, and made no effort to ascertain any facts in regard to said proceedings, or the status of said property, by reason of the facts hereinafter alleged.

That during all of the time said matter of the estate of Cayetano Apablasa was pending in said court, the said defendant had the actual custody and control of these plaintiffs and of the other minor children of Cayetano Apablasa and herself, and was their natural guardian, and was acting as such. That during all of this time these plaintiffs and said other minor children relied upon said defendant, their mother, to properly represent them in said proceedings and to secure for them their respective interests and just and lawful shares in said estate.

That, after the death of the said Cayetano Apablasa, the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda undertook to and did improve and manage and collect the rents of the real property described in said will, and did make certain provisions out of the rentals, incomes, and proceeds thereof for the benefit and support of herself and of the children named in said will, according to the desire and intention of said Cayetano Apablasa, for the benefit of the beneficiaries therein named in said will, according to the desire and intention of the said Cayetano Apablasa, for the benefit of the beneficiaries therein named, and not otherwise, and that during all the times since the death of said Cayetano Apablasa, up to and including the month of July, 1923, the said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda assured and represented to these plaintiffs that she, the said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda, had received said property under said will, and was holding the same under the provisions thereof, and as trustee thereunder, and according to the desire and intention of said Cayetano Apablasa, and for the benefit of herself and the said children, according to their interests in said property under said will, as such interests are defined and provided for thereby, and according to their father's desire and intention, as expressed therein, and as expressed to her before his death, and not otherwise, and during all of said time said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda assured and represented to these plaintiffs and to the said other children that she, as their mother, was treating, and would treat, them fairly, and was protecting, and would protect, them in the matter of their said interests in their said father's estate, and would, at any time, upon demand, render an account of her acts as such trustee, and yield and deliver to each of said children all sums of money, property, or interests to which they were and are entitled as therein set forth, and that the interest of each child was a one-seventh interest in all the property left by their said father.

That these plaintiffs and the said other children relied upon the assurances, representations, and promises, and relied upon the fact that the said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda was their mother and natural guardian, and thereby, and from all the circumstances hereinbefore stated, believed that said Concepcion Apablasa was holding possession of said property as such trustee only, and for the use and benefit of all of said children, according to their interests under said will, and according to their father's wishes and intentions, and not otherwise, and that she (the said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda) would, on demand, account to all of said children for her acts as such trustee, and yield and deliver to each of said children all sums of money, property, or interests to which they were and are entitled as herein set forth.

It is then alleged:

That in 1912 the defendant Concepcion sold the Alameda street property, and that said defendants paid to plaintiffs the sum of $40,000, and at the time of said payment stated and represented to plaintiffs that the property was sold for their benefit, and that the said sum so paid was their share of the proceeds of said property; that the said sum of $40,000 did not fully cover and embrace the interest of plaintiffs, as beneficiaries under said trust, in the proceeds of the sale of said property; and that plaintiffs should have been paid a greater sum as their share of the proceeds of the sale of said property, the exact amount of which is to plaintiffs unknown.

That plaintiffs never knew that defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda claimed any interest in and to said property or any part thereof, except as trustee, for plaintiffs and their said brothers and sisters, as heretofore set out. That from time to time after the death of the said Cayetano Apablasa the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda, up to and just prior to the 6th day of July, 1923, gave plaintiffs sums of money which she (the said Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda) told plaintiffs were given to them by her as trustee, according to the terms of the said will. That plaintiffs relied upon the said statements and representations of their mother, the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda, and believed that she was holding said property and the whole thereof in trust for the benefit of plaintiffs, and their said brothers and sisters, and did so believe until on or about the 6th day of July, 1923, when the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda stated to plaintiffs that the said properties and all of them were hers, and that neither plaintiffs nor their brothers nor sisters had any right, title, or interest in and to said properties, or any part thereof.

That the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda is now in possession and control of, and is using and enjoying for her sole and exclusive use and benefit, certain enumerated property coming from the estate of Cayetano Apablasa.

That the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda is receiving, and has long received, rents, issues, profits, and proceeds from said properties, of an amount and character to the plaintiffs unknown. That said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to account to plaintiffs as to said properties, or any of said properties, and said rents, issues, profits and proceeds and to state and set forth the property belonging to said Cayetano Apablasa at the time of his death; and has refused, and still refuses, to turn over to plaintiffs their part of the said properties and said rents, issues, profits, and proceeds, or any part or portion of the same. That the said properties and said rents, profits, and issues and proceeds of said properties are the properties and the rents, profits, issues, and proceeds of the properties that the said defendant Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda promised and agreed with the said defendant Cayetano Apablasa to receive and hold.

The original complaint was filed November 7, 1924. A demurrer was sustained to it and the amended complaint was then filed, to which a demurrer was interposed and sustained, without leave to amend, and a judgment of dismissal entered in behalf of defendants Concepcion Apablasa de Sepulveda and Ildefonso A. Sepulveda, the only defendants appearing. From this judgment of dismissal the appeal is taken by plaintiffs.

The demurrer is, first, general; second, on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant, in that the sisters of plaintiffs are joined, and that the complaint is uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible; and, third, that any cause of action is barred by sections 318, 322, 336, and 338, Code of Civil Procedure.

It is necessary to present the foregoing voluminous excerpts from the pleadings in order to intelligently discuss the demurrer. Four briefs are presented by appellants and two by respondents.

The grounds of demurrer will be taken up in their order.

First, the general demurrer:

The complaint seeks to establish an involuntary trust. It names the person sought to be charged as trustee, the beneficiaries, sets forth a description of the properties in which it is sought to establish the trust, and gives the terms of the trust. It also alleges the facts which are alleged to give rise to the trust.

Appellants practically concede that the decree of distribution is a conclusive adjudication that legal title under the will is vested in Mrs. Sepulveda free of any precatory trust created by the will, and hence that the allegations attacking the decree of distribution on the ground of fraud are surplusage, but strenuously contend that the remaining allegations of the complaint of themselves constitute a perfect cause of action.

[1-3] Appellants' claim then is that Mrs. Sepulveda promised her then husband that, if he would devise his property to her, she would carry out his desires and intentions as to his children; that thereupon he did so devise the property, which was distributed to her, and that she now claims this property as her own. Under the terms of section 2224, Civil Code, appellants claim that she, having gained this property by fraud, thereby became an involuntary trustee of it for the family of her deceased husband. To maintain this claim they must show extrinsic fraud.

In the Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 549, 117 P. 511, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89, the court held that, if through accident, fraud, or mistake the distributees are holding property under a decree of distribution "to which they are not entitled, equity will do justice, not by overthrowing the decree of distribution, but by declaring the distributees to be involuntary trustees of the rightful owners of the property. * * * The sanctity and immunity of a decree of distribution which has become final attaches to the decree itself and not to those who under it may have derived an unconscionable advantage through fraud, accident, or mistake."

In Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 74, 63 P. 159, the court concedes that section 2224, Civil Code, "in its terms, is broad enough to apply to judgments of courts adjudicating property rights"—referring to a decree of distribution—and quotes with approval Wickersham v. Comerford, 104 Cal. 495, 38 P. 101, that "it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish by clear and indubitable proof, to the satisfaction of the superior court, that the order setting apart the homestead had been obtained through some fraud practiced upon that court by the defendant," and proceeds further to say: "Again, fraud must be shown which is extrinsic and collateral to the cause."

In Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. at 330, 67 P. 285, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98, the court, after reviewing the English doctrine, held that, while permitting the probate to stand, as having no power to set it aside, the false legatee or wrongful legatee should be decreed to be a trustee for the rightful claimant. This case adopts the statement in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 919, and note, that, "when probate is obtained by fraud, equity may declare the executor or other person deriving title under it, a trustee for the party defrauded."

The extrinsic fraud for which a judgment may be set aside is defined by Lord Cairns in Patch v. Ward, L. R., 3 Ch. App. 207, to be "actual fraud such that there is on the part of the person chargeable with it the malus animus, the mala mens putting itself in motion and acting in order to take an undue advantage of some other person for the purpose of actually and knowingly defrauding him." Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 419, 77 P. 1007.

As the court says in Wingerter v. Wingerter, 71 Cal. at 110, 11 P. 855:

> "This action was not brought to set aside the deeds and decree of distribution, but to charge the defendant as an involuntary trustee, for the benefit of the plaintiff, of the property which he fraudulently and wrongfully obtained under them. The action was authorized and proper, and plaintiff was entitled to the relief granted"—citing O'Connor v. Flynn, 57 Cal. 293; Olivas v. Olivas, 61 Cal. 382.

See, also, Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 576, 27 P. 924, 25 Am. St. Rep. 219; Bergin v.

Haight, 99 Cal. 52, 33 P. 760; and Curtis v. Schell, 129 Cal. 208, 61 P. 951, 79 Am. St. Rep. 107.

These authorities lead to the conclusion that the complaint contains sufficient allegations to constitute a cause of action and that the general demurrer should have been overruled.

Second, the misjoinder:

[4, 5] The other children of decedent have, as alleged, a common interest with the plaintiffs, and, when they refused to join as plaintiffs, were properly named defendants, as provided by section 382, Code of Civil Procedure. As to the special demurrer for uncertainty, ambiguity, etc., from what has been said before in this discussion it appears that the demurrer on these grounds is not well founded.

And, third, as to the ground of the running of the statute, sections 318, 322, 336, and 338, Code of Civil Procedure:

[6] The complaint avers that plaintiffs never knew that their mother, defendant, claimed any interest in the property other than as trustee, and believed she was so holding it till July 6, 1923, when she stated the property was hers, and that plaintiffs and her other children had no right or interest therein. This date is 16 months prior to the filing of the original complaint, and therefore the action is not so barred.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.; NOURSE, J.

ZIMMER v. EDINGER. (Civ. 5130.)

1. Brokers 🔑86(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that landowner prevented sale when broker had buyer ready, willing, and able to purchase.

In real estate broker's action against owner for commission, though sale was not consummated, evidence held sufficient to sustain trial court's finding that owner of realty prevented a sale thereof when broker had a buyer ready, willing, and able to purchase.

2. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Broker held entitled to commission, where he had ready, willing, and able purchaser, but consummation of sale was prevented by landowner.

In action by real estate broker against landowner for commission allegedly due, though sale had not been consummated, broker held entitled to commission, where he had procured a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to perform but performance was prevented by owner.

3. Brokers 🔑57(1)—Broker held not entitled to commission on procuring purchaser depositing small payment, where there was no writing binding purchaser to proceed further, and brokerage contract required consummated sale.

In action by real estate broker against landowner for commission allegedly due, though sale had not been consummated, broker held not entitled to commission on his having procured a purchaser who deposited a relatively small payment, where there was no writing binding the purchaser to proceed further with her contract, and the brokerage contract required a consummated sale before commission was earned.

4. Brokers 🔑44—Under ordinary authorization to sell realty, revocation of authority during sale, with strong likelihood of sale being successful, cannot deprive agent of commission.

Under an ordinary authorization to sell real estate, a revocation of the authority while a sale is in progress, with strong likelihood of its being successful, cannot deprive the agent of his commission.

5. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding realty broker was entitled to commission for securing buyer.

In action by real estate broker against landowner for commission allegedly due, though sale was not consummated, evidence held insufficient to support finding that broker had secured a buyer under conditions entitling broker to commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by N. W. Zimmer against C. L. Edinger. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crail and Harold C. Morton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for real estate commission. Plaintiff alleged three causes of action in his second amended complaint. The answer admits there was an authorization in writing from defendant to plaintiff as alleged in the complaint, but denies that any sale was consummated thereunder or commission earned. The court's findings are that plaintiff's allegations are true in the main, and judgment was awarded against defendant in the sum of $1,770, the full amount prayed for, together with costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment under the alternative method, and presses the points that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and that the court committed error in the admission of evidence relating to custom in the matter of a cash deposit in escrow pending search of title, etc.

The facts relating to the first alleged cause of action are as follows: The defendant-appellant owned certain property in that part of the city of Los Angeles known as Sawtelle. The plaintiff-respondent, a real estate agent who had formerly done some business with appellant, and who was personally acquainted with him, was trying to arrange for the leasing of a theater which appellant contemplated building on his property. In this connection respondent introduced appellant to a Mr. Fyhn as a possible lessee. Appellant soon abandoned the project, however, as it entailed an expenditure beyond his means. There was some discussion during the summer between the three, looking to a sale of 60 feet of the property to Fyhn for $250 a front foot. Nothing definite on this occurred, but on October 24, 1922, Fyhn stated to respondent that he had made arrangements for money with the Citizens' Bank, through a Mr. Schnell, and was ready to buy. Respondent then went to appellant (he testified that he told appellant about Fyhn's statement), and secured the following document:

> "Sawtelle, Calif., October 25—1922.
> "I hereby appoint and nominate N. W. Zimmer a licensed real estate broker, of Sawtelle, Calif., as my personal and sole agent for a period of ten days from date to sell for me the following described property situated at the north east corner of Santa Monica Blvd. and Gettysburg Ave. Sawtelle, Calif., and further known as lots (8) eight and (9) nine, block H, Barnette Villa tract, at the price of $250 a front foot on the Santa Monica Blvd. frontage approximately 142 feet more or less, either 60 ft. or all of said frontage. In case the said N. W. Zimmer consummates a sale for me within the prescribed time I agree to pay him a commission of 5% on the purchase price.
> "[Signed] C. L. Edinger."

Fyhn had talked with Schnell, and had promised the latter $1,000 if he would find parties to finance a theater proposition such as Fyhn desired. Schnell found such parties, and this was the basis of Fyhn's statement to respondent, which moved respondent to secure the authorization from appellant.

The morning after the authorization was given, Schnell sent word to appellant that he had found purchasers, naming Hughes and King—the same persons who were to furnish the money for Fyhn's proposition. Appellant then informed Schnell of the authorization. There is some testimony that there was a bad feeling existing between Schnell and respondent. Appellant went to respondent, stating something about Fyhn and associates being ready, as was he, to go into escrow, and asked that he be released from the authorization. A quarrel ensued, in which it seems that appellant sought to have respondent take a one-half commission. This was declined by respondent, and threats were made that the deal was off, and that respondent would not get a cent commission. Hughes and King thereupon withdrew, and nothing further came of the negotiations. These happenings occurred about October 25 or 26, 1922, and on October 28th appellant signed a revocation of the authorization, and caused it to be delivered to respondent. Subsequent to February 7, 1923, Fyhn purchased 60 feet of appellant's lot.

The court found for plaintiff that the sale of the 60 feet was made through the efforts of respondent and under the terms of the authority herein set out; that the sale wherein Hughes and King were to put up the money was prevented by appellant; and that it was prevented through a scheme whereby Fyhn was to purchase the 60 feet after expiration of the authority given respondent.

[1] Appellant contends that he did not prevent the sale, but that Schnell did. However, it appears from the evidence that the deal would have proceeded had respondent agreed to take one-half of his commission instead of demanding the whole of it, which appellant would not pay. It is passing strange why Schnell would have proceeded if one-half the commission had been paid, but wholly declined when all had to be paid, and this, considering that neither Schnell nor his associates Hughes and King had any financial interest in the payment or nonpayment of the commission. The evidence is highly conflicting upon this point, and subject to construction. We cannot say that there was no evidence upon which the court could reasonably have arrived at its conclusion on this cause of action.

[2] We are cognizant of the expression in the authorization, "In case the said N. W. Zimmer consummates a sale for me within the prescribed time I agree to pay him a commission of 5% on the purchase price." The court finds that such consummation was only prevented by the arbitrary action of appellant. The evidence shows that Schnell, Hughes, and King met through the direct act of Fyhn, who was dealing with Zimmer, and that they were ready, willing, and able to proceed. As was said in Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55, "As full performance was prevented by the act of the owner, the agent had earned his commission." Under such circumstances, respondent is entitled to the full benefit of his actions under the terms of his authorization.

After the incident upon which the first cause of action is based, and on the morning of October 27th, respondent, having received a deposit of $250 on the purchase price of the property from an agent representing a Mrs. Mary Regan, tendered the same to appellant, whereupon the latter declined the tender on the ground that it was not enough. The next day appellant revoked the authorization to respondent. On October 28th, and subsequent to such revocation, an attorney for Mrs. Regan tendered by writing the full amount of cash in payment for the property. On October 31st appellant replied to such tender, stating that, if Mrs. Regan would deposit in bank by 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the next day the full purchase price, he would furnish a deed with certificate of title showing the property clear, except "subject to certain street improvement bonds and some taxes," the amounts thereof to be deducted from the sum paid to him, commission thereon to be paid according to rules of the Los Angeles realty board. Nothing further was done until November 4th (the tenth and last day allotted respondent to consummate the sale), when appellant modified his instructions at the bank, authorizing $2,500 initial payment, balance "when title shows clear." Respondent in his brief says:

> "The demand of appellant that the full purchase price be put up at once being told to Mary Regan, the prospective purchaser, and she being unable to procure that amount of money in twenty-four hours, dropped the matter and did nothing further towards purchasing the property."

This would demonstrate that the tender contained in the letter of Mrs. Regan's attorney could not have been made good, and that she directed it when in fact she knowingly could not perform.

[3] The authorization clearly required that the sale should be consummated before a commission was earned. There was no deal with Mrs. Regan ever consummated. Appellant was under no obligation to accept the $250 originally tendered on this transaction, because there was nothing in writing binding her to proceed further, and we seriously doubt that the matter of custom could affect the status of this proposed deal. Even if it could, the $250 tendered or the $1,000 verbally offered was not sufficient, as the testimony was that customarily "10 per cent. or 20" was required as the first deposit.

[4, 5] We thoroughly agree with counsel for respondent, and with the authorities he cites in support of the proposition, that under an ordinary authorization a revocation of the authority while a sale is in progress, with strong likelihood of its being successful, cannot deprive the agent of his commission. But in the instant case, as to Mary Regan, there was no deal on at the time the authorized period expired. We conclude that there was no testimony to support the main allegations of the second cause of action, and that the findings are therefore not supported by the evidence.

The judgment entered was for the sum of $1,770, which covers and includes the sums claimed on both the Fyhn and Regan transactions. Inasmuch as we are sustaining only that part of the judgment which is based upon the Fyhn transaction, amounting to $647.50, the judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $1,122.50, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

WILSON v. EARP. (Civ. 5134.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑757(5)—Reviewing court was not required to search through transcripts to ascertain whether trial court failed to make findings on issues not appearing in brief.

Where briefs of plaintiff on her appeal merely contained part of complaint and defendant's answer raising single issue on which court made finding, reviewing court was not required to search through typewritten transcripts to discover whether there were other issues presented by the pleadings, or whether court failed to find on such other issues.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Finding upon issue which determines case renders failure to find upon other issues immaterial.

Where finding is made upon issue which determines case, other issues become immaterial, and failure to find thereon does not constitute prejudicial error.

3. Brokers 🔑43(2)—Oral agreement employing broker to induce prospective purchasers of office space to get in touch with employer, in return for commissions on resulting sales, held invalid (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6).

Verbal agreement by which holder of lease, who proposed to erect office building, hired broker to interview prospective purchasers of office space to induce them to see the holder of the lease, and agreed to pay commissions on sales so induced, held invalid under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, making agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission invalid, unless in writing.

4. Brokers 🔑82(1)—Failure of plaintiff suing for commissions for procuring purchasers of office space to allege that she was licensed as broker precluded recovery (St. 1919, p. 1252, § 20).

Plaintiff who failed to allege in complaint for commissions, alleged to have been earned in procuring purchasers of space in office building, that at the time agreement was made and services rendered she was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman, as required by St. 1919, p. 1252, § 20, was not entitled to recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by C. Myrtle Wilson against H. R. Earp. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leo D. Daze, of Los Angeles, R. P. Wheat, of Glendale, and Martin F. Shakley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Garten & Maltby, of Long Beach, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff sued to recover commissions she alleges she earned in procuring purchasers for defendant of office spaces in a building to be erected. Judgment was given for defendant.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and her appeal is made pursuant to the alternative method provided for in sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, she did not print in her briefs or in a supplement thereto sufficient of the record to indicate that the trial court committed any error in giving judgment for defendant. The only portions of the record so printed are one paragraph of plaintiff's amended complaint, the paragraph of defendant's answer thereto, and the findings made by the court, consisting of one paragraph. The paragraph from the amended complaint recites that plaintiff and defendant made a contract whereby plaintiff was employed by defendant to interview prospective purchasers of office spaces in a building to be erected, to advertise the proposed building, and to otherwise interest various persons therein as defendant should direct, and to induce such prospective purchasers to interview defendant, and that defendant should pay to plaintiff 5 per cent. of the purchase price of any office which defendant might sell to persons produced by plaintiff. The paragraph of the answer so printed denies the specific contract pleaded by plaintiff, but alleges that plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal conditional contract of such employment providing that defendant should pay plaintiff 5 per cent. "on the total purchase price of any office sold by or through the efforts of plaintiff, only in the event that said office building was erected, and then only upon the moneys actually received by the defendant from purchasers furnished by plaintiff, and paid in upon the completion of sales upon said offices in said building." The paragraph of the findings printed is to the effect that no written agreement was signed by defendant authorizing or employing plaintiff as an agent or broker to sell offices in the proposed building.

The principal difference between the allegations of the amended complaint and of the answer thereto above referred to is that the allegations of the amended complaint imply and in effect allege that the agreement mentioned was in writing and signed by defendant (Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 569, 112 P. 454), and the portion of the answer above mentioned admits a contract containing stipulations substantially as pleaded by plaintiff, but alleges that the contract was in parol. The findings referred to determine the issue in favor of the defendant and find "that there was no written agreement signed by defendant authorizing or employing plaintiff as an agent or broker to sell real property, to wit, offices in the proposed Oil Exchange building, * * * with a corresponding interest in the 99-year lease" on the real property upon which it was proposed that the building should be built.

[1] Appellant complains that there were no findings upon other issues made by the pleadings. As appellant failed to print any other portions of the record, except those above referred to, we are not required to search through the typewritten transcripts to learn whether any other issues were presented by the pleadings, or, if other issues were joined, to determine whether the finding passed upon them. Dahlberg v. Dahlberg (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 290.

[2, 3] Defendant was the owner and holder of a 99-year lease upon the real property, and he proposed to cause an office building to be erected on the property by a corporation, and to sell 99-year leases of office spaces in the building, and plaintiff's employment was to assist defendant in making sales of the office leases. Defendant was not a real estate broker and had no license as such, but in his dealings with plaintiff he treated the 99-year lease and the proposition for the erection of the building as his own. Upon those facts another reason appears why appellant's contention is not well founded, viz: Our courts have repeatedly held that if a finding is made upon an issue which determines a cause, other issues become immaterial and a failure to find thereon does not constitute prejudicial error. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 14, 239 P. 332. The finding printed as above recited determines the case for the reason that "an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission, * * *" is invalid if not in writing. Section 1624, subd. 6, Civil Code. This statute has been held to apply in a case where one was employed to assist in the sale of real property by showing it to prospective purchasers and by getting them in touch with the employer, for a commission to be paid only in the event that the employer sells to a prospective purchaser so produced (Kornman v. Nelson [Cal. App.] 257 P. 150), and also where a mining expert was employed to induce a prospective buyer of a mine to consummate a purchase of the mine from the employer, the expert to be paid a commission should the sale be made by the employer (Dolan v. O'Toole, 129 Cal. 488, 62 P. 92). To the same effect, see Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 34 P. 636.

[4] There is still another reason why plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this case, and that is: She did not allege in her amended complaint that when the agreement was made and the alleged services performed she was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman. The statute (providing for the regulation, supervision and licensing of real estate brokers and salesman, approved May 27, 1919, Stats. 1919, p. 1252, § 20) provides in effect that no person engaged in this state in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or salesman shall maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of commission or compensation as such, without alleging and providing that a license was issued to such person as provided in that act.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Millie K. Jacobson against George W. Lamb and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Corbet & Selby and W. C. Sharpsteen, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Bradley L. Wallace, of San Francisco, for trustee.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover on six promissory notes aggregating the principal sum of $24,000, all signed "King & Company; J. Charles King." The first of these notes is for $3,000, dated September 7, 1922; the second for $5,000, dated September 22, 1922; the third for $3,000, dated October 25, 1922; the fourth for $5,000, dated December 29, 1922. These four notes are payable to Harry or Millie K. Jacobson. Harry Jacobson died prior to the commencement of the action, and plaintiff, his widow, acquired his interest in the notes. The fifth note is for $4,000, dated October 15, 1923, and is payable to the order of Millie K. Jacobson, and the sixth is for $4,000 dated March 31, 1923, payable to Bertha Kalisky. This last note was assigned to the plaintiff, Millie K. Jacobson, prior to the commencement of the action.

The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff and against each of the defendants, George W. Lamb and J. Charles King, individually and as copartners, doing business under the name and style of King & Co., and King & Co., a copartnership, for the face value of the notes sued upon. From the judgment entered upon such verdict this appeal is taken.

King & Co. continuously since 1906 has been a copartnership consisting of George W. Lamb and J. Charles King. The evidence discloses that defendants Lamb and King entered into a written agreement of partnership on November 1, 1906, for the purpose of conducting the business of draying under the name and style of King & Co. King was to manage the business, but had "no power to incur any indebtedness other than for current expenses." This agreement continued in force and effect until January 1, 1922, when a new agreement was entered into. This second agreement provided that King was to purchase the interest of Lamb in the copartnership for a sum therein specified payable in monthly installments. It was specifically provided that the execution of this second agreement did not dissolve the copartnership. With reference to the authority of King, it provided that he should "not contract any obligations other than those incident to the copartnership business." It further provided that King was to render to Lamb a monthly statement showing the assets and liabilities of the partnership and of all moneys received and disbursed in the conduct of the business.

The promissory notes in question were executed and delivered subsequent to the execution of the second agreement made between Lamb and King on January 1, 1922. Lamb had no knowledge of the execution of the promissory notes until March, 1924. In February, 1924, King disappeared, and after his disappearance defendant Lamb continued to conduct the business of the partnership up to and including the time of the trial of this action. At the time each of the notes in controversy was delivered to the respective payees, defendant King received a check equal to the face value of the note. Each of these checks was payable to King & Co. and indorsed by King & Co. and deposited to the credit of the copartnership in the Bank of California, the depositary of the partnership funds of King & Co., with other checks and money in the regular course of business.

[1] If King & Co. were a general partnership and the notes were executed by one of the partners in the ordinary course of business, the other partner would be bound, even though he had no knowledge of their execution. Appellant claims that the copartnership of King & Co. was not a commercial and trading partnership, but on the contrary was a noncommercial and nontrading partnership. As to this contention the question arises: Does the distinction between trading and nontrading partnerships apply in California? Appellant has cited us to numerous authorities from other jurisdictions to support this contention; however, the question seems to be one of first impression in this state since the adoption of the Codes. Our attention is directed to but two California cases recognizing this distinction, and these were decided prior to the enactment of the Code provisions, Skillman v. Lachman, 23 Cal. 199, 83 Am. Dec. 96, a mining partnership decided in 1863, and McConnell v. Denver, 35 Cal. 365, 95 Am. Dec. 107, a ditch company organized to sell water for mines, decided in 1868, and also the following reference: "It was not a trading partnership in which it is presumed that one partner has authority to bind the others in this way," —found in Los Angeles Bank v. Wallace, 101 Cal. at page 481, 36 P. 199.

[2] No case has been called to our attention involving a classification of a business similar to that conducted by defendants in this action as trading or nontrading firms. Under modern business conditions it would seem that the business of hauling freight for hire is a commercial business, but when in addition to that we find the partnership engaged in manufacturing and selling boxes for crating merchandise for export shipment, we can but conclude that such a business is a trading partnership. If this be so, then, under the authorities cited by appellant, the defendant King as the managing partner of King & Co. had implied authority to execute promissory notes on behalf of the partnership, and as plaintiff gave a valuable consideration for each of the notes herein sued upon and accepted the same as the obligation of King & Co. in good faith and without any knowledge or means of knowing that the defendant King was acting beyond the scope of his authority, the jury was justified in returning a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment must be affirmed.

The reason that there are no adjudicated cases in this state on this question is apparent. The Civil Code contains a complete statement of the rights, powers, and authority of partners between themselves. The distinction between general partnerships and mining partnerships, as laid down in Skillman v. Lachman and McConnell v. Denver, supra, is maintained in the Code. Thus sections 2511 and 2520, inclusive, of the Civil Code, have reference to mining partnerships. Section 2512 provides that an express agreement to become partners or to share the profits and losses of mining is not necessary to the formation or existence of a mining partnership. The relationship arises from the ownership of shares or interest in the mine and working the same for the purpose of extracting minerals therefrom. Section 2516 further provides that a member of a mining partnership may convey his interest in the mining business without dissolving the partnership, and section 2519 provides that no member of a mining partnership or the agent or manager thereof can, by a contract in writing, bind the partnership except by express authority derived from the members thereof.

Thus we see that the distinction between mining partners operating upon shares where one member may dispose of his interest without the consent of the other partners and without dissolving the partnership is carried into our Code. Bearing this in mind, we now turn to the sections of the Civil Code with reference to general partnerships, and it is distinctly stated in section 2424 that every partnership other than a special or mining partnership is a general partnership. With reference to the power and authority of partners of a general partnership, every general partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner, and for this purpose may bind his copartners by an agreement in writing. Section 2429, Civ. Code. In section 2430 are defined the acts which a partner has no implied authority to perform. The execution of negotiable notes is not one of the acts which a partner is by law prohibited from performing on behalf of a general partnership. Section 2431 specifically provides that even acts of a copartner in bad faith towards the other members of a partnership are nevertheless binding on the partnership, in favor of persons who have in good faith parted with value in reliance upon such acts. Section 2443 provides that the liability of general partners for each other's acts is defined by the title on agency.

Section 2319 gives an agent authority to do everything necessary or proper and usual in the ordinary course of business for effecting the purpose of his agency and to make a representation respecting any matter of fact not including the terms of his authority, but upon which his right to use his authority depends and the truth of which cannot be determined by the use of reasonable diligence on the part of the person to whom the representation is made.

[3] With the adoption of the Code in this state the distinction between trading and nontrading partnerships which has been made in other jurisdictions is unnecessary, for, with the exception of mining partnerships and special partnerships, all partnerships under the laws of the state of California fall within the same class, and the same rules governing the power and authority apply, whether the partnership is engaged in the business of buying and selling merchandise for profit or engaged in any other business.

In the case of First National Bank of Dixon v. Spangler, 49 Cal. App. 133, 192 P. 874, one of the members of a general copartnership engaged in the butcher business borrowed money from plaintiff upon three promissory notes, all of which were executed by one of the defendants, but the evidence discloses that the partner executing the note represented to plaintiff that the money was to be used for the use and benefit of the copartnership. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff. On appeal the judgment was affirmed with the following observations:

> "There is no doubt that at the time said obligations were incurred, a general partnership existed between the defendants for the transaction of said business; 'that every general partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner, and for this purpose may bind his copartnership by an agreement in writing' (section 2429, Civ. Code); if such partner acts within the apparent scope of his authority, whether he acts in good or bad faith, his acts and declarations are binding upon his copartners in favor of third persons, if said third persons believe in and rely upon his statements, and upon the strength of" such evidence "extend credit or advance money to said partner for the use and benefit of the partnership."

[4] Appellant points out that in First National Bank of Dixon v. Spangler the defendants were engaged in the butcher business and that the money for which the notes were given was to purchase cattle to slaughter and that therefore the court found the defendants were general partners. We think under the sections of the Code the defendants here, being engaged in the business of draying and box manufacturing, were general partners, and therefore the rule announced in the Spangler Case, "that every general partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business * * * and * * * if such partner acts within the apparent scope of his authority, whether he acts in good or bad faith, his acts and declarations are binding upon his copartners," has application here, as the act of defendant King in borrowing money for the purposes stated was certainly within the apparent scope of his authority. As to Los Angeles Bank v. Wallace, supra, wherein appellant quotes the court as saying, "It was not a trading partnership in which it is presumed that one partner has authority to bind the others in this way," it may be said that the sentence quoted is a mere isolated sentence and is not authority that a distinction is recognized in this state between trading and nontrading partnerships. The court clearly used that sentence to distinguish the particular arrangement between the parties in that case from a partnership which is formed for carrying on a business. Its lack of authority on the point to which it is cited is readily seen by reading the paragraph from which the sentence is taken, viz.:

> "Had the bills been drawn simply to obtain money to meet the current expenses of the adventure it may be conceded that all parties would have been liable, if Wallace had the requisite authority to draw the bills, but no such claim can here be made. The payee knew of the arrangement between the parties, and the purpose for which bills were drawn. It was not a trading partnership in which it is presumed that one partner has authority to bind the others in this way. In fact it was not contemplated by the parties that any such thing should be done. Wallace was merely to expend the funds provided by Babcock and Collins. He had no authority to incur indebtedness. Nor can his authority be increased by calling the relation a partnership. The parties fixed by contract their own rights and obligations. They did not call themselves partners. If it be essential to a partnership that one should have the power to bind all by drawing bills of exchange then this was not a partnership, for Wallace had no such power." (Italics ours.)

It appears that the arrangement between the so-called partners was not for the conduct of a business; that no one had authority to incur indebtedness; that they did not even consider themselves partners; that the payee of the note had knowledge of the arrangement. In short, the court does not even declare the arrangement a partnership, but points out that, even if it were a partnership, there was an agreement that neither party had the right to incur indebtedness and this fact was known to the payee.

In the present case the negotiations leading up to the execution of the first four notes were conducted by Harry Jacobson, husband of plaintiff, who died in July, 1923. The negotiations leading up to the execution of the last two notes were conducted by Leonard Jacobson, the son of plaintiff. Leonard Jacobson testified that his father had known the defendant King since 1907, and that the witness had a conversation with the defendant King during the late summer or early fall of 1922. King stated to him that he was in need of funds for the business of King & Co., due to the fact that they were expanding and that they had a lot of freight to pay which they had to advance before they could take delivery of the merchandise and a few weeks intervened before they could make collections from their customers. The witness told King that he did not personally have any funds which he could lend him, but suggested that his father had some money on hand which he might be willing to lend him. Defendant King then communicated with the elder Jacobson, who agreed to advance $16,000. This money was advanced to King between September 7, 1922, and December 29, 1922, and is represented by four of the promissory notes. About March 31, 1923, defendant King again spoke to the witness about another loan and stated that he was pressed for money; that it was a question of expansion and he had to have funds, and asked the witness if he could arrange for more money. After consulting with his father by wire, as the latter was then in the East, he arranged a loan of $4,000 which was obtained from his grandmother, Bertha Kalisky, and a note therefor was executed. In October, 1923, defendant King again stated to the witness that he needed more money, and the witness arranged for a loan in the sum of $4,000.

At the time the last two notes were executed the witness was an employee of King & Co. The witness testified that the defendant King was in active charge of the business during the time of his employment. He met the defendant Lamb occasionally, but Lamb never gave any instructions to any of the employees of the company to his knowledge.

The business conducted by King & Co. was primarily that of draying. The witness Jacobson testified that, in addition to the drayage business, King & Co. conducted a boxing plant. He testified:

> "I know that they manufactured boxes for crating automobiles for persons other than drayage customers. * * * We boxed a lot of automobiles for the General Motors, for the Chevrolet, and for the Ford. * * * We did not always do the drayage. * * * I went to the boxing plant at least once a month."

Defendant Lamb also testified, with reference to the boxing plant conducted by King & Co., as follows:

> "In addition to draying we manufactured boxes for the purpose of crating automobiles and other merchandise for exporting. That part of the business was carried on at Ninth and Bryant streets, * * * and I think that the rent of the place where we manufactured the boxes was about $400 a month."

It will thus be seen that the partnership was engaged in the business of manufacturing boxes for crating automobiles and other merchandise for export; and that this portion of the business was not inconsequential is evidenced by the fact that the rental of the premises where the boxing plant was operated amounted to $400 a month.

[5] There is substantial evidence in the record from which the jury could have determined, and evidently did determine, that it was within the ordinary and usual course of the conduct of the business of King & Co. to borrow money and execute promissory notes. The following testimony amply supports the verdict of the jury. Defendant Lamb testified that some of the accounts of King & Co. were pretty large and involved advancing money for freight; that all draymen have to advance freight; that when a large shipment comes in it runs into considerable money; that he had no idea how much on an average the business had to advance for freight while defendant King was in charge of the business; that he knew that defendant King represented that the firm had to advance large amounts for freight. He also testified that the business borrowed money from the Bank of California. One of the purposes of borrowing money from this source was for the purchase of the season's supply of hay at a time when the market was right, and that the defendant King attended to the selection and purchasing of the hay. During the early history of the business defendant Lamb had considerable to do with purchasing of equipment, but as time went on he trusted King more and became less active. Elmer G. Grove, bookkeeper of King & Co., testified that there was an account on the books of King & Co. entitled "Notes Payable." On January 1, 1922, there appeared upon the books of the company in this account an aggregate of $10,000, representing notes on the firm for moneys borrowed as follows: To the Bank of California, $5,000; to the Canton Bank, $2,500; and to the South End Warehouse Company, $2,500. The witness then testified from the books and records of the company that the total indebtedness evidenced by promissory notes aggregated at all times at least the sum of $10,000, and that for a very considerable period of time was in excess of $20,000, the highest amount as disclosed by the books being $28,000 on the 1st of January, 1924. Other firms from whom defendant borrowed money and executed promissory notes as disclosed by the books and records of the company during the period when King was borrowing money from plaintiff were International Harvester Company and the Bank of Italy. All of the obligations shown by the books of the company were paid in the regular course of business, some during the time that defendant King was in charge of the business and some by defendant Lamb after the disappearance of King in February, 1924.

[6] It seems that the nature of the business of King & Co. fairly and reasonably implies borrowing of money to accommodate its necessities and convenience whenever the occasion occurs. In Chumbley v. Courtney, 181 Iowa, 482, 164 N. W. 945, which was an action involving the liability of a purported partnership as well as the individual members thereof on a promissory note executed in the name of the partnership by one of the alleged partners, the Supreme Court of Iowa says:

> "The error in each was in assuming that a partner in a nontrading partnership could only be bound by the act of the other in executing a promissory note by attaching the firm name thereto where he has an express order of the other partner so to do. On the contrary, such authority may be implied from the circumstances proven, and in this case the jury might have found from the circumstances proven that, in signing the note, Courtney was authorized by O'Donnell to use the firm name."

It would seem, therefore, on the facts here, even if the distinction between trading and nontrading partnerships were recognized in this state the same result would obtain.

There is another point presented, and that is: Was express authority conferred upon defendant King? Counsel for appellant in their brief and argument filed assume that no express authority to borrow money and to execute notes on behalf of the partnership as evidence of such indebtedness was so conferred. They state that King had no power to incur any indebtedness other than for current expenses. It is true that under the original articles of copartnership, which were executed on November 1, 1906, defendant King was to manage the business subject to the approval of defendant Lamb, and was to incur no indebtedness other than for current expenses. However, on January 1, 1922, a new agreement was entered into by the terms of which it was agreed that defendant King was to purchase the interest of defendant Lamb for a specified sum, and in which agreement it was specifically stated that it was not to dissolve the copartnership, and provided that defendant King had the right to contract obligations incident to the copartnership business, defendant King agreeing to hold defendant Lamb harmless for any debts incurred by the copartnership prior to its dissolution.

Appellant urges that the court erred "in not sustaining the objections of defendants Lamb and King & Co. to the introduction of evidence of the acts and declarations of defendant King until after proof by plaintiff that King had authority to bind the partnership, his authority being specifically denied in the answer," and "in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the offering made by the same defendants to prove and show by the books of King & Co. that the moneys placed to the personal credit of defendant King were withdrawn for his personal use, and were not used in the business of King & Co."

[7] The first objection goes merely to the order of proof, which must be regulated by the sound discretion of the trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 2042; Estate of McNamara, 181 Cal. 82, 183 P. 552; More v. Finger, 128 Cal. 313, 60 P. 933), and such discretion will not be interfered with by a reviewing court unless it has been abused to the substantial detriment of the party complaining (Bates v. Tower, 103 Cal. 404, 37 P. 385; Smeland v. Renwick, 50 Cal. App. 565, 196 P. 283).

[8] As to the second objection, that the court erred in sustaining the objection of plaintiff to a question asked the witness Elmer G. Grove, the cashier and accountant of King & Co., the record shows the following: "Q. You have stated that certain checks were placed to the personal credit of the defendant King; just state what that record was?"—to which objection was made. Thereupon the defendants Lamb and King & Co. stated to the court that if the witness were permitted to answer the question he would testify that the personal account of the defendant King was kept by the witness by direction of King, and that the items concerning which the witness has testified as having been entered to the personal credit of the defendant King were entered by the witness in that account by direction of defendant King to be charged to him personally, and that all of the sums so charged to defendant King were drawn by the defendant for his own personal use, and that none of it was in the partnership business. The court sustained the objection. We cannot see how appellant was prejudiced by the court's sustaining this objection. The money received by defendant King from respondent and her assignor was deposited in the account of King & Co. in the Bank of California along with other moneys received by the partnership in the ordinary course of business. It is conceded that authority was conferred upon King by his copartner Lamb to draw on the partnership funds at all times. Assuming that the books of the partnership disclosed that upon the same day certain of these deposits were made, defendant King's personal account was credited with an equivalent amount and that at the time of his disappearance King had overdrawn his personal account, it would in no way indicate that the partnership did not receive the benefit of the money obtained from respondent and deposited in its account. Whether defendant King misappropriated funds of the partnership or overdrew his account was no concern of respondent, nor can she be bound by the entries made in the books of King & Co., of which she had no knowledge or over which she had no control.

[9] Appellant claims error committed by the court in giving certain instructions, as follows: In instruction XV, "that King in dealing with third persons, such as the plaintiff in the action, acted as the agent of King & Co. and also George W. Lamb, his partner." This instruction is claimed erroneous in that it failed to point out that such agency could only exist when King was acting within the scope of the business of King & Co. Instruction XVI, "that King as a general partner represented King & Co. and Lamb the other partner in all his dealings with third persons." Appellant here complains that the instruction should have limited such agency to those dealings necessary or proper and usual in the ordinary course of business of King & Co. Instruction XVIII, in not limiting the agency to acting within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority instead of apparent scope of his authority. This objection may be answered in the language of the court in First National Bank of Dixon v. Spangler, supra: "If such partner acts within the apparent scope of his authority, whether he acts in good or bad faith, his acts and declarations are binding upon his copartners in favor of third persons." Instruction XIX is claimed to be misleading in stating "actual authority is such as a principal intentionally or by want of ordinary care allows an agent to believe himself to possess." Instruction XX is also claimed to be misleading in stating "to effect the purpose of his principal," instead of making use of the language of section 2319 of the Civil Code, "for effecting the purpose of his agency"; and instruction XXII, "A general partner represents a partnership and his other general partners for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority." Civ. Code, § 2330. This is claimed erroneous in failing to call attention to or limit such application to the requirements of section 2429 of the Civil Code "in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner."

Elsewhere in its instructions the court instructed the jury:

"One general partner is deemed to be the agent of the other general partners and each is liable for the acts of the other within the scope of his authority. * * * An agency is either actual or ostensible when the principal intentionally or by want of ordinary care causes third persons to believe another his agent who is not really employed by him. * * * If you find that J. Charles King in executing the promissory note which is the subject-matter of this action in the name of King & Co. acted within the apparent scope of his authority, whether he acted in good or bad faith, his acts and declarations are binding upon his copartner in favor of plaintiff herein, if the said plaintiff believed in and relied upon his statements as to the purpose for which said promissory notes were executed, and upon the strength of said confidence agreed to advance money to the said J. Charles King for the use and benefit of the partnership of King & Co."

[10, 11] Appellant's principal objection to the instructions is not so much that they do not contain correct statements of the law, but that certain additions should have been made to limit the application of the principles involved. Taking the charge as a whole, the instructions cover the principles of law necessary to the jury's understanding of the issues and contain the limitations claimed to be omitted in the instructions complained of. Furthermore, appellant did not propose any instructions for submission to the jury. If appellant desired any particular instructions given which he deemed were necessary to a correct understanding by the jury of his theory of the case, it was his privilege and duty to request them, and he cannot now complain of the failure of the court to give instructions which it was his right to prepare and propose to the court for submission to the jury.

PEOPLE v. BRATTINGHAM. (Cr. 1584.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1023(12)—Order made after judgment is not appealable, where court is merely asked to repeat or overrule former ruling on same facts (Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3).

An order made after judgment is not appealable, under Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3, where motion merely asks court to repeat or overrule former ruling on same facts.

2. Criminal law 🔑1023(12)—Order made after judgment is not appealable where appeal from judgment presents same question.

Appellate court will not entertain an appeal from an order made after judgment, where appeal from judgment would present precisely same question and in every way afford protection to rights of defendant.

3. Criminal law 🔑1023(12)—Appeal from order refusing to modify judgment by striking provision for additional sentence on nonpayment of fine must be dismissed, where appeal from judgment would involve determination of alleged error (Motor Vehicle Act, § 141).

Where appeal from judgment sentencing defendant, for violating the Motor Vehicle Act, § 141 (St. 1923, p. 562), to county jail, and in addition imposing fine and, on default in payment, providing for imprisonment of one day for each $2 of fine not paid, would contain everything necessary to determine alleged error in imposing additional sentence on default in paying fine, appeal from order refusing to modify judgment by striking provision for additional sentence would, in effect, allow two appeals and must be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

A. J. Brattingham was convicted of violating the Motor Vehicle Act. From and order, denying defendant's motion for a modification of the judgment, defendant appeals. On motion by the People of the State of California to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion of the defendant for modification of the judgment heretofore made and entered. The judgment in question is one after verdict of guilty of the charge contained in the information accusing the defendant of a violation of section 141 of the California Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 562). The judgment was:

> "* * * It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Alfred J. Brattingham be punished by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles for the term of 1 year; in addition, defendant shall pay a fine of $1000.00; or defaulting in said payment, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of said fine not paid."

This was done on July 29, 1927, and the defendant was at once remanded to the custody of the sheriff. On October 1, 1927, the defendant served notice that on October 7, 1927, he would move the superior court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the following:

> "Or defaulting in said payment, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles, at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of said fine not paid."

It is claimed that the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce that part of the sentence sought to be stricken out. The motion was denied, and the defendant appeals. The people have moved to dismiss the appeal.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that an appeal is authorized by subdivision 3 of section 1237 of the Penal Code, which provides that an appeal may be taken from an order after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the defendant. It is also said that the court has inherent power at any time to vacate a void judgment. Generally this is true, but the rule is well established that an order made after judgment is not appealable where the motion merely asks the court to repeat or overrule the former ruling on the same facts. As said in De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 P. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165, this is so because to permit such an appeal "would be virtually allowing two appeals from the same ruling, and would, in some cases, have the effect of extending the time for appealing contrary to the intent of the statute." To the same effect are Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 P. 527, Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 565, 79 P. 171, and other cases.

A number of decisions cited by appellant hold that the trial court has jurisdiction to vacate or modify a void judgment, but they do not mention the question here presented; namely, Will an appellate court entertain an appeal from an order made after judgment, where the appeal from the judgment would present precisely the same question and in every way afford protection to the rights of the defendant? The authorities sustain the contention of the people upon this issue.

[3] Applying the rule to the record before us, it is apparent that upon an appeal from the judgment alone the judgment roll would contain everything necessary to a determination of the contention of the appellant, and to consider the appeal from the order refusing to modify the judgment would have the effect of allowing the right to two appeals.

It is ordered that the appeal be dismissed.

REDDING v. PETTY. (Civ. 5373.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1928.

1. Compromise and settlement ⇨23(3)—Evidence held not to show settlement by part payment.

In action by broker against employer to recover remainder of commission for helping negotiate sale of land, evidence that subsequent agreement between parties was only for part payment of sum due and was not in full settlement as contended by defendant held to support judgment for plaintiff.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence held binding on appeal.

Findings of trial court, made on conflicting evidence, are binding on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by A. E. Redding against G. M. Petty, doing business as the G. M. Petty Realty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bearman & Engelhardt and Marcus C. Clark, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. [1, 2] Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that there became due him from defendant the sum of $1,000 for services rendered at the special instance and request of defendant and that only $600 had been paid. Judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $400, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Defendant now contends that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings.

The evidence was fragmentary, and the witnesses did not clearly explain the transaction. A careful reading of the record discloses that plaintiff testified, in substance, that he was employed as a real estate salesman by defendant, who held a broker's license; that defendant held an option on a 20-acre tract of land and agreed to give plaintiff a certain commission for negotiating its sale; that plaintiff and one Brown were attempting to make a sale to one La Tow, but encountered difficulties in completing the transaction, and thereupon each agreed with the defendant that defendant should assist in consummating the sale and that they would reduce their commission so that plaintiff, Brown, and defendant should each receive $1,000 of the total commission of $3,000; that defendant completed the sale and received in cash as part of his commission the sum of $300; that defendant at once gave $100 to plaintiff and $100 to Brown; that after the sale was made to La Tow defendant was about to go to Kentucky and plaintiff was in need of money; that thereupon, after some argument between the parties, defendant gave plaintiff a check for $500, and plaintiff signed a receipt which was written on a form commonly used in acknowledging receipts of deposits in real estate purchases, certain of the words being crossed out. As finally signed the receipt was as follows:

"Received of G. M. Petty the sum of $500 Dollars As commission in full until 5 lots is sold on frontage in Tract 6812 Goodyear Heights than $400 is to be payed 20% now Frontage means San Pedro St."

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Defendant testified that the total commission received for the sale of the 20-acre tract included certain lots beside the $300 received in cash; that he, plaintiff, and Brown were to each sell a certain number of these lots; that when he made the $500 payment to plaintiff it was understood to be in full settlement and that plaintiff should receive the regular commission for any lot that he might thereafter sell; that plaintiff did in fact sell one lot for $2,500 and received a commission of $125 therefor; that defendant himself sold the other lots. Plaintiff denied that he ever agreed to take his commission "in lots." The testimony of defendant was in contradiction of the terms of the receipt accepted by him when he paid $500 to plaintiff. By the terms of this receipt plaintiff was to receive $400 additional when five lots should be sold. Both parties testified that all of the lots were in fact sold. The findings of the trial court, made upon conflicting evidence, are sustained, and we are bound thereby.

C. C. MOORE & CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5996.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑419—Industrial Accident Commission could at any time within 245 weeks alter findings and award without showing of increased disability (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20(d).

The Industrial Accident Commission could, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20(d), St. 1917, p. 850, at any time within 245 weeks alter its findings and award relative to employee's injury without a showing of any increased disability, and regardless of the question of prior awards having been final so as to make matter res judicata.

2. Master and servant 🔑385(1)—As between temporary and permanent disability for same condition, employee held entitled to award for greater of the two.

Where the Industrial Accident Commission found both temporary and permanent disability, the employee was entitled, as between the two awards, to the greater.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Alfred Gustafson, employee, opposed by the C. C. Moore Company, employer, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, insurer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, employer and insurer apply for certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Gustafson.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It appears from the petition that respondent Alfred Gustafson was injured while in the employ of petitioner C. C. Moore & Co. He fell a distance of about eight feet and fractured his right oscalis, commonly called the heel bone. Compensation was assumed and paid by petitioners and medical attention was furnished. A dispute arose over the propriety of certain medical attention and over the period of disability. Gustafson then filed an application for adjustment of claim before the commission, in which he sought a permanent injury rating. Petitioners herein contested the claim, alleging that Gustafson had neglected, refused, and failed to continue his medical treatments and had likewise failed to take up some light work, which would reduce his disability. On January 27, 1925, the commission made its findings and award, allowing total compensation from September 20, 1923, to December 5, 1924, and partial disability from and after December 5, 1924. Further medical treatment was ordered to be given, which was tendered by petitioners. Gustafson became dissatisfied with the award, and on February 27, 1925, filed a petition for a rehearing, claiming that he had been totally disabled since his injury. The petition was granted. Further hearings were had, and on May 28, 1925, the commission made its decision, after rehearing, by which it rescinded the previous findings and award and found that the right ankle joint had received a permanent injury in the nature of stiffness and pain, which entitled Gustafson to an award of 26¼ per cent. of total disability, amounting to 105 weeks' compensation in a total sum of $2,187.15. This award became final 20 days thereafter and was paid. It extended to about October 1, 1925. Thereafter Gustafson returned to work, and in January, 1926, he had an attack of weeping eczema. In February, 1926, he filed a petition claiming new and further disability. After hearing the commission made its "Order Amending Findings and Award." In this order the commission rescinded the previous orders and allowed total disability from September 20, 1923, to and including May 31, 1925; partial disability from May 31, 1925, to and including January 22, 1926. It further found the eczema to be compensable, and allowed temporary total disability from and after January 22, 1926, and ordered further medical treatment. A petition for rehearing was filed by petitioners herein on May 28, 1926, in which it was set forth that the commission acted without and in excess of its powers in that the question of the permanency of the bone condition and the need for medical attention had been previously considered, and that there was no change in condition that would justify any alteration in the award; that the medical reports showed without conflict that the eczema was not due to the injury and that the commission should not therefore have allowed any compensation for it. It was also claimed that the case was not one coming within the continuing jurisdiction of the commission, in that the only question that had been compensable was the injured ankle, which had been fully adjudicated in the award of May 28, 1925. On June 21, 1926, the petition for a rehearing was granted. On September following the commission rendered its decision, after rehearing, in which it found that the temporary disability did not exceed the period of permanent disability, viz., 105 weeks; that the illness of January 22, 1926, was not a new and further disability caused by the injury; and "that the disability caused by the injury herein does not require further surgical or medical treatment; that the disability resulting from the injury is at this time the same as heretofore found herein by the decision made and filed herein on May 28, 1925." In accordance therewith the commission annulled the order of May 20, 1926, and reaffirmed the order of May 28, 1925. Gustafson filed a petition for rehearing, which was denied October 20, 1926, and the decision after rehearing of September 20, 1926, became final.

On March 17, 1927, Gustafson filed a petition for "Supplemental Award of Medical and Hospital Expenses and Disability Compensation." In this petition it was set forth that he had, on his own initiative, on November 4, 1926, been operated upon and a fixation done to his ankle. It was claimed that this was a new and further disability for which temporary disability compensation should be granted, and that the operation was a new development that justified the reopening of the cause and the granting of the medical expenses. Petitioners herein filed an answer to this petition and set forth that the matter had become res judicata; that the applicant had waited for over a year and had received all the benefits of a permanent injury rating for his condition; and that he could not therefore claim further temporary compensation after having been paid for the condition as a permanent injury. On June 22, 1927, the commission made an order amending findings and award, in which the previous findings and award were rescinded and vacated and compensation was ordered payable for temporary total disability from September 20, 1923, to May 31, 1925, and partial temporary disability from May 31, 1925, to February 1, 1926, a total compensation of $2,187.15. It further found that there was a temporary total disability beginning November 4, 1926, to and including March 14, 1927 (18 4/7 weeks), in an amount of $386.84; that the temporary disability exceeded the permanent disability, and the employee was entitled to the greater amount; that the operation of arthrodesis of the ankle established that said operation was necessary to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury; and that the operation constituted a change in the disability that permitted the commission to take jurisdiction of a new and further disability. The medical expense for the operation was also allowed, the exact amount to be ascertained at a later hearing. The award was for a total of $2,573.99 for disability as against the previous disability rating of $2,187.15. Gustafson filed a petition for a rehearing, claiming that he was entitled to a continuing temporary total disability from the date of the accident. Petitioners herein also filed a petition for a rehearing, claiming that the decision of May 28, 1925, fixing a condition of permanent disability of 26¼ per cent., had become final; that there was never any change in applicant's condition or subsequent thereto and the adjudication had therefore become res adjudicata as to both parties; that the later decision upon rehearing entered September 28, 1926, reaffirmed this previous final award and found specifically that the injury did not require further medical treatment and that this award also became final and binding upon the parties. On August 2, 1927, the commission entered an order denying a rehearing to each party.

[1] It is here claimed in support of the present petition that the commission in rendering said decision upon rehearing and in entering said award against petitioners acted without and in excess of its powers, as the evidence shows without conflict that the condition in ankle did not change after May 28, 1925, at which time it was held that medical attention was not indicated and that the condition was a permanent one; that this adjudication became final and it was reaffirmed on September 20, 1926, which decision also became final; that it was specifically found in the latter decision that no further medical or surgical aid should be given, and that there had been no change in the condition of the applicant's foot; that the entire issue therefore had become res adjudicata. Since the filing of this petition our Supreme Court has had occasion to construe section 20 (d) of the act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 850), enlarging the continuing jurisdiction of the commission beyond that which had obtained under the Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 279). In the case of Bartlett Hayward Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 195, it is held that the Legislature by the enactment of section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 enlarged the continuing jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission beyond that which had obtained under the act of 1913, so as to embrace the power of the commission to rescind, alter, or amend its orders, decisions, and awards within the period of 245 weeks upon good cause appearing, without the necessity of any showing that the applicant's disability had recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated. The decision is here controlling.

[2] Further objection is made to the award because of the fact that the commission has awarded the applicant both permanent and temporary disability for the same condition. As between temporary and permanent disability the applicant was entitled to the greater of the two, and this is all he has been awarded. National E. Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 422, 225 P. 2. The award is affirmed.

KELLER v. LILE et al. (Civ. 5803.)

1. Replevin 🔑72—Evidence held to sustain finding that stock certificate transferred by plaintiff to defendant was in payment for defendant's services, in action to recover possession thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 509 et seq.).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. § 509 et seq., to recover possession of stock certificate claimed to have been transferred to defendant to sell on behalf of corporation, evidence held to sustain finding that stock was issued in consideration of services rendered by defendant in making survey on claims of the mining company, and that plaintiff was therefore not entitled to recover it.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Findings of trial court supported by evidence are conclusive, though based largely on depositions.

Fact that all of evidence, or nearly all of it, introduced in trial court, was in form of depositions, held not to alter rule that findings of trial court are conclusive if supported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by Kent E. Keller against Richard Lile and others, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of A. C. Wagy & Co. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Schaefer, Jr., and Raymond V. Haun, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, the owner of a number of mining claims in the state of Arizona, transferred the claims to the White Hills Mining Company, a corporation of which he was manager, and received about 750,000 shares of the stock of the corporation in exchange therefor. This stock was placed in escrow under permits from the corporation commissioners of California and Arizona, by which he was authorized to sell the stock to the public. The record does not disclose the terms of the escrow nor of the permits under which plaintiff was authorized to sell. Defendant Lile and one Colton were college students making a survey upon the claims of the company. A question arose as to whether Lile and Colton would remain at work until the survey was completed, and plaintiff promised them each a bonus if they would stay with the work until its completion. The survey was completed and Lile left Arizona. Thereafter a certificate representing 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the company was mailed by plaintiff to Lile. A similar certificate was mailed to Colton. Lile caused the certificate to be delivered to defendant Wagy to be sold. The stock delivered to Lile was treasury stock of the company, but after it was mailed to Lile plaintiff paid the company for it in cash. Plaintiff commenced this action to recover possession of the stock certificate, which was seized by the sheriff and thereafter delivered into the possession of the plaintiff by virtue of the provisions of sections 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court found that Lile was the owner and entitled to the possession of the stock certificate, and rendered judgment for its return to Lile and for damages occasioned by plaintiff's action in having it seized.

[1] The record discloses a sharp conflict between the testimony of Keller and that of Lile. While Keller did not deny that a bonus had been promised to Lile, he testified that the stock in question had been mailed to Lile for the sole purpose of enabling Lile to sell it on behalf of the corporation, for which Lile was to receive a commission of 20 per cent. of the selling price. Lile, on the other hand, testified that the stock had been sent to him in accordance with the previous agreement with Keller whereby he was to receive a bonus for services rendered. He stated that Keller had promised him at least 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the company as a bonus if he would complete the survey and that the same promise had been made to Colton; that Keller had said that he "had enough personal stock to take care of us all." He further testified: "Q. Well, he indicated to you that any stock he would give you from his personal stock, didn't he? A.

No; he didn't indicate that, other than my statement." The trial court found that the stock was issued to Lile "in consideration of services rendered * * * in surveying and mapping properties of White Hills Mining Company." The court also found that the stock was not "issued for the purpose of having Richard Lile make a sale of said stock and return the proceeds thereof to plaintiff, less a 20 per cent. commission." The findings are sustained by the evidence. Plaintiff promised 5,000 shares to Lile and, in keeping with his promise, he caused that number of shares to be issued and delivered. The fact that the stock was, at the time of its issue, treasury stock, cannot alter the situation, since plaintiff subsequently made payment for it to the corporation. Even if it be held that plaintiff had agreed to deliver only his "personal" stock, he would not be in position to complain, for he now asserts that the stock delivered is in fact his personal stock.

[2] All of the evidence was in the form of depositions, except the testimony of plaintiff, who appeared in person at the trial. Appellant now argues that the reviewing court has the same opportunity to weigh the evidence as had the trial court, and therefore the general rule that the findings of the trial court are binding should not prevail. The fact that most, or even all, of the evidence, may be in the form of depositions, does not alter the rule referred to. The findings of the trial court must control if supported by the evidence. There being ample evidence to sustain the findings, the judgment is affirmed.

MONROE v. SWITZER et al. (Civ. 5125.)

1. Automobiles ⚷244(10)—Plaintiff's evidence held to make out case of truck driver's negligence in making left turn at intersection, requiring trial on merits (Motor Vehicle Act, § 129).

In action for damages growing out of collision between plaintiff's automobile driven by his daughter and defendant's motortruck when latter made a left turn at intersection in violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 129 (St. 1923, p. 558), plaintiff's evidence held sufficient to make out case of truck driver's negligence proximately causing accident requiring trial on merits, and court erred in dismissing case at end of plaintiff's evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Appellate courts will not disturb finding where there is more than inconsequential conflict in evidence.

Appellate courts will not disturb a finding where there is more than an inconsequential conflict in the evidence.

3. Negligence ⚷136(8, 10)—On conflicting evidence negligence is question for jury, but if evidence is undisputed and only one reasonable conclusion can be drawn, it is for court.

When evidence is conflicting, question of negligence is for jury to determine under proper instructions, but where facts are undisputed and only one reasonable conclusion can be drawn, question is one of law for the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Lewis A. Monroe against J. Gordon Switzer, the Pauley Oil Company, and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chauncey Gardner, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George L. Greer and George W. Seith, both of Los Angeles (Louis P. Pink, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This case arose from a collision between a truck driven by the defendant Switzer and owned by the defendant Pauley Oil Company, a corporation, and plaintiff's Studebaker automobile. Dismissal was entered as against all of the defendants except Pauley Oil Company. The action was tried by the court without a jury and judgment rendered that plaintiff take nothing and that the defendant corporation recover its costs.

[1] The facts are as follows: The truck was traveling easterly on Whittier boulevard, a thoroughfare of Los Angeles county, while the Studebaker, a passenger car, was proceeding in the opposite direction upon the same road. The machines collided west of the westerly line of Guirado road, an intersecting street, and north of the northerly line of the traveled thoroughfare. Both cars nosed together northerly and cut 3 or 4 feet into the porch of a small grocery store at a point 19 feet west of the westerly pavement line of the intersecting street and 21 feet north of the northerly pavement line of the thoroughfare. There was testimony that the automobile was traveling 12 or 14 miles per hour and the truck between 20 and 25 miles per hour, and that the truck driver gave a signal for a left-hand turn. There was testimony also that the truck was on its left side of the street when about 60 feet from the intersection, and that it left the paved portion of the thoroughfare about 20 feet from the west line of Guiardo road and continued northerly to the point of collision a few feet from the store porch, into which both machines ploughed.

The conclusion is compelling that the driver of the truck was "cutting the corner," or, to quote from a statement made from the bench by the trial judge:

"The truck, as far as the evidence shows—and of course for the purpose of a nonsuit it must be taken as strongly as possible for the plaintiff—the evidence shows that the truck turned before it reached the intersection; that it, to use the ordinary expression, cut the corner, in other words, had not come to or passed beyond the point where the button would have been had there been a button indicating the center of the intersection; in other words, the truck turned and cut the corner and got off the highway altogether."

One witness, driving his own car, testified as follows:

"But my attention was drawn to him [the truck driver] by the fact that he seemed to be quite a considerable distance this [the westerly] side of the intersection, and I was naturally curious to know what he was doing; and when I saw him, as it were, heading for the building, then I looked again, and it occurred to me at that time he was in the middle of the road, that his truck was in trouble; it looked as though he was having trouble with his truck; then my attention was drawn to my own car. I wanted to get past."

Another witness testified:

"Q. Was the truck on the north side of Whittier boulevard when you first noticed it? A. He was coming on the Camino Real, the Real Road, in front of the pool room.

"Q. Was he upon the north or south side of the road? A. To the north. He was leaning to the north, to the left.

"Q. He was, then, driving east on the wrong side of the road, the left-hand side of the road; is that right? A. He was coming wrong then. He was out of his route.

"Q. He was out of his route? About how far back was that from the intersection of Guirado road? A. Oh, more than 60 feet.

"Q. When did you first see the Studebaker automobile? A. Precisely I saw it—I was sitting in front of the porch just out, and I saw the Studebaker and I concluded she was going to pass, and in getting to the store the truck driver made a quick movement and that caused a collision—that is what occasioned the accident or the collision."

On cross-examination, the same witness testified:

"A. I could see the driver [of the truck], yet, at the wheel, I certainly did.

"Q. Did he have both hands on the wheel or was he fooling with the gears? A. No, he was working with the wheel, as near as I can remember."

An eyewitness to the collision testified:

"Q. And then she [the driver of the Studebaker] turned northwest so as to land up in front of the store at the time that she and the truck collided? A. Yes. She went off the road into the dirt."

The driver of the Studebaker testified that she was rendered unconscious by the collision and did not recover for about two weeks, and does not remember anything regarding the accident. There was testimony from other witnesses, no part of which is inconsistent with that above quoted or referred to. Defendant offered no evidence.

The trial court found in paragraph II of its findings:

"That the same [the truck] was neither carelessly or negligently operated * * * or [operated] in such a manner as to cause said truck to collide with plaintiff's automobile or to damage the same."

And in paragraph III:

"That neither the carelessness or negligence of the defendant corporation was the proximate cause of the collision or the damage suffered by plaintiff."

The evidence as it stands shows the truck to have been traveling westerly at about 20 miles per hour, and then, with a turn to the left, heading practically at right angles to the road, straight at the front of the store. It places the Studebaker car on its own right and proper side of the road, traveling at a lawful speed and turning to the right off the road. There is no word of criticism with the operation of the Studebaker, and the court finds that it was operated without negligence. As the evidence stands, no reasonable construction thereof could produce any other conclusion than that the collision would not have occurred except for the turning of the truck in this unusual manner and place, and unless there is something to excuse these acts—which as it appears from the testimony amounted to gross carelessness and a violation of section 129 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558) as well—there is no evidence supporting that part of findings Nos. II and III above quoted.

Upon the plaintiff's resting, counsel for defendant made a motion for nonsuit, whereupon the trial judge made an extended statement which closed with the following:

"Now, I will say very frankly that while I am to some extent in doubt upon a motion for a nonsuit, yet if the defendant were to simply rest the case on the evidence now before the court, I would have to find for the defendant, solely because the plaintiff has not shown any negligence."

Counsel for respondent apparently "took the hint" from these remarks that he need not put on any testimony in order to win the case, and rested without offering any.

[2, 3] In our opinion, there is no escaping the conclusion that the evidence referred to established negligence. While we are cognizant of the rule that Courts of Appeal will not disturb a finding where there is more than an inconsequential conflict, a thorough review of the evidence convinces us that no such conflict exists in this case, and that the entire circumstance points with certainty and unavoidably to the fact that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident. "When evidence is conflicting, the question of * * * negligence * * * is one for the jury to determine under proper instructions from the court; but where the facts are undisputed, and the dictates of common prudence point to only one reasonable conclusion, the question is then one of law for the court." Smith v. Associated Oil Co., 53 Cal. App. 143, 199 P. 880. We think there should be a new trial and that the issues of negligence and contributory negligence, as well as all other issues raised by the pleadings, should be considered and determined.

WORKS, P. J. I concur in all that is said in the foregoing opinion and in the conclusion reached by it, but I think the conduct of the trial judge, as shown by his remarks in dealing with the motion for a nonsuit, should not pass unnoticed. As he felt a doubt upon the question as to the disposition of the motion, he should have denied it. Bush v. Weed Lumber Co., 55 Cal. App. 588, 204 P. 24. Instead of taking that course, however, he invited respondent to rest its case upon the evidence presented by appellant so that he might weigh what he considered to be conflicting evidence, a thing he could not do in considering the motion. Counsel quite naturally accepted this unusual invitation and withdrew the motion, with the result that, while a serious accident had occurred, a young woman had been badly injured, an automobile had been demolished, the plaintiff in an action to recover for the loss of the car was in moral effect denied a trial on the merits. He was also denied compensation for an admitted loss, one for which it was decided that his daughter, the driver of the car, was not responsible, a strange outcome, indeed.

In disposing of cases upon appeal it is usually necessary for courts of review to suffer in silence over exhibitions of the idiosyncracies of some trial judges, but in the interests of justice it seems proper that silence be broken in the present instance. We should take the time and the space necessary to condemn this novel method of making disposition of attempts to procure justice at the hands of the courts.

I concur: THOMPSON, J.

91 Cal. App. 428

CALDWELL et al. v. RICHARDS et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Conflict in evidence must be resolved in favor of trial court's findings.

On appeal, conflict in evidence must be resolved in favor of the findings of the trial court.

2. Partnership 🔑20—Pledge by defendants of their credit to enable plaintiffs to secure loan for purpose of assisting promoter held not to have constituted "partnership" transaction (Civ. Code, § 2395).

Where defendants, in signing promissory note payable to plaintiffs, merely pledged their credit to enable plaintiffs to secure a loan for purpose of assisting promoter in building a factory, held that transaction did not constitute a "partnership" within Civ. Code, § 2395.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Partnership.]

3. Joint adventures 🔑4(2)—Partnership 🔑84—Either partner or joint adventurer may, on proper showing, claim contribution (Civ Code, §§ 1432, 2412).

Since either a partner or a joint adventurer may, under Civ. Code, §§ 1432 and 2412, on a proper showing, be entitled to contribution it was immaterial whether evidence in action on promissory note, wherein plaintiffs claimed contribution, established a partnership or a joint adventure.

4. Joint adventures 🔑4(2)—Plaintiffs held not entitled to contribution for loss of money loaned to promoter, on theory of joint adventure, where loss was result of unwarranted actions of plaintiffs.

Where defendants signed promissory note, payable to plaintiffs, to enable plaintiffs to secure loan for purpose of assisting promoter in building factory, held that plaintiffs were not entitled to contribution on loss of such loan on theory of joint adventure, where money was to have been disbursed by plaintiffs on certain conditions and with certain safeguards, but none of them was followed by plaintiffs.

5. Joint adventures 🔑4(2)—That one of plaintiffs, seeking contribution on theory of joint adventure, did not sign note executed to obtain loan until later, held not to entitle him to recover.

In action for contribution on theory of joint adventure on promissory note executed by defendants to plaintiffs to enable latter to secure loan for purpose of assisting promoter in building a factory, fact that one of plaintiffs did not sign note payable to bank which loaned money until after it had been signed by other plaintiffs, and after money had been paid, did not entitle such plaintiff to recover, where such plaintiff attended meetings, and knew of agreement for loan of money.

6. Trial 🔑62(1)—Sustaining objection to testimony in rebuttal of good faith of plaintiffs held not error, where good faith was admitted by defendants, and propriety of testimony as rebuttal was not shown.

In action on promissory note executed by defendants to plaintiffs to enable latter to secure loan for purpose of assisting promoter in building a factory, and which money said promoter absconded with, sustaining objections to testimony of one of plaintiffs in rebuttal tending to show good faith of plaintiffs held not error, where defendants admitted the good faith of plaintiffs, and it was not shown that such testimony was in rebuttal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by I. E. Caldwell and others against J. S. Richards and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. A. Klein and R. W. Henderson, both of Bakersfield, for appellants.

F. E. Borton, James Petrini, and Borton & Petrini, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action upon a promissory note. The answer admits the execution of the note, but as a special defense alleges that the same was understood and intended between the plaintiffs and the defendants to operate as a contract of indemnity, and not otherwise; and that no liability has been incurred by the defendants by virtue thereof. The court found in accordance with said special defense, and adjudged that plaintiffs take nothing by their action, and that defendants recover their costs of suit.

Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and in support thereof contend that the court erred in concluding that the facts constituted "a contract of indemnity" and not "a partnership arrangement."

A fair statement of the case as shown by the evidence follows: At the time of the transaction hereinafter set out, the plaintiffs and defendants were business men and property owners in Oildale, Kern county, Cal., and were mutually interested in the welfare and progress of the community.

A short time prior to November 28, 1923, one H. E. Gove represented to the parties hereto that he was a manufacturer engaged in the business of manufacturing water heating appliances in the city of Los Angeles; that he intended to move his factory from Los Angeles to Oildale or Bakersfield. He discussed the subject with the people of Oildale with the result that a meeting was called to be held in the community club of the schoolhouse. This meeting was attended by all three plaintiffs and a large number of the defendants. At this meeting Gove outlined his project and asked the citizens to loan him the sum of $5,000 and secure him a factory site. No definite action was taken at this meeting.

[1] Later another meeting was held in the office of Justice of the Peace Ed. Gilroy. This meeting was also attended by all three plaintiffs and a large number of the defendants. There is considerable disagreement among the witnesses as to what transpired at the meeting, but, under well-settled principles of law, the conflict must be resolved in favor of the findings of the court. Moss v. Smith, 181 Cal. 519, 185 P. 385; Estate of Johnson, 182 Cal. 642, 189 P. 280. With this cardinal principle of law in mind, the evidence shows that the parties present at the meeting undertook to raise the loan for Gove and also procure him a factory site. The money was to be procured by a loan evidenced by the promissory note of all the parties in favor of the Security Trust Company of Bakersfield, where they expected to obtain the money. In accordance with said understanding, such a note was prepared and signed by the plaintiffs and all of the defendants who were present at the meeting. A factory site was also purchased at a cost of $900, and another promissory note for that sum was executed in favor of the owner of the land. This land was conveyed to Gove, but, due to some defect in the instrument of conveyance, title never vested in Gove, and it was subsequently sold for $1,200; the proceeds of the sale being used to pay the $900 note and accumulated interest, and the balance being applied by Mr. Caldwell to the note here in suit. A document was also prepared at this meeting containing the conditions under which the $5,000 was to be used. This instrument could not be produced at the trial, and the court received parol testimony of its contents. It was written in long hand by the plaintiff Johnson, and provided that the money, after being procured from the bank, should be placed in escrow along with $10,000 which Gove was to raise in Los Angeles, and that the full amount should constitute a building fund to be paid out as work on the factory progressed, the money to be disbursed upon the signature of said Gove and the defendant Asa Arratt, said disbursements also to be approved by the plaintiff I. E. Caldwell. This evidence was contradicted, but it was found by the court to be true. There was evidence that, before the money was to be placed in escrow as a building fund, said Gove was to take it with him to Los Angeles, with the deed to the land, for the purpose of showing the parties from whom he expected to obtain the $10,000 that he actually had the sum of $5,000 and a building site. However, this evidence was contradicted, and, as we have already pointed out, the court having found against it, we are bound thereby.

Plaintiffs Gann and Johnson were appointed to negotiate the loan at the bank. Subsequently they called upon the Security Trust Company at its banking house, but were advised by an officer of the bank that it would not accept the note with so many signatures, but would loan the money on the note of the three plaintiffs, and it was suggested by the officer that the plaintiffs obtain a note from the other signers to protect themselves. A note was thereupon prepared to the bank and also a note to the three plaintiffs. The latter was passed around for the signatures of the original signers to the $5,000 note. It was signed at various places, and the names of those signing the new note were erased from the original note. Thereafter the note executed to the bank was presented by Johnson and Gann, and the money obtained and delivered to Gove without any of the safeguards provided for by the agreement between the parties which the court found to exist. It appears, from the evidence of the plaintiff Caldwell, that he did not sign the note to the bank until two or three days after it had been signed by his coplaintiffs. It also appears that Gove has disappeared, and that no factory has been built. It is further in evidence that upon the completion of the factory the $5,000 loan was to be secured by a mortgage thereon.

[2] Plaintiffs claim that the facts constitute the transaction one of partnership, and cite in support of this theory section 2395 of the Civil Code, which provides:

> "Partnership is the association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them."

No decisions are cited in support of this view, but we are of the opinion that the recital of the foregoing facts in conjunction with the section of the Civil Code just cited negatives this contention. Under the findings of the court, the parties merely pledged their credit to secure a loan for the purpose of assisting Gove in building a factory in Oildale, and it does not constitute a partnership transaction.

[3, 4] Plaintiffs claim that the action was tried on the theory of contribution. Conceding, without deciding, that in an action upon a promissory note, without further or different pleadings, the plaintiffs may claim contribution, it then becomes immaterial whether the evidence establishes a partnership or a joint adventure, for in either case, upon a proper showing, the plaintiffs would be entitled to contribution. Section 2412, Civ. Code; section 1432, Civ. Code; Sears v. Starbird, 78 Cal. 225, 20 P. 547; Kazman v. Light, 53 Cal. App. 732, 200 P. 768.

The trial court found that plaintiffs were not entitled to contribution or to a judgment because the loss incurred was not a loss for which the defendants were responsible or to which they agreed to contribute. The court found upon substantial evidence that the money was to be disbursed by plaintiffs upon certain conditions and with certain safeguards, none of which was followed. Therefore the money having been lost, not as a result of the joint adventure of the parties, but by the independent and unwarranted action of the plaintiffs, the latter cannot recover.

[5] It is also claimed that in any event the plaintiff Caldwell was entitled to recover. This contention is based upon the fact that Caldwell did not sign the note at the bank until two or three days after it was signed by the other plaintiffs, and after the money had been paid to Gove. Conceding these facts to be sustained by the evidence, it is undisputed that Caldwell was present and participated in the meeting at which the agreement concerning the method of handling the money was reached; also that he was one of the payees named in the note. It is therefore clear that his signing the note at the bank was not an afterthought. If the money had been paid to Gove previous to said plaintiff affixing his name to the note, his failure to ascertain that fact and refuse to become a party to the deal could not add to the liability of the defendants.

Another ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the court's findings numbered 8 and 9 are not sustained by the evidence. Finding No. 8 is to the effect that there is no evidence to establish the fact that recovery of the money so delivered by plaintiffs to Gove cannot be recovered or that plaintiffs have made a reasonable effort to recover the same. Finding No. 9 is that plaintiffs have not paid the promissory note signed by them and delivered to the Security Trust Company. Having held that under the agreement between the parties the defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs, these findings become immaterial, and no useful purpose would be served by examining the evidence and passing upon said findings. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 P. 186; Coyle v. Lamb, 123 Cal. 264, 55 P. 901; Dalton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 7 Cal. App. 510, 94 P. 868.

[6] The last assignment urged is that the court erred in sustaining an objection to the following question asked of the plaintiff Caldwell, on his examination in rebuttal of the defendants' case:

> "Q. After you learned that—you came to the conclusion that Mr. Gove was not acting in good faith, did you consult an attorney with regard to bringing any proceedings against him? A. Yes, sir.
> "Mr. Borton: Objected to as irrelevant and immaterial, not in rebuttal of anything.
> "The Court: I don't see what that is rebuttal of; what difference does it make?
> "Mr. Henderson: I just want to show he acted in good faith in the matter.
> "Mr. Borton: I don't doubt that at all.
> "The Court: I don't care to go into that.
> "Mr. Henderson: All right, your honor."

In support of this alleged error, appellants say in their brief:

> "It may fairly be assumed that they proposed to show just what they did to recover the $5,000 advanced to the promoter, Gove, and that they learned that no recovery could be had against him. The plaintiffs were certainly entitled to present these matters. The court refused to allow them to present this line of evidence, and then proceeded to make an additional and voluntary finding against them, negativing such testimony as they introduced. It was, of course, necessary and proper that the plaintiffs should show that they had in good faith exhausted all means to recover the $5,000 loaned to the promoter and that the sum could not be recovered and that sum was hopelessly lost. The ruling of the court deprived them of that right."

There are several answers to this claim. Finding 8, toward which counsel's objection is directed, has already been held to be an immaterial finding. One of the grounds upon which the court sustained the objection was that the evidence sought to be elicited was not in rebuttal. Counsel have not pointed out, nor have we been able to find, any evidence in defendants' case of which the foregoing would be rebuttal testimony; and no request was made to allow it to go into the record as part of the plaintiffs' main case. Counsel for plaintiffs further stated that the object of the offered evidence was to show the good faith of the witness, whereupon counsel for defendants admitted the good faith of the witness. Under these circumstances the ruling of the court did not constitute error.

KLEIN v. LANGE et al. (Civ. 6190.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 30, 1928.

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑295(1)—Evidence held to support conclusion that client fraudulently conveyed land in which attorney had interest under contract giving such interest for services.

In action to establish ownership of interest in real property under contract giving attorney interest therein as fee for services, evidence held sufficient to support conclusion that litigation mentioned in contract was settled prior to trial, and, as result, property was deeded to client, and that various transfers were made in furtherance of conspiracy to defraud attorney.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding of trial court on motives of defendants in making conveyances, based on conflicting evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

In action to establish ownership of interest in real property, finding of trial court on motives of defendants in making conveyances based on conflicting evidence held conclusive on appeal.

3. Attorney and client 🔑147—Contract giving attorney interest in realty for services which did not prevent settlement, and provided for payment in that event, held legal.

Contract providing that attorney receive interest in realty as fee which did not prevent client from settling case at any time, and contained provision for payment to attorney of agreed amount in case of settlement, held not illegal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin T. Owen, Judge.

Action by E. A. Klein against Carl J. Lange and another, to establish ownership of real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

H. E. Schmidt and Emmons & Aldrich, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The purpose of this suit was to obtain a decree adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in a tract of land in Kern county, of which interest he claimed to be the owner under the terms of a written contract entered into between him and the defendant Carl J. Lange, as attorney and client respectively; also to reform the description of the land set forth in said contract. A decree was granted as prayed, and defendants appeal.

The contract is dated May 8, 1919, and recites that Lange, claiming to be the owner of the land in question, the record title to which stood in the name of his codefendant, Anna A. Lange, instituted suit against the latter to establish his title thereto, but "had no means to proceed with said action," and that therefore, in consideration of the past services rendered by respondent as Lange's attorney in connection with the institution of such suit, it was agreed as follows:

> "That the party of the first part (respondent) shall receive as and for his compensation for services already rendered and to be rendered including the trial of said action, if the same shall go or proceed to trial, 25 per cent. of whatever the said party of the second part shall receive or be allowed in the way of a settlement, or, if no settlement shall be reached before the trial of said action, one-third of whatever may be awarded to said party of the second part (Lange) by way of a judgment or decree of settlement after trial. The selection of said lands hereby transferred to said Klein shall be by mutual selection, but, if the said parties cannot agree upon said selection, then a selection should be made by lot of such percentage, but said land to be in a compact situation."

Then, after providing for the payment of respondent's services in cash in lieu of an interest in the property, at Lange's option, and for the advancement of costs by respondent, also that respondent had the right to substitute other attorneys in his place at his expense, the contract continues as follows:

> "The said party of the second (part), therefore, hereby conveys, transfers, and assigns, absolutely and forever, free and clear from any and all incumbrances, such percentage as aforestated out of said lands described as above."

The contract contains additional provisions, but the same are unimportant so far as the determination of this appeal is concerned.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff fully performed his part of the contract, but that, after the contract had been executed, Lange and Mrs. Lange "made and entered into a settlement wherein and whereby the said Carl J. Lange received a conveyancé of said lands and the whole thereof." It was further alleged:

> "For the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the plaintiff out of his share and portion of the said lands, under the terms of said agreement, the said defendants conspired together and caused the said conveyance of said lands to be made to one Johan Jarchow; that the name Johan Jarchow is fictitious, and that in truth and fact, the said Johan Jarchow and the said defendant, Carl J. Lange are one and the same person and that the said fictitious name, Johan Jarchow was used by the said Carl J. Lange as a subterfuge to conceal from this plaintiff the fact that the said defendant Carl J. Lange had recovered and acquired the said lands and the whole thereof as conditioned in the said agreement, all of which was well known to the said defendant Anna A. Lange at the time of the execution of the said conveyance;" and "that plaintiff did not discover the said fraudulent acts of said defendants until within 60 days immediately preceding the commencement of this action."

The answer consisted of denials of the allegations of the complaint.

The court found for plaintiff on all contested issues, and a decree was entered accordingly, correcting the description of the property, adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in said land, and impressing the same with a trust for the benefit of respondent's interest.

Summarizing the main points urged by appellants for a reversal, they are to the effect that the judgment is contrary to the evidence; that the proof adduced shows that the litigation which respondent was employed as attorney to institute and carry on did not terminate in such a manner as to entitle respondent to any relief under the contract; and that consequently respondent was restricted in the exercise of his remedies against Lange to either an action on quantum meruit for the services performed or to an action for damages for breach of contract.

The record discloses that the action of Lange v. Lange, which respondent was employed to prosecute, was instituted April 27, 1919; that, after a demurrer to complaint had been filed and overruled, the defendants answered, and the cause was set to be tried on September 25th of the same year; that respondent was ready to proceed with the trial, but, on account of a criminal case having the right of way, the case was dislodged from the calendar. In the meantime, the evidence shows, respondent had expended approximately $300 in connection with the case, $230 of which was money advanced to Lange. Subsequent to September 25, and shortly after the case had been displaced on the trial calendar, Lange requested respondent to substitute other attorneys, which the latter refused to do, and thereafter, on October 6, 1919, pursuant to a notice of motion made by Lange to that effect, other attorneys were substituted by court order, but on October 27, 1919, the substituted attorneys withdrew from the case, and on the same day Lange, in propria persona, filed a dismissal of the action.

About a year subsequently, the evidence shows, Lange and Mrs. Lange started to juggle the title to the property by means of a series of transfers executed through the instrumentality of two fictitious persons admittedly created by them for that purpose. One of the fictitious persons was designated "Johan Jarchow," and the other was "Mrs. Marie McGinnis, a widow," and appellants further admit that they represented themselves before notaries public as being respectively Johan Jarchow and Mrs. Marie McGinnis, a widow, and as such executed and acknowledged instruments of conveyance and powers of attorney, which they caused to be recorded, and pursuant to which the title to said property was transferred.

The details of these transactions were as follows: On March 22, 1920, Anna Lange executed a grant deed of the property to the fictitious Mrs. Marie McGinnis. On May 19, 1920, Marie McGinnis by and through her attorney in fact, Carl J. Lange, and Carl J. Lange and Anna A. Lange, his wife, as trustors, made a deed of trust covering the lands in question to a Los Angeles bank, as trustee, to secure the payment of a promissory note, attorney's fees, costs, etc. On September 14, 1920, Lange and his wife made a quitclaim deed to the property to Mrs. Marie McGinnis. On September 25, 1920, Mrs. Marie McGinnis executed a quitclaim deed before a notary covering the property to Johan Jarchow, and on the same day a power of attorney was executed by Johan Jarchow to Lange, after which, and still on the same day, Johan Jarchow executed a grant deed conveying said property to Mrs. Anna A. Lange, but the deed last mentioned, to Mrs. Lange, was not recorded until March 17, 1921. It thus affirmatively appears that on September 25, 1921, the entire property was deeded to Lange in the fictitious name of Johan Jarchow, and that title of record remained in that status until March 17, 1921, during which period of time, the evidence further shows, a suit for an injunction was instituted in Jarchow's name against the tenants of the property, and that the complaint therein was verified by Lange as the agent of Jarchow. It was further established that, subsequent to the recordation of the deed from Jarchow to Mrs. Lange, Lange and his wife joined in certain leases and contracts involving the property to various persons, one of whom afterwards assigned his lease, and the assignee subsequently deeded the same to the Langes.

[1] The foregoing evidence is amply sufficient, in our opinion, to support the conclusion reached by the trial court that the litigation mentioned in the contract was settled by the parties prior to trial, as a result of which settlement the property in question was deeded to Lange on September 25, 1920, in the fictitious name of Johan Jarchow, and that the various transfers made by the Langes in the names of the fictitious persons were consummated in furtherance of a conspiracy between them to defraud respondent out of the share of the property he became entitled to under the contract with Lange, as a result of such settlement.

[2] So far as the record discloses, no evidence was offered by appellants before the trial court in support of their case, and consequently no explanation whatever has been given by them as to their peculiar actions in dealing with the title to the property, except that during the presentation of respondent's case it was stipulated that about the time these transfers were being made Mrs. Lange was sued for malicious prosecution by a man whose indictment she had secured by the grand jury of Kern county, but which indictment was afterwards dismissed without trial; and it was suggested by appellants' counsel at the trial court, as here in the briefs, that the operations of the Langes under the guise of fictitious names may have been due to bad legal advice given them by attorneys then representing them (but who are in no manner connected with the present action), coupled with the fear which Mrs. Lange may have entertained for the result of the suit against her for malicious prosecution. The question of the motives which prompted the Langes in making the transfers in the manner described, however, was in the last analysis one for the trial court to determine, and therefore the matters suggested by appellants' counsel, at most, raised but a conflict which the trial court upon sufficient evidence has resolved adversely to appellants. The decision of the trial court on that issue is consequently conclusive on appeal.

[3] Appellants have cited a number of cases relating to the question of the legality of contingent contracts made between attorneys and their clients, some of which contained provisions affecting the right of a client to compromise the litigation without the consent of the attorney, and in others no provision was made for payment of the attorney's services in case of compromise prior to trial. The contract involved in the present case is not open to the objections made in those cases, because here there was nothing contained in the contract which prevented the client from settling the case at any time, and an express provision was inserted therein for the payment to the attorney of an agreed amount in case of such settlement, whether made before or after trial.

The action was one to establish respondent's interest under the terms of the contract, and therefore the rules of pleading relating to the specific performance which appellants endeavor to invoke against the sufficiency of the complaint are not pertinent.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVENPORT et al. v. NATIONAL RESERVE INS. CO. OF ILLINOIS, DUBUQUE, IOWA.★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 28, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1)—Power of appellate court, where verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, is limited to determining whether conclusion was supported by substantial evidence.

When a verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, power of appellate court begins and ends with inquiry as to whether there was substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in itself supported conclusion reached by jury.

2. Insurance ⇨665(3)—Evidence as to insured's gross exaggeration of loss by fire held to sustain verdict denying recovery.

In action on fire policies insuring lumber and cordwood on tract of timber land, evidence as to gross exaggeration by insured relative to loss by fire held sufficient to sustain verdict denying recovery.

3. Appeal and error ⇨971(2)—Evidence ⇨546—Admission or rejection of expert evidence lies largely within discretion of trial court, and action will not be reviewed unless discretion is abused.

Admission or rejection of expert evidence lies so largely within discretion of trial court that its action thereon will not be reviewed on appeal, in absence of clear showing of abuse of that discretion.

4. Evidence ⇨520—Admitting expert testimony as to quantity of cordwood that could be cut from given area and whether forest fire could burn green pine stumps held not abuse of discretion.

Trial court held not to have abused discretion in admitting expert testimony relative to quantity of cordwood that could be cut from a given area and as to whether or not a forest fire could have burned out green pine stumps, after permitting opposing attorney to cross-examine expert witnesses at length as to their qualifications, particularly since testimony given was largely cumulative.

5. Insurance ⊂⇒669(13)—Instruction relative to appraisement, following exact language of policies, held not erroneous.

In action on fire policies insuring lumber and cordwood located on timber land, instruction relative to appraisement, following exact language of policies, held not erroneous.

6. Appeal and error ⊂⇒1170(9)—Error in instruction does not require reversal, in absence of showing of prejudice (Code of Civ. Proc. § 475).

Under Code of Civ. Proc. § 475, error in instruction does not require reversal, in absence of showing of prejudice; there being no presumption that error is prejudicial or that injury is done by merely showing error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by N. E. Davenport and another against the National Reserve Insurance Company of Illinois, Dubuque, Iowa. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. Burns and W. H. Slade, both of Auburn, Howe, Hibbitt & Johnston and O. F. Meldon, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Miller & Thorton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiffs brought this action in the superior court of Placer county to recover $28,692, alleged fire loss under two policies of fire insurance. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of defendant. From the judgment entered upon this verdict, the plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

The complaint is in two counts. The amount sought to be recovered under the first count is $15,000; the amount sought to be recovered under the second count or second policy is $13,692. The property insured under the first policy for $15,000, according to the recitals in the policy, consisted of 500,000 feet, more or less, of lumber, manufactured, unmanufactured, or in process of manufacture. The property insured under the second policy for $14,500, according to the recitals in the policy, consisted of 1,200 cords of wood, more or less. Both of these policies were issued to appellants on July 12, 1923, and were both to run for a period of two months from the said 12th of July, 1923. All the insured property was supposed to be located upon a 110-acre tract of forest or timber land adjoining the built-up portion of the city of Auburn. On the 3d day of September, 1923, which was only nine days before the policies would expire, and during the early hours of the morning, a fire was discovered to be raging upon this 110-acre tract in the vicinity of what is referred to in the evidence as "Rattlesnake Canyon." This fire did not entirely subside for several days, and broke out anew on September 5, 1923. Both fires burned over considerable area and destroyed nearly all of the piled wood and all of the manufactured lumber, lumber in process of manufacture, and cut logs, within the burned area.

In October, 1923, appellants presented to the respondent insurance company their claims and proofs of loss under both of these policies. Under the first policy, appellants claimed that there had been burned and totally destroyed by the fire 452,248 feet of lumber and 13,063 feet of logs, the value of which was estimated at $18,442. Under the second policy, appellants claimed there had been burned and totally destroyed by fire cordwood which was estimated at $13,692.

The respondent strenuously contends that both policies are void for a number of reasons; among them being that appellants were guilty of misrepresentations, concealment, and fraud, not only in the procurement of the policies, but in the proofs of loss thereunder, and that appellants were also guilty of false swearing in their claims, etc. All of these contentions and separate defenses were elaborately set forth in respondent's answer.

Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

[1] When a verdict is attacked for insufficiency of the evidence, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the jury. If, upon any material point, the testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed that the jury resolved the conflict in favor of the prevailing party. The authorities supporting this rule are legion, among them being Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332; Rocha v. Rocha, 197 Cal. 396, 240 P. 1010; Union C. Co. v. Madera, etc., Irr. Co., 179 Cal. 774, 178 P. 957; and Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 P. 432.

[2] With this rule in mind, we have made a careful examination of the record, and we are fully convinced that there is abundant evidence to support the verdict of the jury. We see no reason, however, to go into a detailed analysis of the great volume of evidence embodied in the record which contains 953 typewritten pages.

The testimony shows that appellants lost by fire approximately 5,019 feet of lumber, and in their proof of loss they claimed to have lost 452,248 feet; they lost between 18 and 25 cords of wood, and in their proof of loss they claimed to have lost 1,182 cords; that they actually lost 4,718 feet of logs, and by their proof they claimed to have lost 13,063 feet. From the size and condition of the mill, the variety and character of the timber on the land, and other physical facts proved,

⊂⇒For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes it seems impossible for appellants to have had the amount of lumber and cordwood claimed by them. Furthermore, the jury made a personal inspection of the entire premises.

The appellants made a motion for a new trial upon the ground, among other things, that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, which motion was denied by the trial court.

It is also significant to note that in 1921 appellants had a fire on this same tract of land, and collected $1,383 from an insurance company for 153 cords of wood claimed to have been cut from one acre of this 110-acre tract. Appellants also had a fire on this same tract of land in 1922, and collected from insurance companies $9,000 for 900 cords of wood claimed to have been cut from 5.79 acres of said tract.

We think that the jury and the trial judge must have been convinced, as we are, that appellants' claims in the case at bar were grossly exaggerated, if not entirely fabricated.

It is next contended by appellants that the court erred in its rulings during the course of the trial. The only rulings that are claimed to be erroneous are: (1) The qualifications of the witness Oest to testify as to the quantity of cordwood that could be cut from a given area; (2) the qualifications of the same witness to testify as to whether or not a forest fire could have burned out green pine stumps; (3) the qualifications of the witness Maretsas to testify as to the amount of cordwood which could have been cut from a given area; (4) the qualifications of the witness Skinner to testify to the amount of cordwood which could be cut from a given area; and (5) the qualifications of the witness Maas to testify to the amount of cordwood which could have been cut from a given area.

[3, 4] There is no merit in any of these contentions. The rule is well settled that the admission or rejection of evidence of this character lies so largely within the discretion of the trial court that its action thereon will not be reviewed on appeal, in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of that discretion. Maris v. H. Crummey, Inc., 55 Cal. App. 573, 204 P. 259; Vallejo & Northern Railroad Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 P. 238; Kirstein v. Bekins Van & Storage Co., 27 Cal. App. 586, 150 P. 999; Hood v. Bekins Van & Storage Co., 178 Cal. 150, 172 P. 594. There is no such showing here made. It was for the trial court to determine whether the witnesses were qualified to testify as to the quantity of lumber and wood that could have been taken from the burned area and the value of the same, etc. The trial court permitted appellants' attorney to cross-examine all of the expert witnesses at length as to their qualifications before they were permitted to give their opinions, and the record shows that all of said witnesses were reasonably well qualified to testify concerning the matters about which they were interrogated. The objections made by appellants went to the weight rather than to the competency of the evidence. Moreover, the evidence given by these witnesses was largly cumulative; other expert witnesses were permitted to testify without objection to the amount of lumber and cordwood that could have been cut from the land in question.

[5] Lastly, appellants contend that the court erred in giving an instruction relative to an appraisement, in the event the insurance company and the insured could not agree as to the amount of the loss. The portion of the instruction assailed is in the exact language of the policies, and, under the evidence, the whole instruction was entirely proper. A careful examination of all the instructions satisfies us that the jury was fully and correctly instructed as to all phases of the case.

[6] If it be conceded, for the sake of argument, that it was error for the court to have given this instruction, still it is not shown to be prejudicial. We cannot see that any different verdict could or would have been returned by the jury had this instruction not been given. There is no presumption that error is prejudicial or that injury is done by merely showing error. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.; Peavey v. Mutual Realty Corporation (Cal. App.) 255 P. 858; Gill v. Southern Pacific Co., 174 Cal. 84, 161 P. 1153.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Shay, sheriff of said county, E. M. Whitaker, and certain fictitious defendants termed respondents in the trial court, but hereinafter designated appellants.

Judgments were rendered in favor of each of the petitioners and against the said Feraud, as said registrar, and against the said Shay, as sheriff, and against the said Whitaker, and from both of said judgments said last-named parties have appealed.

Each of these proceedings were brought under the provisions of the Land Titles Act, commonly known as the Torrens Title Law (St. 1915, p. 1932), for purpose of having canceled, and removed from certain certificates of registration in the office of the registrar of titles of San Bernardino county certain memorials indorsed thereon by said registrar.

Respondents offered in evidence certificate of title No. 1340, brought under first registration by certificate No. 52 on the 11th of May, 1917, by decree of the superior court of said county of San Bernardino and standing in the name of respondent Emma D. Suverkrup, showing her to be the owner of certain lands therein described, upon which certificate appeared memorials showing judgment of E. M. Whitaker v. Larchmont Investment Co. et al., for $49,038.53, and execution, W. A. Shay, Sheriff, v. Larchmont Investment Co. et al., date of registration of said judgment and execution being October 8, 1925.

Respondents then offered in evidence certificate of title 1350 and certificate of title 1351, standing in the name of the respondent Pioneer Abstract & Title Company, showing said company to be the owner of the lands therein described and each dated August 12, 1925, upon which appeared memorials identical with those appearing on certificate of title No. 1340.

The judgment and execution referred to in said memorials were then introduced in evidence.

The judgment being in favor of E. M. Whitaker and against Larchmont Investment Company, a common-law trust, E. A. Ely, W. W. Sears, T. M. Oehrlin, and L. W. Clark, as trustees of an alleged trust estate, the Larchmont Investment Company, a copartnership composed of E. A. Ely, W. W. Sears, T. M. Oehrlin, and L. W. Clark, and E. A. Ely, W. W. Sears, T. M. Oehrlin and L. W. Clark as individuals, rendered by the superior court of Los Angeles county, Cal., dated August 11, 1925, filed for record in office of registrar of said county of San Bernardino on October 8, 1925, and entered on said certificates of titles Nos. 1340, 1350, and 1351 by Fulton G. Feraud, registrar of said county of San Bernardino as aforesaid.

The execution upon said judgment was issued by the clerk of said county of Los Angeles directed to the sheriff of said county of San Bernardino, was dated August 27, 1925, and was filed for record by said registrar on October 8, 1925, and entered on said certificates of title 1340, 1350, and 1351 by Fulton G. Feraud, as registrar of said county of San Bernardino, to which execution was attached the certificate of said Walter A. Shay, sheriff, of said county of San Bernardino, that he had levied said execution upon certain lands, including those covered by said certificates 1340, 1350, and 1351.

This was all the evidence introduced by respondents. Appellants thereupon made a motion for a nonsuit. Same being denied, they declined to offer any evidence, and judgments were thereupon entered for respondents.

There being no evidence that any of the judgment debtors named in the judgment in the case of E. M. Whitaker v. Larchmont Investment Co. et al. had any interest, registered or otherwise, in the land covered by certificate of titles Nos. 1340, 1350, and 1351, it appears to the court that the question to be determined is whether or not, where the lands have been registered under the provisions of the Land Title Act, an execution issued upon a judgment in an action between persons who do not have any interest in the registered land can be levied upon said registered land and said judgment and execution filed in the office of the registrar of titles and entered as memorials on the certificates of title of said registered land.

Appellants claim that sections 91 and 92 of the Land Title Act furnishes ample authority to the registrar to file the judgment and certificate of levy under the execution and to enter them as memorials upon the certificate of title covering the land levied upon under the execution.

The provisions of these two sections are as follows:

> Section 91. "No judgment, or decree, or order of any court shall be a lien on or in any wise affect registered land, or any estate or interest therein, until the certified copy of such judgment, decree, or order, under the hand and official seal of the clerk of the court in which the same is of record, is filed in the office of the registrar, and a memorial of the same is entered upon the register of the last certificate of the title to be affected."
> Section 92. "Whenever registered land is levied upon by virtue of any writ of attachment, execution, or other process, it shall be the duty of the officer making such levy forthwith to file with the registrar a certificate of the fact of such levy, a memorial of which shall be entered upon the register; and no lien shall arise by reason of such levy until the filing of such certificate and the entry in the register of such memorial, any notice thereof, actual or constructive, to the contrary notwithstanding."

It will be noted that section 91 does not specify what judgments shall or shall not be entitled to be filed in the office of the registrar, but merely that no judgment, decree, or order of the court shall be a lien or in any wise affect registered land until a certified copy thereof has been filed with the registrar. It will also be noted that section 92 of said act provides that when any registered land is levied upon by virtue of any writ of execution the officer making the levy shall forthwith file with the registrar a certificate of the fact of the levy, a memorandum of which shall be entered upon the register.

Upon its face this section of the act would appear to authorize the placing of the memorial of the levy upon the certificate of title regardless of whether or not any of the judgment debtors appear from the certificate of title to have any interest in the land registered under said certificate. However, in order to determine when and under what circumstances the officer making the levy is authorized to file with the registrar his certificate of the fact of such levy and to determine under what circumstances the registrar is authorized to enter a memorial of the fact of such levy upon the register, the other sections of this act bearing upon this question must be examined and considered.

The only theory conceivable upon which appellant Whitaker caused the execution to be issued upon said judgment and levied upon said registered lands is that these judgment debtors, or some of them, had an interest in the said registered lands.

[1] Respondents claim that before appellant Whitaker had the right to cause a levy to be made upon said registered lands, and before appellant Shay had the right to make said levy, and before appellant Feraud had the right to file the judgment and certificate of levy and enter the same as memorials on the register, proceedings should have been taken under the provisions of the Torrens Act to have the interest or interests of the judgment debtor or debtors in said registered lands determined and registered.

Section 55 of said act is as follows:

> "A deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument purporting to convey, transfer, mortgage, lease, charge, or otherwise deal with registered land, or any estate or interest therein, or charge upon the same, other than a will or a lease not exceeding one year where the land is in the actual possession of the lessee or his assigns, shall take effect only by way of contract between the parties thereto, and as authority to the registrar to register the transfer, mortgage, lease, charge, or other dealing upon compliance with the terms of this act. On the filing of such instrument, the land, estate, interest, or charge shall become transferred, mortgaged, leased, charged, or dealt with according to the purport and terms of the deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument. The registrar shall immediately upon the filing of such instrument, stamp or write upon the original and duplicate certificates of title the word 'transferred,' 'mortgaged,' 'leased,' or otherwise, as the case may require, with the date of filing such instrument and sign such indorsement."

Substantially this section means, when applied to facts appearing in the cases under consideration, that the instrument purporting to charge or otherwise deal with the registered land or other estate or interest therein, takes effect only by way of contract between the parties thereto and as authority to the registrar to register the charge or other dealing upon compliance with the terms of the act. In other words, supposing that the said judgment debtors or any of them had an agreement with the registered owner of the lands giving to said debtor or debtors an interest in said registered land, which interest is unregistered, in that event it would be effective between the parties only as a contract until those things were done that are required by the act to be done to entitle it to be registered.

To gather the meaning of the words "upon compliance with the terms of this act," as used in section 55, we must look to other sections of this act. Section 60 is as follows:

> "On the filing of an instrument intended to create a charge in the registrar's office and upon the production of the duplicate certificate of title, whenever it appears from the original certificate of title that the person intending to create the charge has the title and right to create such charge and the person in whose favor the same is sought to be created is entitled by the terms of this act to have the same registered, the registrar shall enter upon the original and duplicate certificates a memorial of the purport thereof, and the date of filing the instrument, with a reference thereto by its file number, which memorial shall be signed by the registrar. The registrar shall also note upon the instrument on file the number of the certificate of title where the memorial is entered. No new certificate of title shall be entered and no memorandum shall be made upon any certificate of title by the registrar in pursuance of any deed or other voluntary instrument, unless the owner's duplicate certificate of title is presented with such instrument, except in cases expressly provided for in this act, or upon the order of the court, for cause shown, and whenever such order is made, a memorial thereof shall be entered upon the new certificate of title and on the owner's duplicate. The production of the owner's duplicate certificate, whenever a voluntary instrument is presented for registration, shall be conclusive authority from the registered owner to the registrar to issue a new certificate or to make a memorial in accordance with such instrument and the new certificate or the memorial shall be binding upon the registered owner and upon all persons claiming under him in favor of every purchaser for value in good faith."

This section provides a method showing such compliance with the terms of the act as would entitle the unregistered interest in land, or charge upon the same, to be registered. Section 98 of the act provides that a registered owner, or other person in interest, or the registrar may at any time apply by petition to the court upon the ground that the registered interests of any description, whether vested, contingent, expected or inchoate, have terminated or ceased, or that new interests have arisen or been created which do not appear upon the certificate, for an order correcting or altering any certificate to comply with the true facts as shown by the petition and proof adduced and the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the petition after notice to all parties in interest, and if it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the relief as petitioned for should be granted, it shall order and direct the registrar to make such correction or modifications on such certificates or memorials as may be necessary.

By the provisions of these two sections, we have methods by means of which the instrument purporting to charge or otherwise deal with the registered land, or other estate or interest therein, and which takes effect only by way of contract between the parties, may be made to comply with the terms of this act and become entitled to registration.

[2] Thompson, in his work on Real Property, volume 5, § 4154, says that Sir Robert Torrens, who formulated the system of judicial registration of land titles, known as the Torrens System, stated that the purposes of the law which he advocated are "to simplify, quicken and cheapen the transfer of real estate and to render titles safe and indefeasible." These objects he planned should be accomplished by means of registration of title and the use of certificates which conclusively show the state of the title at all times.

In the case of Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 90 P. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829, where the constitutionality of this act was upheld, the Supreme Court stated that the purpose of the act was to establish a system for the registration of title to land whereby the official certificate will always show the state of the title and the person in whom it is vested.

In the case of In re Seick, 46 Cal. App. 363, 189 P. 314, it was said that the act provided a complete scheme of procedure whereby, through a decree of the court, land may be brought under the operation of the act. "So that an intending purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee, or other person having dealings with the property, may go to the registrar's office, examine the leaf whereon the title to that property is registered, and at once, with safety, take a deed, lease, or mortgage from the owner of the property, file it, and have himself accordingly registered upon the leaf or folium as owner, lessee, or mortgagee." The purpose of the Torrens Land Act is not only to create and perpetuate a marketable title to land sought to be registered in the true owner thereof, but also to enable the registration of every tract in such a way that all interests therein may be disclosed by the registration. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Griset, 189 Cal. 382, 208 P. 673; Frances Investment Co. v. Supreme Court, 189 Cal. 107, 208 P. 105.

In this last-named case, at page 116 (208 P. 109), in speaking of the benefit derived by the owner of land registered under the Torrens Act, the court said:

> "An act framed pursuant to such a purpose would lead to the issuance of a certificate of title worth having, one which would vouch to the world that the holder was the owner of the land described in it, that a merchantable title was vested in him. A statute framed without such an end in view would be of but scant value. It is to be remembered that the law, according to its title, is not purposed merely for the certification of land titles. It is also designed to provide for the simplification of the transfer of real estate and no considerable simplification results in such transfers if after obtaining a decree of the superior court that he has title to property and obtaining a certificate to that effect, one who has resorted to the procedure sanctioned by the law is compelled afterward to contend for additional decrees to secure to him a title which a buyer would accept on the market."

Unquestionably, it was the intention of the framers of this act that at all times the certificate of title of the owner of registered lands should show the exact status of the lands described in the certificates, that if there were memorials entered upon the certificate of title showing charges or other dealings against or with the registered lands, then the nature, extent and amount of such charges or dealings should be specifically set forth.

[3] Assuming that the judgment debtors in the aforesaid judgment claim some interest in the lands covered by the said certificates of title, there is no way of ascertaining or determining, from an inspection of these certificates, as they now stand, what the nature and extent of that interest is. The effect of this is that the title of the registered owner to said lands is thereby rendered uncertain, indefinite and unmerchantable.

It appears to the court that to permit a judgment rendered in an action between strangers to the registered land to be filed and entered as a memorial upon the certificates of title of said registered land and the certificate of levy thereon under an execution issued under said judgment to be also filed as a memorial on said certificates of title, there being nothing to indicate that the judgment debtors had any interest in said registered lands, nor anything indicating the extent of such interest, would be to nullify one of the important purposes for which said Torrens law was enacted.

Section 98 of the act authorizes the registered owner of the land to apply by petition to the court for the cancellation of any memorandum on a certificate when the same has been placed there by error or mistake. A consideration of this act clearly shows that it was the intention of its framers that no memorial, charge or lien should be entered upon the register without first complying with its terms and requirements.

To permit a practice that would sanction the unauthorized placing of said judgment and certificate of levy upon the register, that is to say, upon the certificates of title of respondents, would, as was said by the court in Curtis v. Haas, 298 Ill. 485, 131 N. E. 701, necessarily invite other such unauthorized acts of the registrar, which would precipitate a multiplicity of suits to protect the rights of the registered owner.

The trial court was right in denying the motion for a nonsuit.

The judgments are supported by the findings, nor are the findings inconsistent or contradictory.

The judgment in each of the cases is affirmed.

CENTRAL CALIFORNIA CREDITORS' ASS'N v. SEELEY et al. (Civ. 6206.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied Supreme Court June 25, 1928.

1. Alteration of instruments 🔑11(1)—Pencil marks through words on bond obligating defendant to redeliver property attached, if made thoughtlessly by attorney, did not change obligation on bond.

Pencil marks by attorney on bond for release of attachment through words obligating defendant to redeliver property to officer to be applied to payment of judgment, if made thoughtlessly and for purpose of illustration, held not to change obligation on bond, since marks were merely accidental blot or tear.

2. Alteration of instruments 🔑11(1)—Written obligation held not changed by conduct of third parties or accidents to writing.

Written obligation of parties on bond for release of attachment is not changed by what third parties or accidents may do to writing.

3. Attorney and client 🔑91—Attorney held not authorized to alter bond releasing attachment.

Agency of attorney for party receiving bond for release of attachment held not to authorize attorney to alter bond, and careless act of attorney in running pencil marks through words of bond, unauthorized, and without knowledge of principal, cannot be held to be deliberate and unlawful act of principal, even though act was deliberate and intentional act of attorney, outside scope of agency.

4. Attorney and client 🔑103—Motion to amend attachment bond by striking provision for redelivery of property held not ratification of attorney's act crossing out such provision not known when motion was made.

Motion by plaintiff in attachment proceedings suing on bond for release of attachment to amend complaint to conform to proof by striking out of description of obligation of bond promise to redeliver attached property, which motion was granted, but amendment not made, held not ratification of acts of attorney testifying, after motion was made, to mutilation of bond by striking out provision for redelivery of property, there being no knowledge of attorney's act, which is essential element of ratification.

5. Pleading 🔑238(5)—Plaintiff's failure to amend complaint as permitted may be considered as abandonment of motion to amend.

Failure of plaintiff suing on bond for release of attachment to avail itself of permission to amend complaint to conform to proof by striking from complainant's description of bond promise to redeliver attached property may be considered as abandonment of motion to amend complaint.

6. Attachment 🔑263—Bond releasing attachment containing obligation to redeliver property or pay judgment given under statute not prescribing form held sufficient to obligate defendant to repay judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 540, 554, 555).

Where bond for release of attachment, given pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 540, not prescribing form of bond, but merely requiring sheriff to accept bond in lieu of attaching, if defendant gives security, contained obligation in alternative to redeliver attached property to officer or pay judgment to extent of value of released property as required by sections 554, 555, and was accepted and attached property returned to defendants, bond was adequate to charge defendant with obligation to pay amount of judgment, if property was released.

7. Attachment 🔑263—Bond releasing attachment containing promise to redeliver property or pay judgment held sufficient as common-law bond.

Bond for release of attachment containing obligation in alternative to redeliver attached property to officer or pay judgment to full value of property released held sufficient as common-law bond.

8. Attachment 🔑261—Court order for release of attachment held unnecessary under bond from which it could be assumed that writ of attachment had not been returned (Code Civ. Proc. § 555).

Where bond for release of attachment recited that defendant, being desirous of obtaining release of attachment and return of property before return of said writ by sheriff, obligates himself to redeliver property to proper officer, or pay judgment to extent of value of released property, it could be assumed that, at time bond was given, writ of attachment had not been returned by sheriff, and hence no need existed to follow procedure of Code Civ. Proc. § 555, by obtaining court order for release of attachment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by the Central California Creditors' Association against J. R. Phelps and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellant.

Fabian D. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Respondent recovered judgment upon an undertaking given to the sheriff to release an attachment. Respondent was plaintiff in the attachment suit. Cook Lumber Company was defendant. The lumber yard of said defendant has been attached, and the release bond sued on in this case was executed by the defendants in this action, A. L. Seeley and J. R. Phelps. J. R. Phelps alone appeals.

The undertaking recited the commencement of the action, the levying of the attachment, and that, "whereas the defendant is desirous of obtaining the release of said attachment and the return of said property so attached to him before the return of said writ by said sheriff: Now, therefore, we the undersigned, * * * in consideration of the premises and in consideration of the release from attachment of all the property attached, * * * undertake in the sum of $3,500, * * * and promise that in case the said plaintiff recovers judgment in said action the said defendant will on demand redeliver such attached property so released to the proper officer, to be applied to the payment of the judgment, or in default thereof the said defendant and sureties (italics ours) will on demand pay to the said plaintiff the full value of the property released not exceeding the amount of said judgment."

When this undertaking was offered in evidence at the trial of this action, the words which we have italicized had been scratched through with lead pencil marks, and bracketed off with parentheses. Most of the evidence at the trial relates to how, when, and where and by whom this alteration or mutilation was made.

The first witness was the deputy sheriff who received the bond. He testified more from his own habits than from recollection. He thought the alteration must have been made before he accepted the bond, and was made by the party who presented it with the consent and in the presence of the sureties. Judge P. F. Gosbey could not testify from recollection, but stated that he would have initialed the alteration if he had noticed it at the time he indorsed his approval on it.

The attorney who prepared the bond and appellant who signed it were called by defendants, and testified that the marks were not present at the time it was signed and sent on its way to the sheriff's office. When defendant rested, plaintiff also rested without offering further testimony. Whereupon defendant immediately asked to reopen the case and call Mr. Miller as a witness. This permission was granted over the objection of plaintiff, who specified that Mr. Miller had been present in the courtroom during the course of the trial.

Mr. Miller testified that he was an attorney at law, and that he had represented, and had appeared for, respondent in this action, having argued upon the hearing of the two demurrers interposed to the first and second complaint; that, while the legal points concerning bonds given to release an attachment before and after a return of a writ of attachment by the sheriff were being discussed by himself and Under Sheriff Thompson, he himself made all the pencil marks upon the bond—thoughtlessly and for the purpose of illustration.

The amended complaint which is printed in the supplement of appellant's opening brief alleges that the bond was given while the writ of attachment was in the possession of the sheriff, and describes the obligation of the bond in the alternative, i. e., promises redelivery of the attached property or payment of the judgment obtained.

The findings of the court on this subject state "that defendants to procure a release of said attachment and the property seized thereunder executed an undertaking conditioned that, if said property be released from said attachment, they would pay to plaintiff the amount of the judgment." The findings also state that demand has been duly made on the judgment defendants and also on their sureties for the payment of said judgment or the return of the attached property.

[1-3] Appellant vigorously contends that the Miller story is the correct one, and attempts to demonstrate it in a manner which he states is conclusive. Assuming this contention to be correct, the pencil marks made by Miller on the bond amount to nothing in the direction of changing any clause or obligation of the bond. These marks, if made in the manner Miller described, must be considered as of no more importance than any accidental mark, blot, tear, discoloration, or even destruction. The written obligation of the parties is not changed by what third parties or accidents may do to it. Although Mr. Miller was apparently the attorney of record for the respondent herein at the time he let his lead pencil go astray, his agency as attorney did not authorize him to alter documentary evidence. We cannot say that his careless act, unauthorized by and without the knowledge of his principal, should be held to be the deliberate and unlawful act of his principal. The same result would follow if the act was the deliberate, intentional and unlawful act of an attorney clearly outside of the scope of his agency.

[4, 5] During the course of the trial, respondent made a motion to amend the amended complaint to conform to proof by striking out of the complaint's description of the obligation of the bond, the promise to redeliver the attached property. This motion was granted, but we have been unable to find anywhere in the record that any such amendment was actually made. This motion was made while the first witness was on the stand, and therefore before Mr. Miller testified. We do not regard this motion, therefore, as a ratification of the acts of Miller in mutilating the bond. Respondent did not know at that time what Miller had done. Such knowledge would be an essential element of ratification. Respondent's failure to avail itself of the permission to amend may be considered an abandonment of his motion, which may have been induced by Miller's testimony.

[6, 7] We therefore must consider whether the bond, disregarding the lead pencil marks, will support the judgment. The bond was not given pursuant to an order of release of attachment pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 554, 555, made where the writ of attachment has already been returned by the sheriff, but was given pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure, § 540. The alternative form of bond, promising either redelivery of the attached property or payment of the judgment to the extent of the value of the released property, is required by Code of Civil Procedure, § 555. It is not prohibited by Code of Civil Procedure, § 540, which does not prescribe the form of the bond, but simply requires the sheriff to accept an undertaking in lieu of attaching, if the defendant "give him security by the undertaking of at least two sufficient sureties in an amount sufficient to satisfy such demand, against such defendant, besides cost, or in an amount equal to the value of the property of such defendant which has been or is about to be attached." While appellant contends that he is not liable upon the bond, unless statutory requirements are followed, he does not attempt to point out wherein this bond does not comply with section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The bond served its purpose. It was accepted, and the attached property was returned to the defendants in the attachment suit. Its language is quite adequate to charge the appellant herein with the obligation upon which the judgment appealed from is based. It is also sufficient as a common-law bond. Gardner v. Donnelly, 86 Cal. 367, 24 P. 1072.

[8] We are justified by the pleadings and by the recitals in the bond itself in assuming that at the time this bond was given the writ of attachment had not been returned by the sheriff, and consequently no need existed to follow the procedure of Code of Civil Procedure, § 555, by obtaining a court order for the release of the attachment.

COPE v. SUTTER COUNTY. (Civ. 3453.)★

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 21, 1928.

1. Counties 🔑129—Fact that bridge plans contained corporation's name held not to warrant finding that they were not prepared by engineer hired for that purpose.

In action by engineer against county for county's breach of contract to hire engineer to prepare plans and specifications and superintend construction of bridge, fact that name of corporation appeared on plans and specifications did not warrant court's finding that plans were not prepared by defendant, where his testimony that he prepared them was not contradicted.

2. Counties 🔑129—Finding that bridge plans submitted by engineer to county supervisors were incomplete and objectionable held not sustained, where supervisors ordered payment of substantial sum on plans submitted.

Finding, in action by civil engineer against county for breach of contract to employ him for preparing plans and specifications and superintending construction of bridge, that plans furnished were incomplete and not acceptable to county supervisors, was not sustained, where evidence showed that $2,000 was ordered to be paid engineer after submission of plans, and $2,000 after amendments thereto, and where plans were not rejected, but merely disregarded by supervisors.

3. Counties 🔑127—County held not entitled to terminate at will contract for employment of engineer to superintend construction of bridge.

County board of supervisors held not entitled to terminate at will contract employing engineer to prepare plans and specifications for, and to superintend construction of, bridge, where there was no provision in contract permitting county to discontinue the work or discharge the engineer.

4. Counties 🔑129—County which disregarded engineer hired to submit plans and superintend construction of bridge, and built bridge under others' plans, held liable for breach of contract.

County, having employed civil engineer to prepare plans and specifications for, and to superintend construction of, bridge, held liable for breach of contract to engineer, who submitted plans, and was ready to carry out his part of contract, where board of supervisors went ahead with building of bridge under plans submitted by county surveyor without declaring engineer's work insufficient or engineer incompetent.

5. Counties 🔑113(2)—Contract of old board of county supervisors, executed after election, held binding on newly elected board.

Contract of old board of supervisors, made between time new board was elected and the time such new board took office, was binding on the new board, and was not against public policy as depriving new board of its legislative function, since in legal contemplation the new board is identical with board entering into contract.

6. Counties 🔑122(1)—County's contract for employment of one not licensed architect for preparation of plans for bridge held valid (Pol. Code, § 4041).

Contract between county supervisors and civil engineer for preparation of plans and specifications and estimates for proposed bridge held not void on ground that engineer was not a licensed architect, since Pol. Code, § 4041, gives supervisors general authority to employ any one thought to be competent to do the work.

7. Counties 🔑129—Engineer held entitled to damages for contract price less cost of performance on county's repudiation of contract hiring him to prepare plans and superintend construction of bridge.

Civil engineer, who proved contract with county engaging him to prepare plans and specifications and to superintend construction of bridge, performance thereof on his part by preparing the plans and offering to superintend construction, and county supervisors' refusal to proceed with their part of contract, established prima facie case, entitling him to damages, in suit against county for full contract price, less the cost of performance.

8. Counties 🔑129—Burden to prove mitigation of engineer's damages on county's breach of contract employing him to superintend construction of bridge was on county.

Where engineer, employed by county to prepare plans for, and superintend construction of, bridge, proved performance of contract on his part and county's repudiation, burden to prove facts in mitigation of damages, representing the full contract price, less cost of performance, was on county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Erle L. Cope against the County of Sutter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Arthur Coats and Lawrence Schillig, both of Yuba City, for appellant.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff, Erle L. Cope, from a judgment in favor of defendant, County of Sutter, in an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiff and appellant is a civil engineer. On December 5, 1922, he was employed by the board of supervisors of Sutter county to prepare plans and specifications for, and to superintend the construction of, a bridge to be built by the county and known as "Nicolaus causeway." The contract of employment was in writing, and is as follows:

"This agreement made and entered into this 5th day of December, 1922, by and between Erle L. Cope, of Berkeley, Cal., and A. E. Schellenger, acting for and on behalf of the county of Sutter, and in the capacity of chairman of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, witnesseth:

"That, whereas it is necessary to extend the Nicolaus bridge from the present truss spans westerly to the river levee; and

"Whereas, at a regular meeting of the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter held on the 15th day of November, 1922, said board of supervisors decided to build this extension of reinforced concrete, and instructed Erle L. Cope to prepare plans and specifications for and to have borings made for said bridge; and

"Whereas, at a regular meeting of said board held on the 5th day of December, 1922, the chairman of the board was authorized to enter into a contract with Erle L. Cope, civil engineer, to draw plans and specifications and to superintend the construction of said bridge:

"Now, therefore, said Erle L. Cope hereby agrees to and with said county of Sutter to draw all plans and specifications and superintend the construction of a reinforced concrete bridge from the end of the present truss spans of the Nicolaus bridge westerly to the river levee, said bridge to be complete in all respects, including approaches, and to be in accordance with the requirements of the state reclamation board. Said plans and specifications to include copies not exceeding fifteen (15) in all, and to be complete with drawings and working plans in all respects for receiving bids for such construction.

"It is understood that by superintendence is meant that said Erle L. Cope shall make a visit to said bridge during the building thereof as often as required, and that he will at all times give his advice to said board concerning the construction of said bridge.

"And it is further understood that the inspectors on construction shall be selected by, and work under the direction of, said Erle L. Cope, and shall be paid by the county of Sutter.

"It is further agreed that, if said board chooses to make alterations or extensions in connection with said bridge, said Erle L. Cope will provide plans and specifications for such work, and shall superintend the same.

"And said county of Sutter, acting by and through the chairman of said board, hereby agrees that if, said Erle L. Cope shall fulfill all the terms and agreements of his employment herein contained, then it will pay said Erle L. Cope six (6) per cent. of the cost, said cost is understood to be the lower of engineer's estimate or accepted bids of said bridge with approaches as follows, to wit: Two thousand ($2,000) dollars on February 6, 1923, or on such earlier date that plans and specifications may be adopted by said board of supervisors; two thousand ($2,000) dollars on June 4, 1923; and the balance thereof monthly when payment is made for labor or materials, in the proportion that said payment bears to the total cost of the work.

"In witness whereof said parties have hereunto set their hands this 5th day of December, 1922. Erle L. Cope. A. E. Schellenger, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Sutter."

In accordance with the terms of this agreement, the appellant prepared plans and specifications and estimates of cost for the construction of this proposed bridge and also, at the request of said board of supervisors, prepared amended or supplemental plans and specifications, etc. The original plans and specifications, and estimates of costs, were filed with the said board of supervisors on February 6, 1923. The amended plans, specifications, and estimates were prepared by the appellant and filed with said board on March 5, 1923. None of these plans and specifications, etc., have ever been rejected, nor does it appear from the record that any of them were actually approved or adopted by said board of supervisors. The testimony shows that the two sets of plans and specifications were merely "ordered filed and taken under advisement by the board."

After appellant filed the original plans and specifications on February 6, 1923, he presented his claim to said board for $2,000; it being the first payment called for under the contract. The board passed the claim and ordered it paid, but the auditor refused to draw his warrant upon the treasurer therefor, and appellant instituted mandamus proceedings against the auditor, in which proceedings appellant finally prevailed, and received from the county this payment of $2,000. Cope v. Flannery, 70 Cal. App. 738, 234 P. 845.

After the decision in Cope v. Flannery, the second payment of $2,000, called for in the contract, was allowed by the board of supervisors, and paid by the auditor without litigation. Therefore, up to date, appellant has received $4,000 on account of said contract.

After filing the amended plans and specifications in March, 1923, appellant attended many meetings of the board of supervisors and insisted that he be allowed to proceed with his contract. He also wrote many letters to the board, requesting that he be allowed to proceed with the contract and superintend the construction of the bridge. The board of supervisors, however, entirely ignored appellant and his plans and specifications and said contract, and on January 7, 1924, passed the following resolution:

> "On motion, it was ordered that William Shearer, the county surveyor, be and he is hereby instructed and directed to prepare plans for a grade and bridge across Barrow Pit, at the approach of Nicolaus bridge."

Thereafter, plans and specifications were prepared by Mr. Shearer, the county surveyor, adopted by the board, and the bridge was constructed according to such plans and specifications at a cost of $169,850. The bridge was constructed at the same general location as contemplated in appellant's plans and specifications, but entirely according to the plans and specifications, and under the supervision, of the county surveyor.

After the board of supervisors had placed the superintending of the construction of the bridge entirely in the charge of Mr. Shearer, the county surveyor, appellant still insisted that he be allowed to carry out his contract and superintend the construction of the bridge, so, on March 16, 1925, said board of supervisors passed the following resolution:

> "On motion, it was ordered that Mr. Erle L. Cope be notified that Mr. William Shearer, county surveyor, will continue as representative and engineer of the county, on the construction of the 'Nicolaus causeway,' and that the contractor on said construction is not authorized to recognize any other person as such engineer and representative of the county. The foregoing order passed and adopted by unanimous vote of all members of said board."

This resolution was served upon appellant, and he was ordered off of the job. Appellant made no further attempt to superintend the work or attend any further meetings of the board of supervisors or have anything further to do with the construction of said bridge, but on the 1st day of June, 1925, presented his claim, which is the basis of this action, to the board of supervisors for $5,610, claiming that this amount is due him under the contract, calculated as follows:

Total fees, 6% of $166,000	$9,960 00
Less payments	4,000 00
Less expenses to fulfill	$ 350 00
Balance being damages sustained	$5,610 00

This claim was rejected by the board of supervisors, and this action followed. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the court made findings and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant.

The execution of the contract is admitted.

[1] Appellant strenuously insists that the material findings of the court are not supported by the evidence. The court, among other things, found that the plans and specifications for the bridge were prepared by Cope, Rand, Means Company, a corporation, under the supervision of the appellant, and not by the appellant, and for this reason appellant had violated the contract. The only testimony upon this question was that given by the appellant, which is as follows:

> "By the Court: Under whose direction were they drawn (plans and specifications)? A. My direction, and a good part of it was drawn by me personally.
> "Mr. Sweet: And are these the amended plans that you allege in your complaint you filed with the board of supervisors? A. Yes, sir."

It is true that the name of Cope, Rand, Means Company appears on the plans, but that is no proof that the plans were not prepared by, or under the direct supervision of, appellant, as he testified, and there is no testimony in the record that Cope, Rand, Means Company had anything to do with the original plans and specifications or the amended plans and specifications. Furthermore, these plans were before the board of supervisors when they ordered the two $2,000 payments made to appellant, and no objection whatever was then raised by the board that the plans and specifications were not prepared by appellant.

[2] The court also found "that said plans and specifications were incomplete and objectionable to said board of supervisors, and not satisfactory or acceptable to them, and were in violation of the terms of said contract." These plans and specifications were filed, and the board of supervisors made no formal order either approving or rejecting the same, but ordered appellant's claim for $2,000 paid. The board requested amended plans and specifications, which were furnished, and then the board ordered that appellant's second claim for $2,000 be paid. No other conclusion can be drawn from this action of the board than that the plans and specifications furnished by appellant were satisfactory to, and approved by, them. It would be unreasonable to assume that the board of supervisors would pay $4,000 of the county's money after receipt of the plans and specifications, and amended plans and specifications, if the same were not satisfactory, or were in violation of the contract. In view of this affirmative action by said board, certainly it could not be successfully contended that they rejected the plans, or that such plans and specifications were unsatisfactory to them, simply because no formal order of approval was entered on their minutes. The fact that the board called for amended plans is no evidence of dissatisfaction. The contract, on this point, provides:

> "It is further agreed that if said board chooses to make alterations or extensions in connection with said bridge, the said Erle L. Cope will provide plans and specifications for such work and shall superintend the same."

This simply indicates that the board reserved the right in the contract to have several sets of plans and specifications for the proposed bridge prepared, if necessary, in order to meet any changes or alterations that might be made in the construction of the bridge, which is a very common occurrence in the building of a bridge such as contemplated by said board. Therefore we are unable to find any evidence in the record that would support the finding that the plans and specifications furnished by appellant were incomplete or not acceptable to the said board of supervisors.

Other findings made by the trial court are also unsupported by the evidence. None of the supervisors testified in this case, and respondent has not pointed out any evidence that would in the slightest degree support the findings, and from a careful search of the entire record we are unable to discover any, but, on the contrary, find that all the evidence supports the contention of appellant, except on the question of damages, which we will refer to later.

[3, 4] Respondent contends that the board of supervisors had the right to terminate the contract at any time because there was no provision in the contract that the owner may not discontinue the work or discharge the engineer. There is no merit in this contention. There is no provision in the contract which permits the owner to discontinue the work or discharge the engineer, and, in the absence of such provision in the contract, it could certainly not be terminated and the engineer discharged without cause. Furthermore, the board of supervisors did not abandon the project; on the contrary, they built the bridge upon plans later prepared by the county surveyor. Neither did the board of supervisors declare the work of appellant insufficient or that the appellant himself was incompetent. They simply ignored the appellant altogether, as though he had no contract whatever with them, and proceeded without regard to their responsibility under the contract.

[5] Respondent also contends that, as the contract was made in December, between the time a new board was elected in November, and the time such new board took office in January, 1923, such contract is against public policy, because the outgoing board has contracted in advance what the new board shall do, and the new board thereby deprived of their legislative function, discretion, and power to act for the best interests of the county, in case the new board deems the bids too high or the plans unsatisfactory. There is no merit in this contention. In contemplation of law, it is wholly immaterial that the new board of supervisors had nothing to do with entering into the contract with appellant. In legal contemplation, the new board of supervisors is the same board that entered into the contract. California Highway Commission v. Riley, 192 Cal. 97, 218 P. 579. See, also, Cope v. Flannery, supra.

[6] The respondent contends, and the trial court found, that the contract was void because the appellant was not a licensed architect at the time he prepared the plans and specifications for said bridge. Respondent has cited no authority, and made no argument, in support of this finding. Section 4041 of the Political Code, which deals with the power of boards of supervisors to build bridges, etc., contains no provision that the board of supervisors, in securing plans and specifications and estimates for any proposed bridge, shall only employ licensed architects. Supervisors are given general authority, and may employ any one who, in their judgment, is competent to do the work. Cope v. Flannery, supra.

[7, 8] Appellant contends that the proper measure of damages is the full contract price, less the cost of performance, and offered evidence at the trial in support of this theory. His evidence tended to show that he had been damaged in the sum of $5,960. The county surveyor testified that, even under appellant's theory of damages, appellant would only be entitled to approximately $3,000.

No other testimony was offered on the question of damages; still, the trial court found that appellant had not been damaged in any sum whatever.

We are of the opinion that, when appellant has proven the contract, the performance thereof on his part by preparing and filing with the board of supervisors the plans and specifications, his offer to superintend the construction of the bridge, and respondent's refusal to proceed with the contract, then he has established at least a prima facie case, entitling him to recover as damages the full contract price, less the cost of performance. The record reveals that all these matters were fully established by appellant. This being true, then the burden was cast upon respondent to prove facts in mitigation of those damages. Vitagraph, Inc., v. Liberty Theatres, 197 Cal. 694, 699, 242 P. 709, and cases there cited. The finding of the court that "appellant has suffered no damages whatever" cannot stand, and it was incumbent upon the trial court to find the actual damages sustained by appellant from the evidence before it.

While there is no apparent reason for a retrial of any of the issues of fact, still, in view of the conflict in the evidence as to the amount of damages actually sustained by appellant and the erroneous finding of the court thereon, we think the judgment should be reversed, with directions to the trial court to render judgment in favor of appellant, either upon the evidence heretofore received or upon such further evidence as it may see fit to receive on the one question of damages, all future proceedings in the trial court to be in accordance with the views herein expressed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal and error ⚷766—Judgment will be affirmed for failure of record to show error, appellant on typewritten record claiming evidence insufficient, but not printing it or findings in brief (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and § 953c, as amended by St. 1923, p. 748).

Judgment appealed from a typewritten record under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, must be affirmed for failure of record to show error, appellants, required by section 953c, as amended by St. 1923, p. 748, to print in their brief or supplement thereto such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the appellate court, though basing their appeal on claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, not printing any of the findings which they attack, or any of the evidence on which they were based; that is, they, not printing any evidence or referring to any portion of the record, tending to show that the indebtedness in suit did not, as they claim, come within that class of indebtedness of a nonprofit co-operative corporation, for which they concede that they, as members thereof, are liable in the proportion that it was apparently adjudged against them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Fred A. Treat, Judge.

Action by Charles Lanini and others against H. Rost and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bacigalupi & Elkus, of San Francisco, and W. C. Theile, Chas. B. Rosendale, and W. S. White, all of Salinas, for appellants.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The defendants were sued as members of the Salinas Valley Dairymen's Association, a nonprofit co-operative corporation, for their proportionate share of an indebtedness created under the authority of the board of directors of the corporation. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which the defendants have appealed upon a typewritten record under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The single ground urged on the appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision, and that the decision is against law. We have said that this is a single ground, because the contention that the decision is against law is predicated wholly upon the theory that the decision is not supported by the evidence. The appellants have cited in their brief portions of the articles of incorporation and by-laws of the association, from which it appears that the organization was created for the purpose of marketing the dairy products of the members of the association, and that the property rights and interest of each member were unequal, being based upon the proportion which the amount of the membership fees actually paid in by each bore to the total amount of all membership fees paid by all members of the association. The by-laws contained a provision that all expenses of maintaining the association should be distributed over the entire volume and value of business, and charged against each member proportionately to the volume of business done by the association for each. We gather from the briefs that the trial court followed this method of apportioning the indebtedness found to be due the respondents, and rendered judgment against the respective appellants accordingly.

It is the contention of the appellants that each member of the association was individually and personally liable for an equal share of its debts and liabilities, unless a different measure of liability was fixed by the association in its articles of incorporation or by-laws. Having quoted one paragraph of the by-laws fixing the liability of the members for expenses of maintaining the association, the appellants then argue that the indebtedness upon which the respondents sue was created for a capital expenditure upon the plant of the association, which cannot be treated as an expense of maintenance under this provision of the by-laws. Respondents appropriately reply that the appellants have failed to quote other material portions of the articles of incorporation and by-laws; that they have failed to print in their brief any portion of the evidence heard by the trial court; that they have failed to print any of the twenty-one exhibits offered in evidence; and that this evidence and these exhibits were offered for the purpose of enabling the trial court to interpret the meaning of the articles of incorporation and by-laws touching the liability of the members of the association. For these reasons the respondents insist that the judgment must be affirmed because of appellants' failure to meet the terms of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, which require an appellant who has taken an appeal under sections 953a et seq. to print in his brief or in the supplement thereto such portion of the record as he desires to call to the attention of the appellate court. The failure of the appellants to comply with the terms of these sections is inexcusable in a case such as this, where the appeal is based upon a claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court. They do not print any of the findings which they attack or any of the evidence upon which the findings were based. They concede that they are liable for the debts incurred by the association during their period of membership, but they do not contend that they were not members at the time that any of this indebtedness arose. They concede that they are liable in proportion to the amount of business done by the association for them for all debts incurred in the maintenance of the association, but they do not print any evidence, or refer us to any portion of the record, which would tend to show that the indebtedness here in suit did not come within that category.

The case is controlled by Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 358, 233 P. 330, where the court had occasion to consider the failure of an appellant to comply with section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 748), and held that a judgment appealed from in such manner should be affirmed on the ground that the record failed to show error. The rule of that case requires an affirmance of the judgment.

HASENJEAGER v. VOTH et al. (Civ. 3434.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 28, 1928.

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑15—Pronounced insolvency is strong circumstance of fraudulent intent in conveyance.

While insolvency alone does not establish that conveyance was in fraud of creditors, pronounced insolvency is a strong circumstance of fraudulent intent.

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑261—Allegation that grantor in conveyance in alleged fraud of creditors was insolvent is sufficient, without alleging particular facts constituting insolvency (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591, to set aside a conveyance as being in fraud of creditors, as regards allegation of insolvency, it is sufficient to allege that grantor was insolvent, without alleging the particular facts constituting insolvency under the Bankruptcy Act (11 USCA).

3. Evidence 🔑56—Solvency and not insolvency is presumed.

Solvency and not insolvency is presumed.

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑297—Plaintiff seeking to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance must show grantor's insolvency by clear and satisfactory evidence.

The burden of establishing insolvency at time of conveyance in alleged fraud of creditors is on plaintiff seeking to set aside such conveyance, and such insolvency should be shown by clear and satisfactory evidence.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑297—Evidence held sufficient to justify finding that grantor in alleged fraudulent conveyance was solvent (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591, to set aside conveyance alleged to have been made with intent to defraud creditors, evidence, together with presumption of solvency, held sufficient to justify finding against plaintiff's allegation of insolvency of grantor.

6. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(1)—Evidence held to show valuable consideration for conveyance alleged to have been made with intent to defraud creditors (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591; Civ. Code, § 3442).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591, to set aside conveyance alleged to have been made by grantor to her daughter with intent to defraud creditors, evidence that value of land was $5,625, that grantee assumed debts amounting to a little over $3,500, and agreed to take care of grantor and her husband as long as they lived, held to show a sufficient and valuable consideration, removing transaction from operation of Civ. Code, § 3442.

7. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑277(1)—Fraud never being presumed, plaintiff seeking to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance has burden of proving gross inadequacy of consideration.

Since fraud is never presumed, burden rested on plaintiff seeking to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance to prove not a mere insufficiency but a gross inadequacy of consideration, while defendants were required neither to allege nor prove the adequacy of consideration.

8. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑15—Grant of temporary preference to local vendors of necessary goods, wares, and merchandise is not badge of fraud (Civ. Code, §§ 3432, 3451).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3432, 3451, the grant of a temporary preference to local vendors of necessary goods, wares, and merchandise is not a badge of fraud.

9. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑295(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that conveyance alleged to have been made with intent to defraud creditors was not fraudulent (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589–1591, to set aside conveyance alleged to have been made with intent to defraud creditors, evidence held to sustain finding that conveyance was not fraudulent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by A. C. Hasenjeager, as administrator of the estate of Elizabeth R. Peters, deceased, against Helena Voth, A. D. Voth, and another, to set aside a conveyance. Judgment for the named defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Rowen Irwin and Rollin Laird, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

BUCK, Justice pro tem. This is an action by an administrator to set aside a conveyance alleged to have been made by decedent to her daughter, the defendant Helena Voth, with the intent to defraud creditors. The action was brought under the provisions of sections 1589 to 1591, Code of Civil Procedure, and was brought to protest the claim of the First National Bank of Bakersfield in the sum of $3,205, which was the only claim filed in the estate. The defendant A. D. Voth was evidently joined in his capacity as husband of the defendant Helena Voth, while the defendant John R. Peters was the husband of the decedent and was jointly liable on the note in question. But the property covered by the conveyance was owned by the decedent, Elizabeth R. Peters, though the husband joined in the deed.

Findings and judgment were entered in favor of the defendants Helena Voth and A. D. Voth, and the plaintiff appeals.

The sole ground of appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain certain findings of the trial court to the effect that the conveyance was not made with the intent to defraud creditors, but was made for an adequate and valuable consideration, and that the deceased, at the time of the conveyance, was in possession of other property sufficient to discharge all of her indebtedness due at that time. The findings attacked may be deemed to have been made in response to the allegation in the complaint "that the said conveyance was fraudulently made with intent to defraud creditors, and at the time of the making of said conveyance the said Elizabeth R. Peters * * * was insolvent, and the defendant John R. Peters was * * * and is insolvent." It will be noted that the complaint does not allege that the conveyance in question was a voluntary conveyance or made without adequate consideration. The answer, however, put in issue the allegations of the complaint touching the alleged insolvency of the defendants, as follows:

> "Defendants deny on their information and belief that said Elizabeth R. Peters or the said John R. Peters were either of them insolvent, but, on the contrary, upon their information and belief allege that the said Elizabeth R. Peters and John R. Peters owned and were in possession of other property sufficient in value to pay off and discharge all indebtedness both owing to said First National Bank of Bakersfield and other creditors."

And as regards the allegation that the "conveyance was fraudulent and made with intent to defraud creditors," the defendants in their answer "deny that said conveyance was fraudulent, made with intent to defraud creditors, but, on the contrary, allege the fact to be that said conveyance was made for a valuable and adequate consideration."

[1] At the outstart it may be noted that the complaint, since it failed to charge that the conveyance was without consideration, does not attempt by its allegations to charge fraud in law as designated in section 3442 of the Civil Code. Franck v. Moran, 36 Cal. App. 32, 171 P. 841. The complaint attempts simply to charge fraud in fact, without any further specifications of fact than to allege that the conveyance was made with intent to defraud and that the grantor was insolvent. And while insolvency alone does not establish fraud, "pronounced insolvency is a strong circumstance of fraudulent intent." Cook v. Cockins, 117 Cal. 140, 48 P. 1025.

[2-4] As regards the allegation of insolvency, it has been held that it is sufficient to allege that the grantor "was insolvent, without alleging the probative facts constituting insolvency under the Bankrupt Act [11 USCA]." Gray v. Brunold, 140 Cal. 615, 619, 74 P. 303, 305. But it is also the rule that solvency and not insolvency is presumed. 1 Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 425. Also the burden of establishing insolvency at the time of the conveyance is on the plaintiff. As stated in the case of Parkinson Bros. v. Figel, 24 Cal. App. 701, at page 711, 142 P. 135, 140, insolvency should be shown by "clear and satisfactory evidence to have warranted a finding." And in the case at bar, though the defendant did, after making a sufficient denial of insolvency, gratuitously allege that the defendants Peters "owned and were in possession of other property sufficient in value to pay off and discharge all indebtedness both owing to said First National Bank in Bakersfield and other creditors," the burden rested, not upon them to prove this gratuitous allegation, but the burden still rested upon the plaintiff to show, by clear and satisfactory evidence, that the said grantor was insolvent.

[5] The evidence pertaining to the financial situation of the grantors at the time of the conveyance, as stated by appellant, is as follows:

> "On February 1, 1924, Elizabeth Peters and John Peters, her husband, were the owners of approximately 25 acres of land near Shafter in Kern county. They owed the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association the sum of approximately $2,600 principal secured by a mortgage on the land. They owed about $500 in miscellaneous bills and the sum of $3,000 to the First National Bank in Bakersfield, evidenced by a note, all of which was unsecured. The value of the land was estimated at between $5,625 and $7,500."

It is alleged in the complaint and admitted in the answer that the land conveyed was owned solely by the decedent.

But, in addition to the foregoing, without any objection on the part of the appellant, there was testimony adduced to the effect that the grantors were the owners of 400 acres of land in Canada, and that "if they could sell it they would pay" the National Bank of Bakersfield, "and that, though she could not herself handle the Canada property from here," she "had to assign the land first to somebody else to make a loan. She was going to do that and then pay the bank off." The foregoing testimony, coupled with the presumption of solvency, would seem to be sufficient to justify the trial court in finding against plaintiff's allegations of insolvency. And, furthermore, learned counsel for plaintiff made no attempt to modify or qualify or in any way to weaken the inference that could be drawn from the foregoing testimony as regards the land in Canada. Cook v. Cockins, 117 Cal. 140, at page 155, 48 P. 1025.

[6, 7] As regards the finding based upon the gratuitous allegation in the answer that the conveyance to Helena Voth was made for an adequate and valuable consideration, there is evidence tending to show that the value of the land was $5,625, being 25 acres at a valuation placed thereon of $225 per acre, whereas the testimony showed that the amount of the debts assumed by the defendant in consideration of the transfer was "a little over $3,500." In addition to this, there was testimony to the effect that the defendant agreed to take care of her mother and father as long as they lived. But it is the claim of appellant that, by reason of this agreement to take care of the father and mother, there was no adequate consideration for the deed notwithstanding the fact that the defendant had agreed to assume and pay the indebtedness in the amount stated. But, as stated in numerous citations in 27 Corpus Juris, p. 533:

> "The assumption of bona fide debts of the grantor by the grantee is a valuable and sufficient consideration for the conveyance or transfer of the former's property, unless it is materially greater in value than the amount of the debts assumed."

Also, as stated in Manning v. App. Con. Gold Min. Co., 171 Cal. 610, at page 615, 154 P. 301, 303:

> "The promise of a grantee to pay a grantor's indebtedness is a valuable consideration. Saunderson v. Broadwell, 82 Cal. 133, 23 P. 36; Gladwin v. Garrison, 13 Cal. 332; Carty v. Connolly, 91 Cal. 19, 27 P. 599; Greenwalt v. Mueller, 126 Cal. 639, 59 P. 137. Such assumption removes the transaction from the operation of section 3442 of the Civil Code. The same principle was announced by the Supreme Court of Nevada in Ivancovich v. Stern, 14 Nev. 341."

And since fraud is never presumed, the burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove not a mere insufficiency but a gross inadequacy of consideration; while the defendants were required neither to allege nor prove the adequacy of the consideration. Denehy v. Stewart, 41 Cal. App. 88, 98, 181 P. 839.

It is therefore clear that the principle applied in the cases of Baxter v. Baxter, 19 Cal. App. 238, 125 P. 359, and Potts v. Mehrmann, 50 Cal. App. 622, 195 P. 941, does not apply in the instant case, because in each of those cases the future support was the sole and only consideration; and there was no evidence as in the case at bar tending to show other property.

[8, 9] As regards the court's finding that the conveyance was not fraudulently made or made with the intent to defraud creditors, the evidence is very far from establishing the fraud attempted to be relied upon, for the reason that there is neither any clear showing that the grantors were insolvent, nor that the value of the property was materially greater than the amount of the debts assumed, nor was there any evidence of any desire on the part of the grantors to hinder, delay, or defraud any of the creditors, nor any desire on their part, other than to protect the creditors; or possibly to grant a temporary preference to local vendors of necessary goods, wares, and merchandise. In this state such a preference is not a badge of fraud. Sections 3432, 3451, Civ. Code; Heath v. Wilson, 139 Cal. 362, 366, 73 P. 182.

Taking the evidence as a whole, it would seem that this is a case where the circumstances of the transfer comport at least equally with the theory of honesty and fair dealing, and that, therefore, the trial court was justified in refusing a finding that the conveyance was the result of fraud practiced either by the grantor or the grantee, or by both of them acting together. Byerley v. Conlin, 174 Cal. 40, 161 P. 1150; Arakelian v. Sears, 53 Cal. App. 646, 200 P. 757; Denehy v. Stewart, 41 Cal. App. 88, at page 96, 181 P. 839.

him as such surviving husband a homestead in wife's separate property for a limited period, irrespective of rights in property acquired by judgment creditor as against surviving husband as an heir at law by reason of execution sale under judgment.

3. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Question as to effect of sale under execution on probate homestead became moot after expiration of year to which homestead was limited (Code Civ. Proc. § 1468).

Where surviving husband's homestead in wife's separate property was properly limited to a period of one year, question arising on appeal relative to right of judgment creditor of surviving husband under execution sale of his interest as an heir at law became moot after expiration of limitation of one year placed on homestead; property thereon, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1468, becoming subject to further administration.

4. Homestead 🔑150(1)—Probate court, in determining limitation of homestead, may consider demands of family, value of homestead, financial condition of estate, and rights of creditors (Code Civ. Proc. § 1468).

Probate court, in determining question of limitation of homestead enjoyment, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1468, may take into consideration, outside from demands of family, the value of the homestead to be set apart, financial condition of the estate, and the rights of creditors, though demands of family are deemed paramount to those of creditors.

5. Homestead 🔑150(1)—Discretion of probate court in limiting period of homestead will not be interfered with on appeal, unless abused.

Probate court, in limiting period of homestead enjoyment, is not bound by wishes of claimant, but must exercise its own discretion and good judgment, which will not be interfered with on appeal, unless discretion is abused.

6. Homestead 🔑144—Probate court under facts did not abuse discretion in limiting surviving husband's homestead in wife's separate property to one year (Code Civ. Proc. § 1468).

Probate court did not abuse its discretion, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1468, in limiting homestead of surviving husband to period of one year under evidence showing that wife's separate property consisted of dwelling house purchased for $27,500, and incumbered by mortgages aggregating $22,750, and disclosing indebtedness in the sum of $6,000, with other property of the estate of an estimated value of $1,800.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Application by Thomas J. Barkley, administrator of the estate of Sannie S. Barkley, deceased, for an order setting apart a probate homestead, opposed by Banque Belge Pour L'Etranger, a judgment creditor of the administrator. From an order setting aside the homestead and limiting it to a period of one year, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Garton D. Keyston and Walter Slack, both of San Francisco, for Barkley.

Derby, Sharp, Quinby & Tweedt, Derby, Single & Sharp, Joseph C. Sharp, and Lloyd M. Tweedt, all of San Francisco, for Banque Belge Pour L'Etranger.

KNIGHT, J. Pursuant to proceedings had in conformity with the provisions of part 3, title 11, chapter 5, article I, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo, on August 2, 1926, made an order setting apart to Thomas J. Barkley, surviving husband of Sannie S. Barkley, deceased, a probate homestead selected from the separate property of the deceased and limited to a period of one year, from which order two appeals have been taken, one by the said Barkley, claiming that the limitation placed upon the duration of the homestead constituted an abuse of discretion, and the other by Banque Belge Pour L'Etranger, a judgment creditor of Barkley's, claiming to have acquired whatever interest Barkley had in said property as an heir at law or otherwise, by virtue of an execution sale held subsequent to the death of Barkley's wife, and prior to the filing of his petition to set apart a homestead.

The essential facts are as follows: Sannie S. Barkley died October 1, 1922, intestate, survived by her husband, Thomas J. Barkley, and an adult son, William S. Barkley. On January 16, 1923, the Banque Belge Pour L'Etranger, hereinafter referred to as the bank, recovered a judgment against Barkley and his son, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name of the Barkley Company, in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, for the sum of $26,763.91. Two days thereafter, and on January 18, 1923, Thomas J. Barkley was appointed administrator of the estate of his deceased wife by the superior court in and for San Mateo county. On October 8, 1923, the judgment obtained by the bank against the Barkleys was recorded in the office of the county recorder of San Mateo county, and two years thereafter, to wit, on October 29, 1925, a writ of execution issued, pursuant to which the sheriff of San Mateo county levied upon and sold all of the interests of said Thomas J. Barkley and William S. Barkley in the premises subsequently set apart to Thomas J. Barkley as a probate homestead. The bank became the purchaser at the sale, and on the same day the sheriff's certificate of sale was delivered to the bank, and recorded in the office of the recorder of San Mateo county. About six months subsequent to the recordation thereof, and on April 5, 1926, the said Thomas J. Barkley petitioned the court to set apart said premises to him as a probate homestead, and, after due notice, said petition was heard, and on August 2, 1926, was granted, the court limiting the period of the homestead, however, to one year.

The Code of Civil Procedure provides in effect that, if there has been no homestead selected and recorded during the lifetime of the decedent, of if one has been selected by the survivor out of the separate property of the decedent in which the decedent did not join, the court must select a probate homestead (section 1465); and that, if the property set apart as a probate homestead is selected from the separate property of the decedent, the court can set it apart for only a limited period, to be designated in the order, and, subject to said homestead right, the property remains subject to administration (section 1468).

[1] It has been held uniformly that the foregoing Code provisions are mandatory in their operation (Estate of Mason, 76 Cal. App. 315, 244 P. 629; Estate of Burton, 63 Cal. 36), and that it becomes the imperative duty of the probate court upon proper application to set apart such a homestead where the deceased was in possession of the property at the time of death (Estate of Shively, 145 Cal. 400, 78 P. 869; Estate of Burton, supra), irrespective of any question of asserted adverse title (Estate of Klumpke, 167 Cal. 415, 139 P. 1062; Estate of Kimberly, 97 Cal. 281, 32 P. 234; Estate of Groome, 94 Cal. 69, 29 P. 487), and even though the estate is insolvent, and the property set apart constitutes the entire estate of the decedent (Estate of Mason, supra; Estate of Levy, 141 Cal. 646, 75 P. 301, 99 Am. St. Rep. 92). The sole restriction imposed is that, if the homestead be selected from the separate property of the decedent, it can be set apart only for a limited period, to be designated in the order, and that, subject to such homestead right, the property remains subject to administration. Section 1468, supra. Furthermore, it is held that the right of the surviving spouse to a probate homestead is independent of, and in addition to, any other right or property he or she may have, whether acquired under the will of the decedent or otherwise (Estate of Firth, 145 Cal. 236, 78 P. 643); that the order setting apart such homestead confers but a privilege and vests in the homestead claimant no estate in law or equity in the homestead premises (Estate of Vance, 100 Cal. 425, 34 P. 1087; Estate of Burton, supra; Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437), which is the subject of sale (Estate of Moore, supra; 11 Cal. Jur. 598), the effect of the order being to withdraw the property designated therein from administration, but not operating to qualify or affect any title which may vest in the survivor at the instant of the death of the other spouse (Saddlemire v. Stockton Savings & Loan Society, 144 Cal. 650, 79 P. 381, and cases cited therein).

[2] In the present proceeding, therefore, it would appear that, irrespective of whatever rights in the property the bank may have acquired as against Barkley as an heir at law by reason of the execution sale, the latter was not deprived of the right under the mandatory provisions of said Code sections to have set apart to him as surviving husband a homestead for a limited period. Keyes v. Cyrus, 100 Cal. 322, 34 P. 722, 38 Am. St. Rep. 296.

The cases of Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 P. 254, and In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 P. 568, cited by the bank in support of its contention that the right to have a probate homestead set apart for a limited period is not absolute, but rests in the discretion of the court, are entirely foreign to the issue here, having arisen under section 1474 of the said Code relating to the rights of the survivor to statutory homesteads selected during coverture. Nor does the fact that the value of the property in question exceeded $5,000 alter the situation; it being well settled that there is no specified limitation of value in case of a probate homestead. Estate of Levy, supra, and cases cited.

[3] For the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that the grounds urged for reversal by the bank are without merit. Moreover, and in any event, it would appear that, if it be held on Barkley's appeal, as we think it must, that the probate court did not abuse its discretion in limiting the duration of the homestead period to one year, the question presented by the bank's appeal has become moot, because, whether or not the fact of the execution sale operated to divest the probate court of its power to set apart a homestead for a limited period, it is evident that the limitation of one year placed thereon by the court has long since expired, and consequently, pursuant to the provisions of said section 1468, upon the expiration of such period, the property became, and is now, subject to further administration. Estate of Krieg, 173 Cal. 721, 161 P. 257.

[4, 5] Turning, then, to the question presented by Barkley's appeal, it may be stated generally that the law establishes no fixed rules by which the probate court shall be controlled in the exercise of its discretion in fixing the length of time a limited probate homestead shall be enjoyed. Obviously, the purpose of the law in this respect is to make provision for the support and maintenance of the family. Keyes v. Cyrus, supra. But, in determining the question of the limitation of the homestead enjoyment, the probate court may take into consideration, aside from the demands of the family, the value of the homestead to be set apart (Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 158, 34 P. 667), the financial condition of the estate (Estate of Levy, supra; Estate of Adams, 128 Cal. 380, 57 P. 569, 60 P. 965), and the rights of the creditors; and, although the demands of the family are deemed paramount to those of the creditors, the rights of the latter are not to be entirely disregarded (Estate of Adams, supra). It is not bound by the wishes of the homestead claimant, but should exercise its own discretion and good judgment, and its decision in fixing the duration of the homestead period will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is manifest that the discretionary power thus vested has been exercised in an unreasonable and arbitrary manner (In re Schmidt, 94 Cal. 334, 29 P. 714; Estate of Firth, supra); it having been held in one case that the action of the probate court in setting aside a homestead until final distribution only was not unreasonable under the circumstances there present (Estate of Levy, supra).

[6] The evidence adduced in the present proceeding shows that the property in question consisted of a dwelling house in the city of Hillsborough, containing fourteen rooms, and surrounded by grounds and gardens. The property was purchased by the decedent for a consideration of $27,500, and at the time of the hearing the same was incumbered with two mortgages aggregating $22,750. The evidence further discloses that the estate is indebted in the sum of $6,000, and that, aside from the personal property in the dwelling, which Barkley estimated to be of the value of $1,800, the property in question constitutes the entire assets of the estate; furthermore, that the taxes on the property had not been paid for several years, and that Barkley had continued to occupy the property ever since the death of his wife in 1922.

Under the foregoing circumstances, we are of the opinion that no abuse of discretion has been shown. The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

McCOLGAN v. BANK OF CALIFORNIA NAT. ASS'N et al. (Civ. 6247.)★

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 26, 1928.

1. Principal and agent 🔑43(1)—Agency, unless coupled with interest, terminates on principal's death.

Agency terminates on death of principal, unless agency is coupled with an interest.

2. Principal and agent 🔑43(2)—"Power, coupled with an interest," involves beneficial interest in subject or power given as security.

To create a "power coupled with an interest," which will survive death of principal, there must coexist with the power a beneficial interest in the subject which is enforceable in the name of the attorney in fact, or a power must be given as security for payment of money other than that arising as compensation through the exercise of the power, or as security for the performance of some act of value.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Power Coupled with an Interest.]

3. Brokers 🔑9—Contract between landowner and land company for subdivision of land into lots and sale thereof at minimum price, dividing profits over stated amount, held not to give company interest, surviving death of principal.

Contract by which landowner placed property in hands of land company to be subdivided into lots, and sold at not less than minimum price, with provisions for division of profits over stated amount, and for owner's limitation of amount of improvements which might become charged against the land, held to create agency which terminated on death of property owner, and not to give company interest in land involving "power coupled with on interest," which survives principal's death.

4. Brokers 🔑9—Power to subdivide land and sell lots, retaining portion of profits over certain amount, is not coupled with an interest.

One authorized to lay off land into lots and sell the lots dividing the proceeds above a certain amount with the owner does not have a power, coupled with an interest, such as will survive the death of the owner of the land.

5. Principal and agent 🔑43(2)—Agent must have interest derived from power or property in question to give him "power coupled with an interest."

In order that a power may be a "power coupled with an interest," agent must have an interest derived from the power or from something else in the property in reference to which the power is given; mere payment in consideration of power being insufficient.

6. Brokers 🔑9—Provision in contract authorizing agent to subdivide and sell lots that agreement was coupled with interest held ineffectual to give agent interest surviving owner's death.

Contract by which landowner authorized land company to subdivide land into lots charging improvements to the land, and selling the lots at a minimum price, dividing proceeds over stated amount, did not give land company a power coupled with an interest in the land surviving owner's death by virtue of provision in contract that "this agreement is coupled with an interest, and is only revocable by the consent of the parties hereto."

7. Trusts 🔑25(1)—Trust will not be impressed on realty to secure performance of personal contract, unless intent to do so is expressly stated.

Trust will not be impressed on realty to insure the performance of a purely personal contract, in the absence of words expressly showing such an intent.

8. Trusts 🔑1—Trust must require some act on part of trustee inuring to beneficiary.

Trust must have a purpose, and require for its fulfillment some act on the part of the trustee inuring to the beneficiary.

9. Trusts 🔑30½(1)—Contract authorizing land company to subdivide land into lots, and sell lots to prospective purchasers, held not to create trust upon land.

Contract between landowner and land company by which the company was to subdivide land into lots, and transfer the property to purchasers which it should procure, held not to create either express or resulting trust, since no act was required on part of land company as trustee inuring to any beneficiary.

10. Brokers 🔑77—Land company, authorized to subdivide property into lots, and sell lots, charging owner's share of profits with moneys advanced, held not entitled to lien for advancements, where no profits were ever realized.

Land company, which failed to realize any profits for landowner under contract whereby it undertook to subdivide lots and sell them, retaining sufficient to liquidate its claim for money advanced from landowner's share of profits, held not entitled to lien for moneys advanced, though contract gave express lien for moneys advanced for particular purpose of laying out streets.

11. Brokers 🔑77—Land company held not entitled to lien for expenses in carrying property under contract given lien for moneys advanced for subdividing tract and laying out streets.

Land company, authorized to subdivide land into lots, and sell the lots, retaining part of profits, and deducting from owner's share sufficient to liquidate claims for moneys advanced him, and given lien for expense of subdivision and laying out streets, held not entitled to lien for expenses in "carrying" the property, in view of rule that the expression of the one is the exclusion of the other, especially where no profits had been realized.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by R. McColgan against the Bank of California National Association, the Co-operative Land Company, and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant last named, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

John L. McNab and Byron Coleman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a final judgment and decree to the extent that the judgment is against plaintiff and in favor of defendant Co-operative Land Company, a corporation. The action, as instituted, was against other defendants, but since then plaintiff has acquired all of the interest of the remaining defendants.

The action was one to quiet title. The court below found and decreed that plaintiff was not entitled to have his title quieted against Co-operative Land Company, and found necessarily that said Co-operative Land Company had and has an interest in the real estate in controversy valid and substantial, and by the decree confirmed.

The entire controversy hinges about the construction of certain contracts, and the one definite question to be answered relates to the nature of the power created by these contracts. Therefore, with some particularity of detail, we relate the facts as the record here discloses them.

At the outset, we do not deem it necessary to give any description of the property involved other than to state that it comprises certain tracts of land situated in the town of Mayfield, county of Santa Clara, Cal. The land involved is rather extensive, and a surveyed description of it long, and no useful purpose can be served by further particularization. The real estate was formerly owned in fee by one Percy Beamish, and both parties here derive their title through him. It is conceded that the title of Beamish was good and sufficient, and comprised the fee. On October 28, 1904, Beamish entered into a contract with the Co-operative Land & Trust Company (a corporation). Here it may be noted that this corporation subsequently changed its name to Co-operative Land Company, respondent here. To avoid further specification or confusion, whether referring to it before or after the change of name, this corporation will hereinafter be called the land company. This contract was substantially as follows: Beamish, in consideration of the covenants and agreements on the part of the land company, and in consideration of services and money advanced by said land company, by the terms of this agreement, agrees to place the following described property in the hands of the land company, with power to control the same as hereinafter stated: [Here follows description of the lands, being lands here involved.] Beamish further covenants and agrees that the control of said property shall remain and be exclusively in the hands of the land company until the lands are finally sold and disposed of, and all the terms and conditions of this agreement are fulfilled, settled, and adjudged, and all the affairs in connection therewith fully concluded. Out of the proceeds of the sale of said property, it is agreed and understood that Beamish shall receive not less than the sum of $300 per acre, and the tract contains approximately 20 acres. Beamish covenants and agrees to give, and does give, full power and authority to the land company to lay out streets and avenues on the property, and subdivide said property into lots and acres, or in any way, and to sell the same in any part or parts, piece or parcel, or in any manner, the land company sees fit, and Beamish ratifies and confirms all acts and deeds of the land company in regard to laying out of streets, subdivisions, and sales. Beamish further agrees to make a good and sufficient deed to any part of said land to any party named by the land company.

Beamish agrees that the land company shall have full power and control of the selling price of the land, and that the land company may fix or change said price at will, provided, however, that the prices to be fixed for subdivisions by the land company shall not be fixed so as in the aggregate to produce a less sum than $9,000 for the entire tract, plus the amount to be expended in improvements as hereinafter stated by the land company. If at any time it shall be necessary to reduce the prices of subdivisions of said tract below the figure stated, it is understood and agreed that it may be done only after the written assent of Beamish shall have been given. Beamish covenants and agrees to give the land company 5 per cent. commission on the selling price of said land, also that one-half of the net profits on the sales of said land above the average price of $300 an acre shall belong to the land company, after deducting 5 per cent. commission on the gross selling price. Also that all interest on sales, mortgages, and notes above the average price of $300 per acre shall be considered as profits, and equally divided between the parties. No division of profits shall take place until Beamish shall have been paid $6,000, plus all taxes paid by him, and the land company shall have been reimbursed for money expended in making the improvements herein specified. Thereafter the profits shall be divided every 90 days.

All deeds shall be given by Beamish or his trustee for that purpose created, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns. All trust deeds, mortgages, and notes shall be made to Beamish, and the same and all papers in connection therewith shall be deposited with, and kept by, First National Bank of Palo Alto in trust for all parties concerned; and for said purpose it is hereby agreed that said bank shall be the trustee of the parties hereto.

It is agreed that all expenses and costs of surveying said tract and the cost of laying out, grading, turnpiking, and graveling, and other improvement of streets, is to be paid for by the land company, and is to be considered and become a charge against the land, and added to the net selling price of $300 per acre; provided, however, that the land company shall begin the work of improving said tract within 30 days from the signing of the contract, and shall complete the same, and place said tract on the market for sale within 3 months thereafter. It is further agreed that the land company shall expend no greater sum in making said improvements than $500 without first obtaining the consent in writing of Beamish; it being the purpose of this clause to give Beamish the power to limit the amount which by improvement may become a charge against the land.

It is agreed that all taxes shall be paid by Beamish and be a charge on the land, and added to the net selling price of $300 per acre. The expense of advertising and selling the land shall be at the proper cost and charge of the land company. At any time Beamish may demand a statement of account and conditions from the trustee and the land company, and it shall be the duty of either or both to furnish such a statement when demanded.

It is further agreed that the terms of sale may be cash, or that purchaser of land may pay one-fourth in cash at time of sale, one-fourth in one year, and one-half in two years after the date of sale, with privilege of paying any amount at any time, any unpaid balance of the purchase price to be secured by mortgage on the property sold, with note bearing interest at 8 per cent. per annum; or sales may be made on contract for deed on the payment of one-tenth of the selling price in cash, and the balance in twenty-four monthly payments, with interest at 6 per cent. added pro rata to each monthly payment. Where a mortgage is given, the mortgagee to pay the taxes; where contract for deed is taken, the purchaser is to pay the taxes.

This agreement is coupled with an interest, and is only revocable by the consent of the parties hereto; but it is understood that for breach of covenant either party may rescind.

On February 28, 1905, a rider was executed by the parties to this agreement and affixed to the first contract. This rider provided that the land company shall have, and is thereby given, power to execute contracts for the sale of the land described, which said contracts shall be binding upon Percy Beamish. All contracts, however, are to be made subject to the terms of the first agreement, and this authority is to be considered and construed as a part of the original agreement.

On the 6th day of November, 1908. this contract with the rider was recorded in miscellaneous records of Santa Clara county.

Thereafter on June 10, 1907, Percy Beamish entered into another contract with the land company, which latter contract is substantially as follows:

Beamish, in consideration of the agreement thereafter contained, and for and in consideration of the contract of October 28, 1904. makes these additional covenants and agreements to be added to, and make a part of, the agreement of October 28, 1904, and this present agreement shall be made a part of, and construed with, the former agreement, and, whenever the agreements may conflict, this later agreement shall control.

Beamish agrees that the land company shall have full power and control of the selling price and terms of sale of the lands, and may make and fix or change said price at will, and this control of the selling price by the land company shall be absolute, and Beamish ratifies and confirms all that the land company may do in making agreements of sale of said land and fixing the price thereof.

It is further agreed that, after Beamish has been paid the full sum of $6,000 as provided in original contract, all money received thereafter for the sale of the land shall be divided equally between the parties. The land company waives the 5 per cent. commission as specified in the original contract. It is further agreed that all expenses of surveying and subdividing the land, and the cost of laying out, grading, turnpiking, and graveling, laying sidewalks, water pipes, and other improvements of streets, commissions of agents other than the land company, advertising and selling said tract, shall be paid equally share and share alike by the parties hereto. There is then a provision that an outstanding mortgage in the sum of $2,250 shall be paid by Beamish, together with the taxes for 1906 and 1907.

It is then agreed that the land company may retain from the one-half of net profits that may become due to Beamish a sufficient sum to pay the mortgage referred to or to make partial releases thereof, together with interest and taxes thereon. It is also provided that the land company shall retain from the Beamish profits sufficient sums to liquidate any claim for money that has been advanced to Beamish by the land company. All sales made by the land company heretofore are ratified and confirmed.

It is understood by this agreement that it is the intention that it shall be so considered and construed that all the expenses of any kind and nature attending the sale of the land shall be borne equally between the parties, and that thereafter the net profits shall be divided share and share alike, providing the share of the net profits belonging to Beamish shall be first charged as hereinbefore specified.

This contract was likewise recorded on November 10, 1908, in miscellaneous records of Santa Clara county, Cal.

On March 12, 1912, Percy Beamish conveyed the real property by deed of trust to R. McColgan and C. H. Williams, as trustees for D. A. McColgan as beneficiary, and as security for a loan to Percy Beamish. On March 22, 1915, the trustees under the trust deed conveyed the property by deed to D. A. McColgan. Thereafter, on or about September 19, 1924, plaintiff, R. McColgan, became the record owner of said property by reason of various mesne conveyances subsequent to said conveyance to D. A. McColgan by the trustees.

Prior to the commencement of this action, there had been fully paid to the land company all expenses and costs of surveying and subdividing the tract of land, and said Beamish also fully paid the land company all expenses and costs of laying out, grading, turnpiking, graveling, and other improvement of streets mentioned in the clause of the contract as being a charge on the land. The charge and lien given said land company by said contract were fully satisfied and discharged by said payments.

From time to time the land company advanced for other purposes, in accordance with the terms of the contracts, sums amounting to $3,252.62, and the accrued interest thereon up to October 1, 1924, equals $1,914.15. Also the land company advanced moneys for the use of Beamish in the sum of $1,916.43, and the interest thereon computed $1,650.29. No part of either of the sums advanced or the interest on either has been repaid.

Percy Beamish died on March 14, 1916.

The judgment and decree of the trial court adjudged as follows: That plaintiff is the successor in interest of Percy Beamish in and to the lands involved; that plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by the action, and is not entitled to have his title quieted as against the land company; that the land company is the owner of an interest in said real property in accordance with the terms and conditions of the contracts hereinbefore set forth; that the land company is entitled to a charge and lien against the property and the proceeds of any sales thereof as security for the repayment of $3,253.62 principal and $1,914.15 interest, and also is entitled to a lien and charge against the half interest in the property remaining in Percy Beamish and the proceeds of any sales in the sum of $1,916.43 principal and $1,650.29 interest; that the land company is entitled to carry into effect, and fully perform, and cause to be fully performed, the provisions of the contracts with Percy Beamish; that under the terms of the first agreement Percy Beamish, or his trustee for that purpose created, was to execute all deeds that might be necessary under the performance of the contract; that by the terms of the contract it was agreed that First National Bank of Palo Alto should be trustee of the parties.

The decree then provides that the land company is entitled to demand and receive and cause to be executed and delivered by plaintiff any and all deeds and conveyances which may be necessary to secure to purchasers from the land company a good and sufficient title, such deeds to have the same force and effect as if executed by Percy Beamish in his lifetime, and if, upon demand, plaintiff shall neglect or refuse to execute and deliver such deeds and conveyances, or in the event of the death or incapacity of plaintiff the land company is entitled upon application to the court to have appointed a trustee or administrator under the orders of the court to execute the necessary deeds, and in the event of the appointment of such trustee or commissioner, all the expenses in connection therewith shall be charged to plaintiff, his personal representative, successor or assigns. Any balance over and above all of these claims and charges and expenses, if any there be, to which Percy Beamish may have been entitled during his lifetime, shall be paid to plaintiff.

The record before us consists of the judgment roll and the engrossed bill of exceptions, which latter shows the fact herein stated to the effect that the amounts hereinbefore referred to have been paid; that is to say, the bill of exceptions discloses that the amounts listed as costs of surveying and subdividing the tract, and all expenses and costs of laying out, grading, turnpiking, graveling, and other improvement of streets, have been fully paid and discharged.

Appellant's reasons advanced on this appeal are stated thus: Either taken separately, or read together, the contracts are nothing more than agreements of agency by which plaintiff's predecessor, Beamish, as owner of the land, gave to the land company exclusive right to sell the land for a compensation, to be measured by the price realized; that, Beamish having died in 1916, the power of the agent land company at that instant ceased, and the agency came to an end.

Next appellant urges that in any case defendant land company is not entitled to a lien upon the land as decreed.

Without further analyzing the contention of appellant, as regards the first claim, the question presented is whether the agency created, or the power given, was or was not coupled with an interest.

[1] If the rights of the respondent land company were all embraced within a mere naked agency, it is settled that the agency ceased with the life of Beamish. If, however, we find what in legal parlance is denominated an agency or power coupled with an interest the conclusion is different.

This brings us, therefore, to an inquiry as to what an agency coupled with an interest means. In Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) §§ 570–575, we find the subject well discussed. The author finds a general loose use of the word "interest," and cites illustrations. Those illustrations pertinent to this discussion may be given, viz., (1) an interest, not amounting to a property or estate in the thing itself, but still an interest in the existence of the power or authority to act with reference to it, not for the purpose of earning a commission by the exercise of the power, but because the agent has parted with value, or incurred liability, or assumed obligations, at the principal's request or with his consent, looking to the exercise of the power as the means of reimbursement, indemnity or protection; (2) an interest or estate in the thing itself, concerning which the power is to be exercised, arising from an assignment, pledge, or lien created by the principal, coupled with which is the power to deal with the thing itself in order to make the assignment, pledge, or lien effectual.

These two interests illustrated differ from each other in the fact that in the latter the agent has an estate or interest in the subject-matter of the power, while in the former his interest is rather in his right to exercise the power over the thing in order to make it available for the security or protection contemplated. Each of these illustrations might be called a power coupled with an interest, and each has been so called, though the interest in the respective cases is of a different nature. The leading case on the subject, and the one most quoted and relied upon, is the case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589. The opinion was written by Chief Justice Marshall, and the reasoning thereof stands unchallenged, and, in fact, both appellant and respondent here concede the controlling force of the decision. The opinion reads:

> "We hold it to be clear, that the interest which can protect a power, after the death of a person who creates it, must be an interest in the thing itself. * * * The words themselves would seem to import this meaning. 'A power coupled with an interest,' is a power which accompanies, or is connected with, an interest. The power and the interest are united in the same person. But if we are to understand by the word 'interest,' an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power, then they are never united. The power, to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise, is extinguished. The power ceases, when the interest commences, and therefore, cannot in accurate law language, be said to be 'coupled' with it. * * * The interest or title in the thing being vested in the person who gives the power, remains in him, unless it be conveyed with the power, and can pass out of him only by a regular act in his own name."

[2] In a review of the authorities, it will be found that on almost every occasion when the question of a power, coupled with an interest, has arisen, the case of Hunt v. Rousmanier has been accepted as the leading authority. Without reviewing these cases, we may turn to the California authorities on the subject, which are in complete accord in accepting the rule of Hunt v. Rousmanier, supra; Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 609; Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal. 254, 11 P. 706; Cox v. Hughes, 10 Cal. App. 553, 102 P. 956; Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 247, 191 P. 5; Todd v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 414, 184 P. 684, 7 A. L. R. 938. From all of these authorities but one conclusion may be reached. However it may be phrased, the rule remains that to create a power coupled with an interest there must coexist with the power a beneficial interest in the subject thereof which is enforceable in the name of the attorney in fact and will survive the constituent; or the power must be given as security for the payment of a sum of money other than that which arises as compensation through the exercise of the power, or as security for the performance of some act of value. Todd v. Superior Court, supra.

the rule, we conclude that the respondent acquired no interest in the subject-matter of the contracts, namely, the lands; and, having acquired no interest coupled with his power, the power was terminated upon the death of Beamish. This conclusion is compelled from the language of the contracts themselves. For instance, in the original contract, which remains in that respect unchanged, the land company was restricted in the amount to be expended without first obtaining the consent of Beamish; and it was expressly stated that the purpose of this clause was to give Beamish the power to limit the amount which by improvement may become a charge against Beamish's land. Likewise it was agreed that deeds were to be given by Beamish or his trustee for the purpose named. Further still, the agreement provides specifically "Beamish covenants and agrees that the control of the property shall be exclusively in the hands of the land company until finally sold, etc.; the phrase thus italicized being indicative of an agency; likewise the provision in the first contract for commissions.

The rider of February, 1905, in no way changes the relationship. The final agreement, rather than altering the legal relationship of principal and agent, tends to confirm its existence. A fair reading of the last contract indicates its purpose to be only to enlarge the powers of the agent, manifestly on the theory that, in the absence of those later provisions, no such powers were originally given. It will likewise be noted that in this last agreement, while the land company was to receive its compensation in a mode exclusive of commissions as such, nevertheless the contract expressly provides for commissions to agents other than the land company.

Scrutinizing carefully the provisions of all the contracts, it cannot be found where the land company has acquired, or was given by Beamish, the slightest vestige of interest in the lands themselves. By various methods of construction, natural and forced, it might be held that a relationship possibly greater than that of mere principal and agent resulted from the agreements. But no interest in the premises such as contemplated in the doctrine of a power coupled with an interest can be created in the land company.

In Walker's American Law of Real Estate Agency (2d Ed.) at page 23, § 16, we find the law again stated thus:

> "An interest in the land itself, as distinguished from the proceeds of it, is the distinguishing feature of a power coupled with an interest."

[4] One authorized to lay off land into lots and sell, the proceeds above a certain amount to be divided with the owner, has not a power coupled with an interest. Le Moyne v. Quimby, 70 Ill. 399; Atlantic Coast Realty Co. v. Townsend, 124 Va. 490, 98 S. E. 684; Hall v. Gambrill (C. C. A.) 92 F. 32.

[5] In order that a power may be a power coupled with an interest, the agent must have an interest derived from the power or from something else in the property or thing in reference to which the power was given; that he paid a valuable consideration for the power will not be enough. Coney v. Sanders, 28 Ga. 511, 513.

In passing, it may be noted that in most of the decided cases the question is presented on facts similar to those in the case at bar. It should be borne in mind that the doctrine of agency, coupled with interest, is in itself an exception to the general rule that the power of the agent ceases upon the death of the principal. As an exception, it should not receive a construction that would destroy the rule. It would be economically unsafe to extend the rule to the end that a condition might result where the real estate of a nation should be held under agency or power given by deceased persons. To have property and property rights controlled and handled under the principalship of past generations is manifestly destructive of progress, and can result only in chaos and confusion.

In Hicks v. Post, 154 Cal. 22, 96 P. 878, we note this language applicable here:

> "The case is simply one of an agency to sell land. * * * The agent, in the hope and belief that he will be able to sell the land at a profit, * * * agrees to and does make certain expenditures upon the land. If he is able to make the sales he will be reimbursed for these expenditures out of the proceeds of the sales. If he fails to make the sales he loses the expenditures which he has made. This is the element of chance which necessarily inheres in a contract of this character."

The agency in the instant case was first conferred in 1904, and the record indicates that it still remains unexecuted in full. There is nothing to indicate that any of the powers were executed, though we may assume that some lots have been sold and other things done. There is nothing inequitable in the doctrine of Hunt v. Rousmanier, supra, or in its application. One desirous of subdividing the property of another can purchase the same, and thus end all questions of agency or power. Or, if unable to do so, he may readily secure a sufficient interest to protect his investment against sudden revocation. Or, in lieu of either of these, he may still, with his eyes open, take the chances.

[6] In support of its claim that there was a power coupled with an interest, respondent contends that the language of the contract should govern. The contract, as noted, reads:

> "This agreement is coupled with an interest and is only revocable by the consent of the parties hereto."

This may be influential in determining the revocability of the agreement by either party, and particularly by Beamish during his lifetime. It may be conceded that Beamish could not revoke the power conferred under the agreement. However, this would not have the effect of avoiding the rule that the power came to an end upon the death of Beamish. The statement in the contract that the agreement that the power is coupled with an interest means nothing. Evidently the one drawing up the agreement had some idea that to give the agreement the capacity of survival after Beamish's death the power must be so coupled. Yet the bare statement did not accomplish this result. The fact is not to be established by a mere characterization. The statement is a general, loose one. It may reasonably mean that the interest remained in Beamish, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the contract appearing. Surely there is nothing to indicate what the interest is; and, if we did accept the phrase in the contract as binding, we would still be left to surmise as to what actually passed to the land company other than the naked power.

[7-9] Respondent argues that, if it is determined that the agency or power was not coupled with an interest, and therefore ceased on the death of Beamish, nevertheless the facts show that an express trust was created in the lands, and that such trust should be enforced, and was equitably enforced by the terms of the decree herein. All of the cases hereinbefore cited negative this contention.

In the case of Miller v. Lerdo Land Co., 186 Cal. 1, 198 P. 778, a situation sufficiently similar to permit quotation arose. There the court says:

> "Respondent's rights * * * are: That he shall receive one-third of the selling price of any and all of the said lands; that this one-third of the selling price shall be paid to respondent at the times and in the manner and according to the same terms as the remaining two-thirds are paid to appellant. * * * It is apparent * * * that the contract conferred upon respondent nothing more than a right to one-third of the proceeds when * * * sold. There is a distinction between an interest in the land itself and an interest in the money obtained from the sale of the land. * * * The contract relied upon by respondent * * * does not, by any possible construction, purport to pass a present interest in the lands to respondent nor to provide for the holding of the lands or any interest therein for the benefit of respondent, nor is there anything from which any such intention can fairly be inferred. There is, therefore, no express trust."

A trust will not be impressed upon the realty to insure performance of a purely personal contract in the absence of words expressly manifesting such intent. A trust, whether express or resulting, must have a purpose, and require for its fulfilment some act on the part of the trustee inuring to the beneficiary. Here there is no act required of Beamish other than to transfer the property to purchasers procured by the Land Company when and if procured. We hold this not to be a trust upon the land.

[10] Lastly, appellant attacks the judgment and decree which impresses a lien upon the property for certain sums of money. The contract provided for a lien as follows:

> "It is further covenanted and agreed that all expenses and cost of surveying and subdividing said tract, and the cost of laying out, grading, turnpiking and graveling and other improvement of streets, is to be paid for by the land company, and is to be considered and become a charge against the land."

The engrossed and certified bill of exceptions before us states that plaintiff proved to the satisfaction of the trial court that all charges incurred for purposes in the clause recited have been fully paid and discharged before the commencement of the action. The lien impressed upon the property by the decree, pursuant to the findings, is for advancements and expenditures for other purposes. The contract specifically provides that the land company shall retain from the one-half of net profits due Beamish sums sufficient to liquidate any claim for money advanced to him. For the sum found to have been advanced, the court below decreed a lien against the lands in favor of the land company. The contract will not justify such a lien, and impressing it upon the lands as against the plaintiff is unsupported by any authority. Indeed, none is cited. This is purely a matter of accounting between Beamish and the land company, and, if no profits accrue, there is no fund out of which the land company may be reimbursed. It is obvious that the main purpose of the arrangement was to subdivide the lands and sell the same. This was the understanding of the land company, and, if the undertaking failed to the extent that there were no profits, the contract of Beamish to repay moneys only out of the profits did not then become a burden upon the lands.

[11] The remaining sum of money for the repayment of which a lien is impressed upon the lands is, as expressed in the findings, money advanced "to carry said property in accordance with the terms of the contracts." There is absolutely no provision in the contract to which these advancements refer. The nature of these advancements is not disclosed. The clause of the contract last set forth determines the kind and character of expense chargeable to the land. The ancient rule of construction "expressio unius," etc., applies. Whatever the term "carrying the property" may mean, no lien or charge arises against the land by virtue of moneys expended in that enterprise under the contract.

Respondent at the oral argument agreed that the main point in the appeal was the determination of whether or not the land company acquired any interest in the lands under the contract. No attempt has been made by respondent to justify the lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by P. Murray against A. L. Kunde for damages for wrongful arrest. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carl Barnard and W. F. Cowan, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

H. B. Churchill and W. F. Geary, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action for damages in the sum of $10,000 for the alleged wrongful arrest of his person upon a process alleged to have been maliciously caused by defendant to be issued by one Marvin T. Vaughan, justice of the peace in and for Santa Rosa township, in the county of Sonoma, this state. The cause was tried before a jury and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. Upon the verdict so rendered, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for said sum.

The appeal here is by the defendant from said judgment.

The alleged false arrest was founded on a complaint filed by the defendant against the plaintiff in the above-named justice's court, on the 9th day of June, 1923, and which charged that on that day the plaintiff (defendant in the criminal action) did, in said county of Sonoma, commit a misdemeanor in that he "willfully, unlawfully and maliciously exhibit, draw, and use a deadly weapon, in a rude, angry, and threatening manner, and not in necessary self-defense, in the presence of A. L. Kunde and Mrs. Archer Murray." Pen. Code, § 417. The plaintiff, having been arrested on a warrant issued on said complaint, was arraigned before said justice's court, and the date of his trial fixed for June 23, 1923. At the request of the accused, on June 15th, the trial was postponed to June 28, 1923, at 10 o'clock a. m. The complainant, Kunde (defendant here), in said original action failed to appear at the hour fixed for the trial on the 28th day of June. After waiting for some time for his appearance and he (Kunde) not appearing, the justice of the peace made an order dismissing the complaint and discharging the defendant therein (plaintiff here) from the further custody of the law; he then being under bail for his appearance at the trial.

The circumstances out of which the arrest of the plaintiff developed may thus be briefly stated: The plaintiff, Murray, was an employee of Kunde, defendant here, on the latter's ranch in Sonoma county. His family consisted of himself, wife, and four young children. They resided in a "bunkhouse" on the defendant's ranch. This house consisted of three rooms. The plaintiff kept in the house two weapons—one a rifle, which, at the time of the difficulty leading to his arrest, stood in the corner of the kitchen, and the other a revolver which plaintiff kept under a pillow on his bed. In the month of January, 1923, the Murrays went to the ranch of Kunde, and there took up their residence. Murray had been employed by Kunde as a "ranch hand," and Mrs. Murray was at the same time employed to do the cooking for the men employed on the ranch. Thus the Murrays were employed until the 8th day of June, 1923.

On the 8th day of June, 1923, the plaintiff and Kunde were together in the "cow barn" situated on the ranch. At that time and place Murray notified Kunde that he (Murray) intended to terminate his employment by the former, and was going to leave the ranch. The next morning, near the hour of 7 o'clock Kunde appeared in the house of Murray, opening the door and stepping into the room, without knocking at the door or giving any other warning of his intention to enter, and immediately ordered Murray to pack his belongings, and, with his family, depart from the premises. Replying, Murray, addressing Kunde in a very civil manner, stated that it would not be possible for him to move then, as he had not had an opportunity to arrange for housing his family and furniture elsewhere, and that, if he was to be ejected from the premises then, it would have to be done by the sheriff or other officer, who certainly would under the circumstances allow him to remain in the house until the following day. Thereupon Kunde, in language too foul and abominable to be repeated, under any circumstances, in the presence of persons of the least refinement and decency, without a shudder, declared that he would himself put them out then. At the same time he picked up a chair and menacingly approached Murray, who slowly retreated to the bedroom. Mrs. Murray, fearing lest her husband intended to procure the pistol under the pillow, followed her husband with the intention of preventing or attempting to persuade him not to take the weapon from the bed; but Mrs. Murray had taken but a few steps into a bedroom when Murray, without touching or getting the pistol, returned to the room where Kunde was, and started in the direction of the corner of the room where the rifle was standing. He did not take hold of the rifle, however. Kunde had put the chair to the floor and for a time thereafter attempted to strike Murray with his fists, but Mrs. Murray got hold of his trousers and pulled him from her husband, or at any rate prevented him getting near enough to Murray to strike him. During all this time Kunde was very angry and in a furious rage. The children of the Murrays, from the excitement and fear, were almost in a state of hysteria. Kunde finally stepped out of the house, but, after taking a few steps therefrom, returned and asked Murray if he would permit him to see his (Murray's) rifle or pistol. Murray refused to do so. Kunde at that time also asked Mrs. Murray if she did not see her husband menacingly brandish a "gun" about while the altercation in the house was in progress and she positively replied in the negative. The Murray family and Kunde were the only persons in the house while the trouble was going on. The foregoing statement was taken from the testimony of both Murray and his wife, given at the trial of this action.

Kunde and a boy named Beeson, who was of the age of about 9 years, and who claimed to have been in the bunkhouse when the altercation occurred, testified that Murray had a gun in his hands at the time, and Kunde said that he was handling it in a threatening manner. Kunde's version of what occurred in the bunkhouse at the time was entirely different from that of Murray and his wife. According to his testimony, the plaintiff was the aggressor, and abused and with a gun in his hands threatened Kunde. He stated on direct examination that in the swearing to the complaint against Murray he was not actuated "by ill will or any motive of oppressing or injuring Murray," but only because "I wanted the public to know what kind of a man he was." The Beeson boy was unable to remember anything that occurred during the controversy between the two men, except that Murray procured and had a gun in his hand. On observing the gun, he became frightened and hurriedly left the house. Both Murray and his wife stated young Beeson was at no time in the house while the difficulty was going on, nor was he in the house, they said, at any other time that morning.

R. H. Bonham, also an employee on the ranch of Kunde at the time of the trouble between plaintiff and defendant, testifying for the former, said that within a very brief time after the occurrences in the bunkhouse, and on the same day, Kunde met witness and told him about the trouble between him and Murray; that at that time Kunde stated that he had just been in to see Murray, and had asked him (Murray) to leave the place, and they got into a little argument; that he (Kunde) said to witness that Mr. Murray "went in the other room he (Kunde) thought after a gun," and that he (Kunde) then "turned around and walked out."

[1, 2] There is, as thus it is made to appear, a substantial conflict in the evidence as to what occurred in the bunkhouse between Kunde and Murray, and this court must hence accept the verdict of the jury upon the proposition that the altercation in said house occurred substantially as Murray and his wife described it in their testimony.

[3] There is but one general point, involving several of the instructions given to the jury by the trial court, presented here for a reversal of the judgment. The instructions attacked by appellant relate to the question of probable cause for causing the arrest of the plaintiff. It is the settled rule in cases for damages for malicious prosecution that the question of probable cause is one of law, to be determined by the court, while the question of malice is one for the jury. The instructions which were read to the jury, and of which the defendant complains, so counsel for the plaintiff say in their brief, are "plaintiff's instructions Nos. 4, 5, and 10."

[4-7] The record does not show at whose request the criticized instructions were given —whether at the request of the plaintiff or that of the defendant. "The presumption is, therefore, that they were given at the request of the defendants. Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Sutter-Butte Canal Co. v. American Rice & Alfalfa Co., 182 Cal. 549, 553, 554, 189 P. 277. A party cannot predicate prejudice on erroneous instructions submitted by the court to the jury by his request." Bognuda v. Pearson, 71 Cal. App. 105, 234 P. 857. See, also, Finkelstein v. Cosgrove (Cal. App.) 256 P. 608. The statement by counsel for the plaintiff that the instructions complained of here are "plaintiff's instructions" is no part of the record. But, since the counsel have in effect conceded that the instructions were given by the court at the request of their client, we will briefly consider the assignment. The specific contention is that the court in effect instructed the jury that it was within their province to determine whether the arrest was made with or without probable cause. The court, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, P. Murray, did not exhibit, draw, or flourish a deadly weapon in the presence of two or more persons, to wit, A. L. Kunde and Mrs. Murray, as alleged in the criminal complaint filed in the justice's office of Santa Rosa township, county of Sonoma, state of California, then I instruct you that there is want of probable cause, and, if such want of probable cause was accompanied by malice, your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

The court elsewhere in different instructions in its charge instructed the jury what facts, as a matter of law, were essential to be shown to constitute probable cause for the filing of the charge against the plaintiff, and further instructed them that, if they found "by a preponderance of the evidence" that the facts so stated actually occurred, it would then be their duty to find for the defendant here; but that, if they found from the evidence that the facts necessary to constitute probable cause as set forth in such instructions did not occur, then they should find for the plaintiff. The complaint urged against the court's charge involve the three following instructions:

> "Malice is a fact to be proved in the case, as any other fact is proved, and you are the judges of that fact and must determine the fact of malice from the evidence alone, and, if you find, by a preponderance of evidence, that the defendant, in commencing and prosecuting said criminal charge, was actuated by malice in so doing, your verdict will be for the plaintiff, unless you find that there was probable cause for the commencement and prosecution of said criminal charge, in which event your verdict must be for the defendant."
> "The burden of proof of both malice and want of probable cause is on the plaintiff in this case, and, if you find, by a preponderance of evidence, that the plaintiff has proved that the defendant in commencing and prosecuting said criminal charge, acted without probable cause, and with malice, your verdict must be for the plaintiff."
> "If the jury should find from the testimony that the prosecution of the plaintiff by the defendant was without probable cause, then you may justly infer that it was prompted by malice; that would be a presumption or inference, and, being merely a presumption, may be removed by evidence showing that even without probable cause there was no malice."

The above instructions, taken alone, would imply that the question of probable cause was solely one for the jury's determination, and, as so understood would be erroneous. Where, however, there are several different instructions upon the same legal proposition, and any one or more, but not all of them, unless considered with other correct given instructions, would involve an erroneous statement of the rule, they then should be read together and with any other given instruction stating the rule correctly. As so read, they plainly imply this, and certainly the jury, composed, as we may assume, of persons of average intelligence, would so understand them: That, if they (the jury) found from the evidence that the facts as stated elsewhere by the court in its charge as constituting probable cause were true or occurred, then it would be their duty to find in favor of the defendant; that if, on the other hand, they found that such facts were not true or did not occur, then it would be their duty to find for the plaintiff. In some five of six different instructions embraced within its charge, the court clearly stated that, if the jury found that the plaintiff, on the occasion of the altercation between him and defendant, exhibited a deadly weapon in a threatening and angry manner in the presence of two or more persons, there would then be probable cause for his arrest, prosecution and punishment, and the jury would, therefore, be required to find for the defendant. The record does not show at whose request those instructions were given. The plaintiff in his brief states that they were given on the proposal of the defendant. It is easy to imagine that they were. They stated concretely the law of the case so that anybody could readily grasp and understand it. Indeed, considering the charge in its entirety, it would be difficult to understand how the jury, guided by the law of the case as so given, could have had any trouble in keeping themselves within the limits of their sphere as triers of the facts in passing upon and determining the issues which they were required to decide. The verdict implies that there was want of probable cause for plaintiff's arrest. This means that the jury found that the facts necessary to constitute probable cause, as the court pointed them out, did not occur, as the defendant claimed.

The instructions, as a whole, correctly and clearly stated the law pertinent to the issues, the case seems to have been fairly and well tried, and the verdict is well supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: PLUMMER, J.

PEOPLE v. KEEL. (Cr. 1609.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1928.

1. Homicide ⟹300(7)—Whether court should instruct on self-defense when defendant denies killing depends entirely upon evidence introduced.

Whether it is duty of court in prosecution for homicide to instruct jury on question of self-defense when defendant denies killing depends entirely upon nature of evidence introduced at trial, and if evidence tends to raise issue of self-defense, although defendant denies killing instruction based on theory of self-defense is proper and should be given.

2. Homicide ⟹300(8)—In prosecution for homicide, evidence held to entitle defendant to instruction on self-defense.

In prosecution for homicide, where evidence was presented to effect that defendant was threatened with open knife, that he was assaulted by several men with automobile tools, held that such evidence entitled him to have jury decide whether cutting of decedent was justifiable in law on ground of self-defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Leonard Keel was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender of Los Angeles County, and G. A. Benedict, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant was accused of the murder of Reuben Brice and was convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. About midnight of September 3, 1927, a number of people of both sexes were attending a party at 1236 East Twenty-Fifth street, in the city of Los Angeles, at which the guests were dancing. Defendant arrived late at the party in company with Mrs. Gertrude Simpson. He objected to her dancing with two of the men present, McAfee and Brice. Later an altercation took place in the street in front of the house and a fight ensued, in which a number of men were engaged and in which several were cut. In the course of the fight Brice received a cut which caused his death. Statements of the various witnesses as to what occurred at the time of this trouble are in hopeless conflict. They differ as to the number and location of the "fights," the number of participants therein, and the part taken by each participant. Not only did the eyewitnesses contradict each other, but most of them, if not all, gave testimony in conflict with their own sworn statements. No witness could swear that he saw the first blow struck in the fight or the actual cutting of Brice. As we search further and further into the record it becomes increasingly difficult to discover what actually occurred on this fatal night.

Appellant vigorously maintains that the trial court erred to his prejudice in refusing to allow counsel to argue to the jury the question of self-defense and in failing to instruct the jury on this subject. To properly pass upon this point a consideration of the evidence in some detail is necessary. The prosecution relied mainly upon the statement of the witness Blalock, who accompanied Brice to the party, and who testified, in brief, that he saw defendant pulling away from Mrs. Simpson in front of the house; that Mrs. Simpson was trying to detain him; that defendant went across the street, and in a few minutes witness heard somebody "holler fight"; that he looked across the street and saw defendant and Brice standing behind an automobile; that defendant "made a pass" at Brice with his hand and Brice jumped back; that defendant chased Brice back and forth across the street; that Brice picked up an automobile jack which was lying on the sidewalk and threw it at the defendant, but missed him; that defendant "ran back about 10 feet down the sidewalk from Brice"; that Brice "might have made one or two steps forward"; that defendant, using the words of the witness, "put his hand in his coat pocket, and got something, I don't know if it was a knife or a razor, but * * * I could see the blade shine"; that defendant ran after Brice; that "they went around and around the trees, and finally Mr. Keel caught Brice and of course they locked and fell; that is as far as I could tell about it"; that defendant got up and ran; that Brice was lying in the street covered with blood. It was stipulated that at the preliminary examination Blalock had testified: "Mr. Brice turned after he dodged the lick and ran after Mr. Keel. Mr. Keel ran for about 5 feet into the open.

So, at the time that Mr. Keel opened the knife, Mr. Brice was after him. Sure, he had run; yes."

Witness Mrs. Simpson testified that Brice and McAfee were dancing improperly and that defendant had told her not to dance with either of them; that they asked her to dance but she refused; that McAfee then said to Brice: "Give me your knife and I will go out and cut that black ——— ——— ——— ——— heart out"; that Brice gave McAfee the knife, which was open, saying, "Go on, boy, I am with you;" that several more said, "I am with you," and that all went out; that while defendant was in the middle of the street five or six people, including Brice, McAfee, and Blalock, secured automobile tools from the rear of a car standing on the north side of the street and threw them at defendant, who picked up the tools and threw them back. The witness further testified:

"When Keel would pick things up and throw them back, they would chase Keel around the cars from the north side of the street to the other side of the street, and then they ran around the cars and threw the—and threw these tools at Keel, and Keel would pick them up and throw them back across, and then they went to some trees."

"Q. By the Court: Who started running for the trees first? A. Keel. They started throwing things at him, and he got the pump and ran to the trees and was dodging around the trees with the pump in his hand, and hitting at the other five or six with Keel.

"Q. When you say 'five or six with Keel,' you mean six including Keel? A. Yes; including Keel.

"Q. Tell us what happened at the trees? A. Then the boys would hit at Keel, and Keel would hit at them with the pump he had, and they chased all around the trees, and finally one of the boys, I don't know which one it was, picked up a piece of iron, or something—it was one of the tools that was thrown out of the car—and hit Keel, struck Keel, across the head. * * * And I screamed and said, 'Oh, don't you do that! You boys quit; some of you people help me stop these boys from fighting. And they all ran away and left me, and they would not stop, and this short fellow that they said was Brice—I don't know his name at all; I only knew since I was here—but this fellow picked up a big piece of something and struck Keel in the side and knocked him down, and then the other boys fell on him, and then I screamed and ran in the house and called the policemen to come."

Witness Mary Smith testified:

"I was getting ready to go home, and I saw a bunch there across the street by a machine.

"Q. A bunch of what? A. I saw some people by a machine.

"Q. What were they doing? A. It seemed as if they were just standing about around the machine over there, and pretty soon I saw them running out into the street from the machine, coming over to this side, from the north side over to the south side of the street.

"Q. How many ran over there from the north side? A. It looked like five or six.

"Q. Where did they run? A. Over near the church between the two trees.

"Q. Are those trees on the south side or north side of the street? A. I don't know.

"Q. Well; are they on the side of the street Mrs. Fields' house is on? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you see around those trees? A. I saw Mr. Keel. He had a pump in his hand. He was running, and Reuben was after him.

"Q. Whom do you mean by Reuben; Reuben Brice? A. Yes; the deceased.

"Q. That is the man who is dead? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Who was running after who? A. After Mr. Keel.

"Q. Reuben Brice was running after Mr. Keel? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then tell us what happened. A. So Mr. Keel threw the pump, and I was coming along by the curbing, and he threw the pump, and the handle of the pump hit me on the leg as I was coming, and in some way he fell down on the ground.

"Q. Who fell down on the ground? A. Keel; and Reuben jumped on top of him.

"Q. By Reuben, you mean Reuben Brice? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The man who is now dead? A. Yes; he jumped on top of him, and I saw Mr. Keel doing that way to him (indicating); doing that way to Reuben Brice, the deceased.

"Q. At that time where was Mr. Brice? A. Mr. Brice was on top of Mr. Keel, and he was on his back on the ground between the two trees, and so he stayed there, I guess, about 15 minutes on the ground, and when he got up I saw some drops of blood on the sidewalk, but I thought the blood came from some one with the nose bleed.

"Q. Never mind what you thought. Tell us what you saw. A. I saw some blood.

"Q. By the Court: Who stayed on the ground about 15 minutes? A. Keel and Reuben Brice.

"Q. And Reuben Brice all the time on top? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were they going through some motions, or doing anything; what did you see? A. He was doing like this (indicating).

"Mr. Benedict: Raising her doubled hands up and down from the ribs to the height of her head several times.

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: By 'he,' whom do you mean?

"Q. By the Court: How was he on top, straddle of him? A. Yes.

"Q. Like you straddle a horse? A. Yes.

"Q. What else was Brice doing? A. Brice had, it seemed like he had his arms or something around his head, as much as I could see. It was dark, but I could see that Keel looked like he was doing that way ((indicating).

"Q. Trying to get loose? A. I don't know.

"Q. Did he get loose? A. Well; finally he did.

"Q. By Mr. Benedict: Then, what did he do? A. He ran back in between this driveway over back across the street."

Witness Annie Fields gave the following testimony:

"You went down there and saw Mr. Keel leaning against this tree and saw this (automobile pump) in his hand. Tell us what happened, what you did and what you saw, in your own words? A. When I walked up to him and put my hand on him I saw he had this thing in his hand, and I said, 'What are you boys doing out here?' and he said, 'you go on back in the house, Mrs. Fields;' and I said, 'I just think this is just terrible for you boys to come and act like this;' and he said, 'You go back in the house, I am not going to let these boys kill me;' and I walked away from him a little ways, and I looked around and I saw another boy come across the street, a boy or a man, I don't know whether it was a boy or a man—a boy came across street and jumped on him, and they went to the ground and wallowed over and over under this tree, and I left then and walked pretty brief to the sidewalk, to the entrance of my house, and this Mr. Lee ran across the street and said, 'Mrs. Fields, I am cut, can't you take me to a doctor?' and I said, 'Before I could get my car out and take you to the doctor you would bleed to death. You go in any of those cars over there to the doctor;' and he ran away and I went in the house."

The defendant was sworn as a witness and testified that McAfee had come out of the house with a knife directly toward him "mumbling something" which he could not understand; that he ran toward the street between two cars; that a man threw a "jack" at him; that some one came across the street and hit him over the eye. He further testified:

> "Shortly afterwards the other bunch followed, and some man struck me in the side and knocked me down.
> "Q. Did they hit you anywhere else in the meantime? A. Well, they hit me several licks; hit me on the arm, and another lick in my head.
> "Q. Where did that land? A. Right at my forehead.
> "Q. In the middle of the forehead? A. Yes.
> "Q. (Indicating the middle of the forehead at the edge of the hair). Go ahead. A. They knocked me down there, and by struggling and crawling on my hands and feet I got up and got away from them and ran back toward the north side of the street. After I got across to the north side of the street there was two men who followed me clean to the place, to the fence, and I didn't know it was there at that time."

Defendant denied that he cut Brice. Dr. Faubion, a police surgeon who examined defendant, testified:

> "At the time the patient, now the defendant, had an abrasion on the forehead on the left side upper region, and also one laceration an inch and a half long in the forehead."

[1, 2] The denial by defendant of the act of cutting Brice did not deprive his counsel of the right to demand that instructions on the law of self-defense be given to the jury if the justification therefor appeared elsewhere in the evidence. This is conceded by the Attorney General, who, in the proper spirit, gives us the following quotation from 13 Ruling Case Law, 813:

> "Whether it is the duty of the court in a prosecution for homicide to instruct the jury on the question of self-defense when defendant denies the killing seems to depend entirely upon the nature of the evidence introduced at the trial. If the defendant denies the killing and there is no evidence adduced by either party which tends to show that the killing might have been in self-defense, although other evidence shows quite conclusively that the defendant committed the crime, it is not the duty of the court to instruct as to self-defense; but if the evidence tends to raise the issue of self-defense although the defendant denies the killing, it seems that an instruction based on the theory of self-defense is proper and should be given. His denial of the act does not necessarily warrant the trial court in refusing to give an instruction based on the theory of self-defense."

In People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567, 591, 234 P. 129, 139, the court said:

> "And we can conceive of no reason why such evidence is inadmissible in a case in which the defendant contends, as appellant here contended at the trial, that he committed no lascivious assault whatever upon the prosecutrix. The two principal elements of the rape are, first, the commission of the act, and, second, the lack of consent of the victim to its commission. The burden is upon the people to prove both these elements, of course, and it is inconceivable that the defendant may not offer proof to rebut the evidence introduced by the prosecution in support of each of the two branches of the case. In civil actions it is the well-established rule, expressed, in fact, in the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 441), that a defendant 'may set forth by answer as many defenses * * * as he may have'; and it is well settled that the terms of the section permit the allegation of inconsistent defenses (Calexico Lumber Co. v. Emerson, 54 Cal. App. 239, 201 P. 612). These, of course, are rules of pleading, but a similar rule, as a matter of evidence and independent of statute, would seem necessarily to apply in criminal cases under the issue presented by a plea of not guilty."

Applying the rule set forth in Ruling Case Law, supra, we are confronted with the question, Does the evidence tend to raise the issue of self-defense? A discussion of the evidence hereinabove referred to is unnecessary to convince that the jury, as reasonable men and women, might have found that defendant was justified in cutting Brice in the manner shown if the law of self-defense had been explained to them. If the testimony of any witness in the case is sufficient to raise the issue, it should be presented to the jury. Evidence was presented to the effect that defendant was threatened by McAfee with an open knife; that he was assaulted by several men with automobile tools; and that he was struck on the head with a heavy instrument which laid open his scalp. He is entitled to have the jury decide whether the cutting of Brice under the circumstances was justifiable in law.

Our disposition of the question of self-defense makes it unnecessary to discuss other points raised by appellant.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

MEREDITH v. KEY SYSTEM TRANSIT CO. et al. (Civ. 3502.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1928.

1. Trial ⟹260(1)—Refusing to give instructions substantially included in other instructions given held not error.

In action for damages for death of plaintiff's husband, court's refusing to give requested instructions, where substance of such instructions was included in other instructions given, held not error.

2. Street railroads ⟹112(2, 3)—Plaintiff, to recover for death of decedent when struck by interurban train, must show negligence of defendant proximately contributed to accident and decedent was without fault which might have proximately contributed to accident.

Before plaintiff could recover in action against transit company for death of husband when struck by an interurban train at street intersection, she was required to show by preponderance of evidence that defendant or servants thereof were guilty of some act of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident, and that decedent was without fault or negligence which might in any wise have proximately contributed to the accident causing his death.

3. Negligence ⟹80—If plaintiff's negligence contributes proximately to injury, it is defense, irrespective of degree.

If negligence of plaintiff contributes proximately to his injury, a defense is made out, irrespective of the degree of such negligence, as there is no standard by which such negligence can be measured.

4. Trial ⟹228(4)—Instruction that automobile driver must use senses of sight and hearing in crossing railroad, and could not recover if failure proximately contributed to injury, held not indefinite.

Instruction that driver of an automobile must use his senses of sight and hearing, when about to cross a railroad track, to ascertain whether a train is approaching, and, if he fails to take such precaution, and such failure proximately contributes in any degree whatever to his injury, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and no recovery can be had for his injury or death, held not indefinite and uncertain, in that it did not specify to what extent driver must use his senses of sight and hearing, and whether such use must or must not be continuous.

5. Appeal and error ⟹1170(7)—Admitting hearsay evidence in statement by witness, where witness was cross-examined as to same facts, though error, held not prejudicial (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 475, 1854; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action against transit company for death of plaintiff's husband when struck by interurban train, admitting in evidence the statement made by a witness to defendant shortly after the accident in which death was caused, where witness, on cross-examination at trial, was interrogated as to some of the answers in statement, though improper, and not admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, statement being hearsay, held not prejudicial within Const. art. 6, § 4½, and Code Civ. Proc. § 475, where a verdict for plaintiff under the evidence would have been unwarranted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Maude Meredith against the Key System Transit Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Preston & Duncan, Geo. Allen Smith, and Robert E. Hatch, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison and Frank S. Richards, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us on appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of the respondents in an action prosecuted to recover damages for the death of the husband of the plaintiff resulting from a collision between an automobile driven by the deceased and a train operated by the Key System Transit Company.

The record shows that on the morning of November 21, 1923, the deceased was driving in a westerly direction on Forty-Sixth street in the city of Oakland; that Forty-Sixth street is intersected by a certain other street known as and called Linden street, upon which latter street the Key System Transit Company maintains two sets of double railroad tracks, that is, four different tracks. Linden street, where it crosses Forty-Sixth street, extends in a northerly and southerly direction. At the intersection of Forty-Sixth and Linden streets, the roadway and the rails of the railroad are practically flush, but northerly therefrom the ties on which the rails are located are visible, and the rails themselves all stand above the surface of the street. Cross-arms and other silent warnings are shown by the testimony to be located on the intersection referred to showing the presence of the railroad lines. The trains of the respondent company are operated by electricity. It appears from the record that during the hours between 7 and 8 o'clock in the morning some twenty-four trains operated by the respondent cross the intersection of

Forty-Sixth street. The collision which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's husband occurred at about 7:30 a. m. The morning was clear; apparently the atmosphere was free from fog; and it does not appear that there were any stationary or other objects to obstruct a view of moving trains for a distance of several hundred feet. On the easterly set of double tracks maintained by the respondent were operated the Northbrae and Claremont trains. On the westerly set of tracks were operated the Berkeley trains. On the morning in question the deceased, accompanied by one Henry Forsberg, was driving westward on Forty-Sixth street in a "Jewett" automobile. Upon reaching the intersection of Forty-Sixth street with Linden street, a train from the Oakland mole was observed traveling northward on the easterly track of the double set of tracks over which the Berkeley trains were operated. The automobile was halted between the two sets of double tracks, a space which has a width of a trifle over 21 feet. The testimony of Forsberg is to the effect that he and the deceased were working at the same place; had been going to work at about the hour referred to every morning for some two months and a half; that they frequently observed trains passing to and fro at the intersection of Forty-Sixth and Linden streets; that on the morning in question the deceased was operating the car, and stopped the same within a few feet of the track on which the north-bound Berkeley train was being operated; that they stopped there for a few seconds for the north-bound Berkeley train to pass by; that, after the north-bound Berkeley train had passed by, the deceased, who had the gear shift of his automobile in neutral, threw it into low gear, started the car across the westerly double set of tracks on which the Berkeley trains were operated, had cleared the easterly line of said tracks, and, as they reached a position on the westerly tracks upon which the south-bound Berkeley trains were operated, he observed a south-bound Berkeley train approaching, which, at the time he observed it, was so close upon them that he knew they were going to be hit. The collision threw the "Jewett" automobile a number of feet; some of the witnesses testifying 40 feet. The automobile rolled over and over, and the deceased received such injuries that he subsequently died therefrom. Some witnesses testified that the automobile which was being driven by the deceased did not stop for the passage of the north-bound Berkeley train, but only halted, and that the automobile, as soon as the rear car of the north-bound train had cleared the space in front of the automobile, was started forward. The statement is made by appellant that the automobile was not started until the rear end of the last car of the north-bound train had reached a point some 75 feet northward. We find no testimony, however, indicating just how far the rear end of the north-bound Berkeley train had cleared the crossing before the automobile was started westward. Practically all of the witnesses other than the witness Forsberg testified that the whistle of the south-bound train was being blown at intervals as it approached the crossing of Forty-Sixth street. The south-bound train which collided with the "Jewett" automobile was composed of five cars, three of which, the testimony shows, were 70 feet in length, and two of which were 80 feet in length, making a train of at least 370 feet in length, assuming that the length of the cars included bumpers and couplings. Otherwise the train would be a trifle longer. The record shows, also, that as one is approaching the tracks on Linden street where they intersect Forty-Sixth street both sets of double tracks are visible to the northward for a distance of some 800 feet, and that moving trains thereon can be observed for that distance.

The verdict of the jury was in favor of the respondents, and the appellant concedes that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. It is urged, however, that a new trial should be granted on the ground that the court misdirected the jury, and also erred in the admission of testimony. It being admitted that the testimony is sufficient to support the verdict, we have only to determine whether the alleged errors, if errors there were, resulted in a miscarriage of justice, as, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, no new trial can be granted for the errors alleged herein, unless there has been a miscarriage; and under section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure it must appear that a different result would have been probable if such alleged errors had not occurred.

The appellant first alleges that the court committed error in refusing to give requested instructions numbers 2 and 6. These instructions are as follows:

"Request No. 2.

"I instruct you that, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that a passing north-bound train so obstructed the view of travelers about to cross the Berkeley tracks at Forty-Sixth street, of the south-bound tracks and trains that were proceeding along them toward the Forty-Sixth street crossing, as to endanger the safety of travelers proceeding westerly along Forty-Sixth street to cross the Berkeley tracks, then it was the duty of the defendants, if reasonably necessary to protect such street travelers as were themselves in the exercise of reasonable care from being run down by a south-bound train, to either modify the speed of the south-bound train to such an extent as would be reasonably necessary for the protection of such street travelers; or to take such other reasonable precautions as would give to such travelers reasonable notice and warning of the approach of such south-bound train."

"Request No. 6.

"I charge you that, if the plaintiff has proven by a preponderance of the evidence any one of the charges of negligence mentioned in these instructions, and you find by a preponderance of the evidence that such alleged negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to and death of the decedent, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff; unless you further find, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence as defined in these instructions."

[1] An examination of the record, however, shows that all the matters contained in these refused instructions were included in other instructions given by the court, which were, if anything, more favorable to the plaintiff than the instructions requested. This is shown by instruction No. 16, which we set forth in full:

> "One of the grounds of alleged negligence charged in the complaint is that the defendant trustees of the traction system carelessly and negligently failed to place or maintain a flagman, or to show or give any signal, in addition to the blowing of the whistle at the Forty-Sixth street crossing to warn or notify persons crossing, or about to cross the tracks on Forty-Sixth street of the approach of said Berkeley train.
> "The law imposes upon a traction company the duty to use reasonable care, corresponding to the circumstances constituting the probable danger, to avoid injury to persons lawfully traveling upon the public highway crossed by the traction system tracks and trains.
> "If you find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that usually or frequently there are obstructions which interfere with the opportunity to see moving trains while travelers on the highway are approaching a crossing, that it is a much-traveled and dangerous crossing, that ordinarily prudent men would have taken extra precautions in addition to the whistle signals, that the defendant trustees of the traction system failed to take any precautions, other than the whistle signals to warn travelers at said crossing, then it is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether or not the failure to have at said crossing a flagman, wig-wag, or other means of warning in addition to the whistle signals, was negligence; and, if so, then whether or not such negligence was a proximate cause of the accident. If you so find, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff, unless you shall further find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence as defined in these instructions."

[2] Refused instruction No. 6 is also covered as well by 8, 11, and 12 as by No. 16. As instruction No. 8 is alleged to be erroneous, we here set it forth:

> "Before the plaintiff can recover in this action, it must appear by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant or their servants were guilty of some act of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident. It must also appear likewise that the decedent was without fault or negligence on his part which may in any wise have proximately contributed to the accident."

Other instructions were given by the court which fully and clearly instructed the jury as to the law applicable to this case, and especially to the point that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, as alleged by the defendants, was a matter of defense to be proved by a preponderance of the testimony.

A number of authorities are cited by appellant from states other than California courts, in support of the argument that instruction No. 8 is erroneous. However, it is well settled by the decisions in this state that instruction No. 8 given by the trial court to the jury in this case is a correct statement of the law. Without quoting therefrom, it is sufficient simply to cite the authorities so holding: Metcalfe v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 63 Cal. App. 331, 218 P. 486 (citing Robinson v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 48 Cal. 409; Strong v. Sacramento & P. R. Co., 61 Cal. 326; Sinclaire v. Pioneer Truck Co., 51 Cal. App. 174, 196 P. 281; Needham v. S. F. & S. J. R. R. Co., 37 Cal. 409; 1 Shearman & Redfield, pp. 238 and 239).

[3] It is well settled by the foregoing authorities that, if the negligence of the plaintiff contributes proximately to his injury, a defense is made out, irrespective of the degree of such negligence, as there is no standard by which such negligence can be measured. All that is required is that the negligence of the plaintiff contributes proximately to his injury.

[4] Exception is also taken to the concluding paragraph of instruction No. 22, which reads as follows:

> "A driver of an automobile must use his senses of sight and hearing, when about to cross a railroad track, to ascertain whether a train is approaching, and, if he fails to take such precaution, and such failure proximately contributes, in any degree whatever, to his injury, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and no recovery can be had for his injury or death."

While it is admitted that this portion of instruction No. 22 is technically correct and supported by the authorities which we have cited, it is urged that it is indefinite and uncertain, in that it does not specify to what extent the driver must use his senses of sight and hearing, and whether such use must or must not be continuous. The objection we think untenable. Every day the necessity of an automobile driver using his senses of sight and hearing is enforced by the increasing number of moving vehicles upon the streets of our cities. Every street intersection, by reason of the increasing number of rapidly moving vehicles, has become a potential danger zone, and the driver of every automobile is becoming more and more under the necessity of using his senses of sight and hearing to escape possible collisions, and reasonable use of all his faculties to detect and avoid danger must be exercised by the drivers of automobiles. This we think is the true intent, meaning, and application of the language used in instruction No. 22.

We find no prejudice in the instructions given by the court to the jury in this case.

[5] It is finally urged that the court committed error in the admission in evidence of a statement made by the witness Glocker to the defendant shortly after the occurrence of the collision. This statement is in the following words and figures:

> "1. Name: F. Glocker. Age: 75. Occupation: Bank messenger. 2. Residence: 3130 King. Place of business: San Francisco, Calif. 2½. Home phone: Berkeley 517 W. Business phone: Douglas 8600. 3. Did you see the occurrence of the accident? Yes. 4. Exact place on car (or street) where I was located. First car; front seat behind motorman; right side of car. 6. Did the accident occur at a street crossing? Yes. 9. If vehicle was hit, what part? Side. 12. Within how many feet did the car stop after the accident? About 200 feet. 15. >
> "The following is a general statement of the accident:
> "I was looking out of the side window towards Remar Bakery plant when I felt the air brakes working just as we approached Forty-Fifth. I just caught sight of an automobile front of train. It happened so quick, and the position I was in, I couldn't tell which way the auto was going. The motorman was blowing his whistle for more than a block; in fact was continually blowing before approaching crossing. No blame should be attached to motorman, as the party driving the automobile must have been deaf, dumb, or drunk to try and cross in front of that train, as they surely must have heard the whistle, or saw the train coming. Dated November 23, 1923. F. Glocker."

This statement was admitted immediately upon the conclusion of the cross-examination of the witness Glocker, which cross-examination was as follows:

> "By Mr. Preston: Q. Was this an emergency whistle, or an ordinary whistle? A. Oh, regular whistling going along. Well, they blow continuously there all the time on all the trains. It is pretty hard to say whether it was an emergency or not.
> "Q. In reality, Mr. Glocker, you are going more by the habit of trains to whistle by reason of the number of tracks, as you said? A. Yes.
> "Q. You say they generally whistle, or always whistle, which is it? A. My opinion is they always whistle. I am pretty positive they did whistle. And I think, if I am right, I made the statement when the card was sent to me by the Key Route Company, stating the whistle was blown. If you have that statement you may look it up.
> "Q. How far did you say the train traveled before it stopped? A. Well, about a car and a half length, or two lengths.
> "Q. What distance would that be in feet? A. That is pretty hard to say. I don't know how long those cars are. I know it was down to the next corner.
> "Q. Counsel for the defendant has kindly handed me this paper. Look that over and see whether or not that is what you gave, the statement after this accident? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Now in this statement you say that the air brakes were applied at what place? A. This side of the Remar Bakery.
> "Q. Didn't you say as follows: 'I was looking out of the side window towards the Remar Bakery plant, when I felt the air brakes working just as we approached Forty-Fifth street? A. You see, I made a mistake in the streets: Forty-Sixth.
> "Q. You say here, do you not, that you were looking toward the Remar Bakery Company. If you were at Forty-Sixth you would be looking back at the Remar Bakery plant, would you not?
> "Mr. Hynes: That clearly shows that it is a mistake.
> "Mr. Preston: He says he was looking toward the plant. A. Isn't that the Remar Bakery on Forty-Sixth or Forty-Fifth. Q. It is Forty-Sixth. This says: 'I was looking out of the side window toward the Remar Bakery plant?' A. Yes. 'When the air brakes were working, just as we approached Forty-Fifth street.' A. Well, that is where I made the mistake in putting down the wrong streets.
> "Mr. Preston: It should have been Forty-Sixth. The Court: I think that is correct, Mr. Preston. He was approaching Forty-Sixth and looked out and saw the Remar Bakery.
> "Mr. Preston: I believe we are both wrong, Judge, from looking at it again; 'I was looking out of the side window towards the Remar Bakery plant when I felt the air brakes working;' and then they made a period there. 'Just as we approached Forty-Fifth street I just caught sight of an automobile in front of the train.' A. I meant to say Forty-Sixth on that.
> "Q. 'It happened so quick that the position I was in, I couldn't tell which way the automobile was going.' A. That is true.
> "Q. I didn't understand you said this morning that you said you saw the automobile at all. A. I meant that when the train had collided with the automobile. I didn't know which way the automobile—which way it was going. That is true, too.
> "Q. Had you seen the automobile? A. No, I didn't; but I know they struck an automobile.
> "Q. You say here you caught sight of an automobile in front of the train. Now, then, you say this: 'The motorman was blowing his whistle for more than a block,' is that— A. (Witness interrupting.) Approaching the place, yes. They blow right there continually as a rule.
> "Mr. Preston: That is all."

Respondent attempts to justify the admission of the statement made by Glocker by citing section 1854 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides as follows:

> "When part of an act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence by one party, the whole on the same subject may be inquired into by the other; when a letter is read, the answer may be given; and when a detached act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence, any other act, declaration, conversation, or writing, which is necessary to make it understood, may also be given in evidence."

As we read this section, it does not support the respondent's contention. The statement in fact consists of twenty-six disconnected questions and answers. While the witness was, upon cross-examination, interrogated as to some of the questions and answers, they were not introduced in testimony, and the statement, being mere hearsay, and also the opinion of the witness, should have been excluded. We do not need to review the authorities cited by the appellant supporting the contention that the admission of the statement was error, as a careful reading of the section seems to us to show the statement inadmissible. This, however, does not necessarily lead to a reversal of the judgment. The testimony of the witness Forsberg heretofore referred to, the person who was riding with the deceased at the time of the collision, almost in and of itself precludes the possibility of the jury reaching a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. We here set forth the testimony of this witness in relation to the immediate facts attendant upon the collision:

> "I saw the train when we were quite near the other track. We were right close to it, or on it, one of the two. I knew we were going to get hit. We were within inches of the track; that was the first I saw of the train going the other way. The train looked like it was right on top of me when I first saw it.
> "Q. And do you know whether Mr. Meredith saw that train coming at that point or not? A. No; I do not.
> "Q. You don't know whether he looked in that direction, do you? A. No.
> "Q. How far away from you, that is, from the automobile, was this train when you first saw it? A. Looked to be like it was mighty close.
> "Q. I know, but was it as close as I am to you? A. I don't know. I knew we were going to get hit. That is all I remember. I do not know if Mr. Meredith saw the train.
> "Q. Mr. Meredith did not, as far as you were able to observe, did not make any effort to stop his automobile? A. No, sir.
> "Q. And he did not make any effort to back up? A. No, sir; not that I know of.
> "Q. From the time that you started the car, when the train went north, you were looking at the Remar Bakery? A. Well, I looked up the tracks too.
> "Q. Where were you when you looked up the tracks? A. Just when we started up.
> "Q. Just when you started. But you did not —when you came across the first track, that is the north-bound track on which the train had gone to Berkeley, you did not then look north again? A. No, I don't believe I did.
> "Q. And Mr. Meredith didn't look north as far as you know? A. Not as far as I know."

Add to this testimony the fact that an unobstructed view of the defendant's tracks was possible from Forty-Sixth street to a distance north of some 800 feet, also the fact that the five-car train moving southward on the Berkeley tracks was at least 370 feet in length, it would seem almost inconceivable that an automobile driver using his senses of sight and hearing would escape detecting the approach of a moving object of such dimensions. Had the driver looked, he would have seen; had he listened, he would have heard. If it be assumed that the driver started across the tracks immediately upon the clearing of the intersection by the last car of the north-bound train, then the conclusion would be unescapable that he so started without either looking or listening for a south-bound train. As we have stated, the testimony shows that the occupants of the automobile were familiar with the crossing, had been traveling on Forty-Sixth street where it intersects Linden street for some months at the same hour of the day, and thus had their attention drawn to the fact of the frequency of passing trains during the early morning hours of every day. With these facts before the jury, we do not very well see how any other conclusion could be reached than that the deceased was intent upon reaching his place of business as quickly as possible, and was thus led to disregard all reasonable precautions for his own safety, and like many other automobile drivers attempting to cross in front of trains, took the fatal chance.

It not being reasonably probable that any other verdict would have been reached in this case, we cannot say, under the provisions of section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, that prejudicial error in the admission of testimony was committed by the trial court. If it be assumed that the jury should have accepted the theory of the appellant that the plaintiff's train was traveling in excess of 22 miles per hour, and therefore at an unlawful rate of speed, it would not in any manner lessen the force of the testimony and the circumstances showing that the occupants of the "Jewett" automobile failed to observe the "stop, look, and listen" doctrine, or to take reasonable precautions to ascertain whether it was then and there safe to cross the westerly set of double track lines upon which the defendant was then operating its Berkeley trains.

By reason of the alleged error in the admission of the statement referred to, we have taken the pains to read all the testimony set forth in the transcript, but have copied herein only such portions as we have considered necessary to show the necessity for the conclusion at which we have arrived.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6412.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1928.

Rehearing Denied May 23, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1928.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑53(1)—Alleged invalidity of contract sued on does not warrant dismissal, but requires trial on merits.

Fact that claim sued upon is founded upon a void contract does not require that action be dismissed, but judgment on issue of validity of contract must be rendered on the merits.

2. Mandamus 🔑43—Mandamus held not to lie to require trial court to dismiss action on ground of invalidity of contract sued on.

Mandamus held not to lie to require trial court to dismiss action on ground that contract sued on was void, since question of validity of the contract was an ultimate issue to be tried by the court upon the merits.

3. Mandamus 🔑172—On petition for mandamus to require dismissal, appellate court may not determine suit on merits.

On petition for mandamus to dismiss action, appellate court has neither right nor power to determine such action on the merits.

4. Pleading 🔑106(1), 111—Motion to dismiss on ground of plaintiff's incapacity constitutes plea in abatement which must be supported by facts warranting abatement at time of plea.

Motion to dismiss case on ground of incapacity of plaintiff constitutes plea in abatement which must be strictly construed, and which must be supported by facts warranting abatement at the very time of the plea.

5. Abatement and revival 🔑35—Motion to dismiss action by corporation on account of corporation's suspension for nonpayment of taxes held properly denied, where corporate powers were revived before motion was made (Corporation License Act, §§ 11, 14, and amendments [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743]; Pol. Code, § 3669c).

Motion to dismiss action by corporation on ground of incapacity to sue for failure to pay license and franchise taxes, under Corporation License Act, §§ 11 (St. 1915, p. 426, and amendments thereto [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743]), and Pol. Code, § 3669c, held properly denied where corporate powers had been revived before the trial was commenced and before the motion was made under Corporation License Act, § 14, notwithstanding their suspension during period of nonpayment, since suspension continues only until the tax is paid.

6. Corporations 🔑630(1)—Suspension of corporation for nonpayment of taxes at time of commencement of action held not to prevent corporation from maintaining suit after tax had been paid (Corporation License Act, §§ 11, 14, and amendments [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743]; Pol. Code, § 3669c).

Fact that corporation at time of commencement of action was suspended for nonpayment of license taxes, under Corporation License Act, § 11 (St. 1915, p. 426, and amendments [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743]), and Pol. Code, § 3669c, held not to prevent maintenance of action after taxes had been paid, where action was not previously dismissed, under Corporation License Act, § 14.

Application by the Maryland Casualty Company for mandamus to be directed to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. James M. Troutt, Judge. Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

John Ralph Wilson and Everette C. McKeage, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Esmond Schapiro, Jones & Dall, and Walter E. Drobisch, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an original application for a peremptory writ of mandate to dismiss a certain action pending in the said superior court, wherein S. W. Towle Lumber Company (a domestic corporation) is plaintiff, and G. P. Anderson, Maryland Casualty Company (the petitioner), and others are defendants. The alternative writ was issued by the Supreme Court and made returnable in this court. The grounds upon which it is claimed the said action should be dismissed arise out of the fact that the plaintiff corporation in that action, Towle Lumber Company, had suffered the penalties prescribed by law for failure to pay its corporate license and franchise taxes to the state of California. The action is for breach of contract and foreclosure of mechanic's lien. The petitioner had executed, pursuant to the Mechanic's Lien Law, a bond to secure the payment of mechanic's liens and for that reason was a defendant in said action.

The facts made to appear to us on this hearing are that at the time of the execution of the contract under which the mechanic's lien arose, and also at the time the said action was instituted, the said Towle Lumber Company had not paid its license tax and franchise tax; but after the suit was instituted and a year before the trial of the action upon its merits the said corporation had paid and discharged the said taxes and had been reinstated.

Section 11 of the Corporation License Act, Statutes 1915, c. 190, p. 422, and amendments thereto (Deering's General Laws 1923, Act 1743), provides that the corporate rights, privileges, and powers of domestic corporations which have failed to pay the said tax shall be suspended and incapable of being asserted for any purpose (with certain exceptions not involved here) until said tax and all accrued penalties, etc., are paid. The section concludes with, "Every contract made in violation of this section is hereby declared to be void."

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Section 3669c of the Political Code contains substantially the same language with respect to the franchise tax.

In the said action pending in the superior court the complaint alleged the due incorporation and existence of the plaintiff Towle Lumber Company. The defendant's answer merely denied this allegation on information and belief. During the course of the trial defendant discovered that the plaintiff corporation had suffered the suspension of its corporate powers as above set forth, and thereupon made a motion during the course of the trial to be permitted to amend the answer in said action so as to make the denial of the corporate existence of the plaintiff positive instead of upon lack of information and belief. Said motion was denied by the court. One month later the defendant, who is petitioner here, moved the said superior court for an order dismissing the said action upon the grounds that, owing to the suspension of the plaintiff's corporate powers, (1) the contract sued upon was void, and (2) that the corporation was legally incapable of instituting the said action at the time the complaint was filed. Said motion was supported by an affidavit setting forth the facts regarding the suspension and revival of the corporate powers of said plaintiff. This motion was also denied by the court. The petition herein alleges that the said superior court has the said action now under submission for decision and intends to render a judgment therein upon the merits thereof. The petition prays that the said court be compelled to dismiss the said action without rendering a judgment upon the merits thereof.

[1] To the contention that the action should be dismissed because it is brought upon a contract which by law is void, the respondent replies that the defendants in said action are estopped from denying the validity of said contract because of benefits received thereunder. These are issues of law and fact for the trial court to determine only at the trial of the action. A judgment on these issues is on the merits of the action. No reason exists why an action should be dismissed instead of being decided upon its merits because the claim sued upon is founded upon a void contract. This is not the practice with respect to suits brought upon contracts void for other reasons, such, for example, as being within the statute of frauds and not in writing. In such case the issue is whether or not the contract sued upon does or does not exist, and the issue is raised by pleadings which upon the one side allege the contract and on the other side deny it. There is no reason for a distinction in this respect between contracts void under one statute or void under another.

[2, 3] Whether the contract sued upon is void or not is merely one of the considerations for the trial court in connection with the evidence and all the pleadings in the case. Whether or not plaintiff has a valid chose in action is the ultimate issue to be decided by the court in any trial of an action upon its merits. Upon this petition for mandate to dismiss the action we have neither the right nor the power to determine the merits of the said action. That question is not legally before us. The evidence and pleadings in the action are not before us. Petitioner relies on Ransome-Crummey Company v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 393, 205 P. 446, and Van Landingham v. United Tuna Packers, 189 Cal. 353, 208 P. 973. The former of these two cases holds that where the corporate powers of a corporation plaintiff, after the institution of an action and during its pendency, has been suspended for nonpayment of license and franchise taxes, the said corporation, during the period of such suspension of powers, is wholly unable to either give or receive a legal notice carrying forward the prosecution of the said action. In the Van Landingham Case, it is held that such a suspended corporation during the period of its suspension has no power to execute a contract; that the attempted execution of a contract by such a suspended corporation is void and cannot be treated as the valid contract of a de facto corporation. Under these authorities it may well be that the contract sued on in the action under consideration is void. There may be other issues in the case, however, not known to us which may give the trial a different aspect. The pleadings and evidence may be such that a recovery may be had notwithstanding the contract be void. There may be an estoppel. There may be a contract implied by law. The Constitution and statutes may give a lien. These matters we do not decide. If nothing in the case warrants a judgment in favor of plaintiff on the merits, petitioner may look forward to a judgment in its favor on the merits. The trial court has the jurisdiction and power to determine the issues which go to the merits of the action. To argue that the pleadings and evidence warrant a decision only in favor of petitioner is of no avail. Mandamus is not a substitute for an appeal from an erroneous judgment and is certainly not such before the judgment is made.

It is claimed by petitioner that a motion to dismiss the action, however, upon the ground of the incapacity of the plaintiff to institute the action will lie where the facts warrant it because the granting of such a motion is not a judgment upon the merits. The authorities are conflicting upon the question as to whether the lack of capacity of plaintiff to sue may be raised by a motion to dismiss or whether it must be raised by answer denying plaintiff's incapacity to sue. 18 Cor. Jur. 1185. Respondents' reply to the motion to dismiss, in so far as it is based upon the lack of capacity of the plaintiff to commence the action, is twofold: (1) It is claimed that the plaintiff's capacity to commence or maintain the action is only suspended and not absolutely forfeited. The corporate powers were revived before the trial of the action was commenced and before the motion was made. (2) It is urged that the trial court undoubtedly had jurisdiction to exercise discretion to deny petitioner's motion for leave to amend the answer in the action. 20 Cal. Jur. 576 and 579. The answer, standing then as originally filed, fails to deny the allegation of the complaint that the plaintiff corporation was duly existing. The purported denial, based upon lack of information and belief, is understood by both parties in this proceeding to be insufficient as a denial. Art Metal Construction Company (a corporation) v. A. F. Anderson Co., 182 Cal. 29, 186 P. 776. Therefore, as the record stood at the time the motion to dismiss was denied by the trial court, the pleadings in the case presented no issue as to the corporate existence of the plaintiff, although the affidavits read upon the motion showed without conflict that the corporate powers of the plaintiff were suspended both at the time of the execution of the contract sued upon and also at the time the action was instituted, but that they had been revived before the time of the trial and the motion.

[4] Taking it for granted, without deciding, that the incapacity of plaintiff to institute the suit is a defense which may be raised by the defendant upon a motion to dismiss and that the defendant is not compelled to raise this issue by his answer or waive it, and also taking it for granted that upon such a motion the facts before the court are to be ascertained only from the affidavits used on such motion to the exclusion of the allegations and admissions of the main pleadings in the case, such a motion is a plea in abatement which is not favored in law, is to be strictly construed, and must be supported by facts warranting the abatement at the very time of the plea. 1 Cal. Jur. pp. 38, 39, 40, 41, and 80; California Savings & Loan Society v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 P. 525; Ward Land, etc., Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 747, 82 P. 426; McCann v. Children's Home Society, 176 Cal. 359, 168 P. 355; Rudneck v. Southern California M. & R. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 P. 775; Weyse, etc., v. Biedebach, etc. (Cal. App.) 261 P. 1092.

In California Savings & Loan Society v. Harris, supra, the plaintiff corporation had suffered the penalty prescribed by section 299, Civil Code, for failure to file articles of incorporation with the county clerk. The penalty prescribed was that such corporation "shall not maintain or defend any action * * * until such articles * * * shall be filed. * * *" This penalty is analogous to the penalty of the Corporation License Act. The corporation complied with the section of the Code before the defendant raised the point against it. It was held that a defense based upon the noncompliance with said section must be put forward during the time of the noncompliance with the section, and that, after the corporation had complied with the section, a defense based upon previous violation of the section would not lie. That and the nature of the disability created by the statute are the main grounds of the decision, although something is therein also said about the difference between maintaining and instituting an action. The authority last referred to has frequently been cited and followed by the Supreme Court in this state upon the main grounds of the decision.

In Kehrlein-Swinerton Construction Co. v. Rapken, 30 Cal. App. 11, 156 P. 972, an action was commenced in the name of a corporation which had forfeited its franchise for nonpayment of license tax. Under the statute as it then read, the board of directors of the corporation, upon the forfeiture of the charter, became the trustees of the stockholders and of the property of the corporation. The point being raised by the defendant, the plaintiff asked leave to substitute as parties plaintiff the corporation directors in place of the corporation itself. The motion was denied by the trial court and this decision was reversed by the District Court of Appeal. A petition for a transfer to the Supreme Court was denied. This case is, therefore, authority for the proposition that the filing of the action in the name of a corporation whose franchise had been forfeited is not an absolute nullity, but that it has at least enough vitality to go forward when the proper plaintiffs are substituted.

The case of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, supra, indicates that after a corporation has properly instituted a suit, its corporate power to maintain the action may be suspended for failure to pay license and franchise taxes for a period of time while the action is pending and then go forward with full vigor when reinstated.

The case of Van Landingham v. United Tuna Packers, supra, holds that the attempted execution of a contract by a corporation at a time when its corporate powers are suspended is a nullity, and that such a contract does not automatically spring into life when the corporate powers are revived.

[5] There is a difference between the prosecution of an action at law and the execution of a contract. A contract is executed at one instant—at the very instant that the meeting of minds occurs. If void or nonexistent at that time, there is good reason for saying that said purported contract cannot be revived. Nothing exists to revive. The prosecution of an action at law, however, is a continuous process which involves many acts. If the power of the corporation to prosecute the action may be suspended for a certain period of time intervening between the filing of the complaint and entering of final judgment, as held in the Ransome-Crummey Case, supra, and if the filing of the action by a corporation which has had its charter forfeited is not a nullity, but can be restored to vitality by the substitution of proper plaintiffs as held in Kehrlein-Swinerton Construction Co. v. Rapken, supra, it follows that the said period of suspension may include the day on which the complaint was filed, without destroying the vitality of the action after reinstatement of the corporation plaintiff. The motion to dismiss or abate the action in this case was therefore made after the disability of plaintiff no longer existed, was not well grounded at the time made, and was properly denied.

[6] Section 14 of the Corporation License Act provides that, upon paying the tax and certain penalties:

> "The state controller shall issue a certificate of revivor to such corporation and thereupon such corporation is revived and its powers restored to full force and effect."

Further:

> "The revivor of a corporation under the provisions of this section shall be without prejudice to any action or proceeding, defense or right, which has occurred (originally 'accrued') by reason of the original forfeiture."

The only defense or right petitioner ever had to dismiss the action by reason of the original suspension, as distinguished from its right to prevail in the action upon its merits, was a plea in abatement which, under established law and precedent, was a temporary right that could only be availed of during the period of plaintiff's incapacity. The revivor of the corporation does not prejudice the defense, which petitioner was at full liberty to use during the period of suspension, but restores the corporation so that no future defense can be made on that ground. After the corporation is restored, it has power to maintain an action not previously dismissed. This interpretation is in harmony with section 11, which suspends the corporate powers only until such tax is paid in accordance with the act. A different construction would extend the period of suspension beyond that expressly fixed by the act.

The writ is denied and the proceeding dismissed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action for damages for breach of contract by the Colma Vegetable Association against G. Bonetti and another. From the judgment, both parties appeal, and the appeals were consolidated. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Harry H. Baier, of San Francisco, for Colma Vegetable Ass'n.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for G. Bonetta and G. Bonetta & Co.

MURPHEY, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone. The facts, as developed by the findings, are substantially as follows: The defendant G. Bonetti & Co., is a copartnership of which G. Bonetti is a member and has been a member during all the time covered by the transaction involved in this litigation; that there were other members of said copartnership; that the defendant copartnership became a member of the Colma Vegetable Association, the plaintiff in this action, in May, 1922; that the plaintiff association, a nonprofit corporation, was at all the times mentioned in the complaint a co-operative marketing association without capital stock, organized and existing by virtue of the laws of this state; that it was the purpose of said co-operative marketing association to market vegetables and food products without profit to itself and with a reasonable profit to its membership; that at all said times the defendant copartnership has been engaged in and carrying on the business of farming, raising, and producing agricultural products for sale and during all said time transacted and conducted said business under the common or firm name of G. Bonetti & Co.; that in May, 1922, said copartnership, pursuant to the rules and regulations of said plaintiff's association, agreed to and did become a member of said Colma Vegetable Association and has ever since retained said membership; that in May, 1923, said copartnership, together with other members of the plaintiff association consisting of approximately 60 individuals and firms, all agriculturists, entered into a written agreement herein; under said agreement the plaintiff agreed to accept from its members all cabbage, lettuce, cauliflower, and potatoes produced by said members and to sell and market the same to the best advantage and to collect on said sales the money to become due thereon, which services it agreed to perform without compensation other than the expenses of marketing, which said expenses of marketing were to be apportioned among the members of the association and each of them; that plaintiff agreed to place the products of its members on the market in and outside of San Francisco in such manner as to avoid congestion of said products in any one place and to keep itself informed of the market conditions; that it would dispose of the products of its members to the best advantage and at a price which would enable them to make a reasonable profit on the sale thereof.

It was further provided by said agreement that the members would deliver to plaintiff all the cauliflower, cabbage, lettuce, and potatoes produced by them and each of them for a period of five years from the date of said agreement and permit the plaintiff to sell the same under its own name and fix the price thereof. It was further provided at the time the said agreement was executed and entered into that any sale by any member of said association to any person, firm, or corporation of any of said products should constitute a violation of said agreement, and that from the nature of the case it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage suffered by plaintiff and the members of said association not violating the agreement, and it was agreed and provided that any member so violating the agreement should be liable to said corporation in liquidated damages in the sum of $1,000 to be used by the plaintiff for the benefit of the members not violating the agreement. It was further provided that the purpose of said agreement was to give the parties of the second part the benefit of co-operative marketing and co-operative sales of their products and it should not be construed as an attempt on the part of either of the parties to increase the market price of said product to such an extent that any of the parties of the second part, or either of them, would derive from the sale of said products an unreasonable profit; that on and since the 24th day of July, 1924, the defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co., although then engaged in the business of producing agricultural products covered by said agreement, delivered all their said products in violation and breach of the terms of said agreement to other persons, firms, and corporations and ever since that time have refused to deliver said products to plaintiff and refused to be bound by any of the terms of said agreement; that the plaintiff has fully performed all the terms and conditions precedent of said agreement on its part to be performed and has at all times and now is ready and willing to comply therewith and has at all times demanded performance thereof by the defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co.; that up to the 24th day of July, 1924, the defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co. performed and continued to perform all the terms and conditions of the aforesaid marketing agreement of May 23, 1923. It is further found as a fact that during the times covered by the complaint in this action many changes were made in the personnel of the copartnership G. Bonetti & Co., but that no notice of any kind of such change was given to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff never knew or had any knowledge of any such changes; that the said firm during all the times up to the 24th day of July, 1924, continued to accept the benefits accruing under said agreement; that all members of the firm at all times had full knowledge of the existence of and activities under said contract; that at no time was the copartnership G. Bonetti & Co. canceled or annulled or dissolved, nor was any new copartnership formed under said name; that the agreement of May 23, 1923, was not at any time procured by misrepresentations, concealment, or circumvention, or any unfair practices of any kind whatever, nor was the same procured through fraud, misrepresentation, or duress, or through any such means.

On this state of facts, conclusively determined as such in the absence of any record, statement, or bill of exceptions, the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co., decreeing: (a) That the contract should be specifically performed; (b) that defendants be restrained during the life of the agreement from selling their products to any person, firm, or corporation; (c) for damages in the sum of $500. The defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co. appeal from the entire judgment and the plaintiff, by a separate appeal on the same record, appeals from that portion of the judgment whereby it is awarded only the sum of $500 in damages; it being its contention that it is entitled to the full award of liquidated damages provided for in the agreement of May, 1923. By stipulation of the parties these appeals were consolidated and have been heard together.

[1] The first contention of the appealing defendants is that there was no appearance in the trial court of the defendant copartnership. This point is raised for the first time in this court. In its findings and in its judgment the trial court states that Howard Harron appears as attorney for these defendants and the judgment is rendered against the defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co. In the absence of any record of the proceedings had at the trial of the action in the superior court, the recitals and statements in the findings and in the judgment are conclusive and we must determine this contention adversely to the appellants. If there was any question about proper appearance of said copartnership in the trial court, in view of the findings and judgment, that matter should have been settled by proper proceedings initiated and determined in the trial court at the trial of the action. In this court Mr. Harron stated that he appeared for and represented defendants G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co., the appealing defendants.

[2, 3] It is next contended by the appealing defendants that the complaint, being one for specific performance, is fatally defective, in that it does not set forth the facts to disclose that the contract was just, fair, and reasonable as to the defendants. There is no substantial merit in this contention. The complaint set forth specifically the acts to be performed by the respective parties under the contract, the benefits to be derived by each, and the burdens and responsibilities assumed by each. It may be said that under the particular kind of a contract involved in this litigation, co-operative marketing agreement, all the profits and benefits accrued to the participating members, the services of the corporation itself being nonremunerative and nonprofit sharing, and the court specifically and definitely found that all these allegations were true. In the absence of any record in this case, it must be assumed that these allegations were sustained by competent proof. In this connection we call attention to the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, at page 267, 212 P. 11, 13. The court says:

> "Viewed as a whole, we feel there is no escape from the conclusion that the complaint is insufficient and the general demurrer interposed by the defendant should have been sustained. [This is an action in specific performance in which the complaint was attacked in the same manner as it has been attacked in the instant suit. The trial court overruled the demurrer.] We are not inclined, however, to reverse the judgment for that reason. Whether the defendant called the attention of the court below to the infirmity of plaintiff's complaint, or only demurred as a matter of form, does not appear. After the demurrer was overruled, however, she answered, denying generally and specifically the averment of the complaint attempting to allege the adequacy of the consideration and the fairness of the contract. * * * With all of the evidence before it, the trial court found that the contract between the parties was fair and just and liberal in its provisions in favor of the defendant. The evidence, we think, amply supports the findings."

[4] In the instant case, of course, there is no evidence before this court and it must be conclusively presumed in support of the judgment that there was ample, substantial, and competent evidence to support the findings in the trial court.

[5] The next contention of the appealing defendants is that the provisions of the contract of May 23, 1923, with regard to liquidated damages, are in effect and in fact a contract providing for a penalty, and therefore void. Appellants cite many authorities in support of this assignment, none of which, however, are applicable to the facts of the instant case. In the case of Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959, a case similar in character to the one here under consideration, the court said:

> "Defendant sought to show at the trial that the damage which would accrue to the association by reason of any of its members failing or refusing to market their fruit through the association could be easily and exactly ascertained, and that such damage would consist wholly of a proportionate amount of overhead operating cost. By the line of questioning pursued, it was made clear that the association would suffer an actual monetary loss by reason of the failure of defendant to deliver his fruit at the association packing house for market, as he had agreed to do, but in the very nature of the case we do not think that such damage should be the only damage considered to have been suffered by the plaintiff. Other elements have already been suggested. The existence and life of the association itself depended upon its being furnished fruit to dispose of in the public market. A reduction in the amount of fruit so handled would not only tend to increase the overhead cost to the nontransgressing members, but, we may assume, to some extent affect the prestige and standing of the association as a marketing concern. The argument would be the same, regardless of the quantity of fruit which might have been delivered by the defendant, whether it composed but a small fractional part or one-half or more of the entire product designed to be marketed by the plaintiff agency. Enough has been said, we think, to show that the case falls within the class as to which the law permits damages to be liquidated by contract in advance of their occurrence. It follows as a necessary conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to recover the exact amount fixed in its contract as the sum per box which defendant should pay by reason of his failure to market this fruit in the manner agreed."

In the case of the Consolidated Lumber Co. v. Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 698, 166 P. 385, the court said:

> "Section 1671 of the Civil Code provides: 'The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage.' * * * Whether 'it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage' in a case in which the parties have attempted to agree upon liquidated damages in advance is a question of fact. It will be noted that the specific declaration is made in the contract here in question that the actual damages to be suffered from a breach would be difficult to ascertain, and that the parties are making provision for liquidated damages in lieu of actual damages. The decided cases in this state are uniformly to the effect that such a declaration tends strongly to establish the fact required by the statute to exist; and, further, tends to control the question as to whether the provision is one for liquidated damages or for a penalty, where the contract appears upon its face to be one allowed by the terms of section 1671. [Many cases are cited by the court in support of this doctrine.] There is nothing in the findings to negative the statement in the contract that the actual damages for a delay in delivery of the lumber would have been difficult of ascertainment. That declaration is therefore conclusive."

In the instant case the trial court specifically found that it is impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damages accruing to the plaintiff by reason of the acts of said defendant in violating said agreement and, of course, in the absence of any record in this case there is and can be no evidence to contradict this finding of the trial court; on the contrary, it must be presumed that there was ample evidence to support this finding.

In the case of Poultry Producers, etc., v. Murphy, 64 Cal. App. 450, 221 P. 962, the court said:

> "Upon the question of damages the court found that under the provisions of the agreements it was impractical and extremely difficult to fix and determine the actual damages resulting to and suffered by the plaintiff from the failure and refusal of defendant to deliver eggs to plaintiff, and that the liquidated damages provided for in said agreements were valid liquidated damages. This finding, upon a question of fact, amply supported by the evidence, is conclusive upon us. If more need be said, it seems to be settled that the propriety of liquidated damages in a case such as this is recognized in Poultry Producers of Southern California, Inc., v. Barlow [189 Cal. 279, 208 P. 93]; supra, and Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759 [197 P. 959]."

[6, 7] It is next contended by the appealing defendants that at the time the agreement in question was made the provision for liquidated damages and relief by specific performance and injunction were ineffectual as at that time the provisions with respect to these matters were not a part of the Co-operative Marketing Act then in effect; it being the contention of appellants that the Co-operative Marketing Act containing these provisions did not become effectual until August, 1923. In this connection the court found:

> "That the plaintiff above named, Colma Vegetable Association, a corporation, is now and was during all times herein mentioned, and at all times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, a nonprofit co-operative association and corporation, without capital stock, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the law of the state of California, and pursuant to the act known as the Co-operative Marketing Act under the laws of the state of California, pursuant to Statutes of 1923, chapter 103, sections 653aa to 653xx, title XXIII, of the Civil Code of the state of California."

It is the contention of the appellant that the legislation above named increased the liability of the defendants under their contract. Remedial statutes which are retrospective in character do not impair contracts or interfere with fixed liability. They are not unconstitutional and the Legislature may from time to time change or modify the remedy provided. In so doing it does not affect any vested right. It may be generally said that when the defendant signed the agreement which is here sued upon he obligated himself to deliver all his agricultural products to the plaintiff. When he fails to do that he commits a legal wrong and thereby submits himself to the remedies provided by law.

Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 515:

> "As a general rule, every state has complete control over the remedies which it offers to suitors in its courts. * * * It may give a new and additional remedy for a right or equity already in existence. And it may abolish old remedies and substitute new; or even without substituting any, if a reasonable remedy still remains."

In the case of Aikins v. Kingsbury, 170 Cal. 674, 679, 680, 151 P. 147, 148, the Supreme Court of this state says:

> "The passage of an act providing a new remedy for the state as a contracting party does not necessarily deprive the other party to the contract of his rights. * * * A remedy may be given where none existed before and it follows that a new and more liberal remedy may be substituted for one which was in effect at the time the contract of sale was made. * * * 'In the proposition often stated in the decisions that parties contract with reference to existing laws, and that such laws become a part of the contract, the reference is to those laws which determine and fix the obligation of the contract, the correlative rights and duties springing from it and not to laws of mere procedure prescribing remedies. With reference to these, there is ordinarily no obligation arising, but the contract is made in contemplation of the power of the Legislature to change them. Of course, all remedy cannot be taken away, nor can the existing remedy be so altered as to take away or impair any of the rights given by the contract as interpreted by existing law.' * * *
> "'The distinction between the obligation of a contract and a remedy given by the Legislature to enforce that obligation exists in the nature of things, and without impairing the obligation of the contract, the remedy may certainly be modified as the wisdom of the nation may direct.'"

In the case of Brown v. Staple Cotton Co-operative Ass'n (Miss.) 96 So. 849, the court says:

> "It is true that said Co-operative Marketing Act, having been adopted after the contract here considered was entered into, does not and could not undertake to control the substantive rights of the parties to this cause. It is not true, however, that the remedies therein provided are not applicable to past as well as future transactions. It is too well settled to merit discussion that a remedy afforded by a statute passed subsequent to the date of the contract in question may be invoked by a party to the contract who has been wronged by its nonperformance. Such legislation does not impair the obligation of a contract. The obligation of a contract has reference alone to the rights of the parties arising thereunder and not to any remedy for their enforcement. A law creating a remedy applies to prior as well as future contracts and is constitutional."

There are many other cases holding to this same effect. Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48; Galland et al. v. Lewis, 26 Cal. 46; People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 148; Buck v. Canty, 162 Cal. 226, 121 P. 924; Boggs v. Ganeard, 148 Cal. 711, 84 P. 195; 5 Cal. Jur. 781.

[8] The next contention of the appealing defendants is that the contract cannot be specifically enforced and injunctive relief may not be given under the laws of this state. In this connection the appellants quote from the case of Poultry, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 279, 208 P. 93, wherein the Supreme Court, while sustaining many features of the Co-operative Marketing Act, held that specific performance would not lie by reason of want of mutuality of remedies, and in this connection the court said:

> "Were it not for the doctrine of mutuality of remedy as a prerequisite to the equitable relief here demanded, there would seem to be no good reason for denying respondent the more adequate relief that would be thus afforded to marketing corporations such as this which are more or less dependent for their efficient maintenance and operation upon ability to specifically enforce the mutual obligations of their members. The individual stockholder thus contracting the delivery of his wares would seem to be adequately safeguarded by his legal remedy for damages."

This decision of the Supreme Court was rendered in July, 1922. In response, apparently to this suggestion of the Supreme Court, the Legislature at its succeeding session enacted section 653pp of the Civil Code (St. 1923, pp. 229, 230, § 1), which provides:

> "(a) The by-laws or the marketing contract may fix, as liquidated damages, specific sums to be paid by the member or stockholder to the association upon the breach by him of any provision of the marketing contract," etc.
> "(b) Injunctions. In the event of any such breach or threatened breach of such marketing contract by a member, the association shall be entitled to an injunction to prevent the further breach of the contract and to a decree of specific performance thereof."

By this enactment the Legislature has granted to co-operative marketing associations the remedies of injunction and specific performance and deliberately abrogated all contradictory legislation and judicial determinations.

These co-operative marketing acts have been sustained in a great number of states. In Potter v. Dark Tobacco Growers' Co-operative Ass'n, 201 Ky. 441, 257 S. W. 33, the court said:

> "Farmers, if unorganized, necessarily act as individuals and not as groups in marketing their products, resulting in 'dumping' by the farmers, distribution by speculators, an unconscionable and uneconomic spread between producer and consumer in the necessities of life, and an inevitable demoralization of basic economic conditions, to the hurt directly or indirectly of every citizen.
> "With a clear recognition of this fact borne in upon the public conscience by the threatened economic collapse of the farming industry indispensable to public welfare and national stability, if not national existence, an enlightened public opinion unmistakenly demands that farmers be permitted to organize for the marketing of their crops, not merely for their own protection, but for the public good."

The Supreme Court of Kansas, in Kansas Wheat Growers' Ass'n v. Schulte, 113 Kan. 672, 216 P. 311, gives an enlightening exposition of this subject-matter. The court says:

> "This association was organized for the sole purpose of marketing the wheat raised by its members, and performing such functions as are incidental thereto. From the very nature of things it must have the wheat or it cannot exist. It has no power to buy wheat; hence it cannot go into the open market and purchase wheat to fill its contracts of sale, if the members fail to deliver, and thus sustain its existence or recoup its loss. Even the payment of damages of 25 cents per bushel stipulated to be paid by a member for each bushel he produces and sells elsewhere would not sustain the association and enable it to do the business for which it is incorporated. Hence, as a practical matter, it is of little consequence that the member is solvent and able to respond in damages. If the association received damages from all, or a substantial portion, of its members, it would cease as a going concern, or be so seriously handicapped as to destroy its usefulness. Wheat is the only commodity the association can use as a going concern. All it can do with money is to pay its expenses and disburse the balance among its members. It necessarily follows that there is no adequate remedy at law. The only adequate remedy is injunction, preventing the member from selling to others, and thus forcing the delivery of the wheat to the association. Washington Cranberry Growers' Ass'n v. Moore, 117 Wash. 430, 201 P. 773, 204 P. 811 [25 A. L. R. 1077]; Phez Co. v. Salem Fruit Union, 103 Or. 514, 201 P. 222, 205 P. 970 [25 A. L. R. 1090]; Owen County Burley Tobacco Society v. Brumback, 128 Ky. 137, 107 S. W. 710."

With respect to the remedial provisions the co-operative marketing laws have been specifically passed upon and affirmed in Oregon, Washington, Kentucky, and have been enacted in some 30 other states.

[9] It may fairly be said that, irrespective of the provisions of the Co-operative Marketing Act, the remedies of specific performance and injunction would seem to be available to the plaintiff for the reason that the defendants in their contract have agreed that the plaintiff may have such remedy. There are many authorities in support of the subject. California Civ. Code, § 3513; Allen v. Hance, 161 Cal. 189, 118 P. 527, holds that a statute designated for the protection and benefit of the property owner may be waived by him; Tebbets v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 155 Cal. 137, 99 P. 501; Nunez v. Morgan, 77 Cal. 427, 19 P. 753; Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 566.

[10, 11] The last contention that we shall consider as raised by appellant is that the law is unconstitutional because it is special legislation. In the case of Poultry Producers' Ass'n v. Barlow, supra, in addition to holding that the law is not in contravention of the Cartwright Act (St. 1907, p. 984), the court generally sustained the constitutionality of the act except in so far as it applied to the remedies of specific performance and injunction. Agreements under the Co-operative Marketing Act, with these exceptions, have been sustained in a large number of cases and particularly in the cases of the Poultry Producers' Ass'n of Central California v. Murphy, 64 Cal. App. 450, 221 P. 962; Poultry Producers of Central California v. Nilsson, 197 Cal. 245, 239 P. 1086; Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959. In Re Martin, 157 Cal. 51, 106 P. 235, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, the Supreme Court says:

> "These various specifications are in effect directed to the same point—namely, that the law arbitrarily selects for its operation a special class of persons. It is, we think, unnecessary at this date to cite many authorities in support of the proposition that a law is not special or lacking in uniformity merely because it does not apply to every person or subject within the state. 'An act to be general in its scope need not include all classes of individuals in the state; it answers the constitutional requirements if it relates to and operates uniformly upon the whole of any single class.' Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 P. 383. The classification created for the purposes of legislation must, of course, be a reasonable one. The test of its propriety is well stated in City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604, where the court declared 'that although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law.'"

In National Union Fire Insurance Co. v. Wanberg, 260 U. S. 71, 43 S. Ct. 32, 67 L. Ed. 136, Chief Justice Taft says:

> "The statute treats the business of hail insurance as affected with a public interest. In that country, where a farmer's whole crop, the work and product of a year, may be wiped out in a few minutes, and where the recurrence of such manifestations of nature is not infrequent, and no care can provide against their destructive character, it is of much public moment that agencies like insurance companies to distribute the loss over the entire community should be regulated so as to be effective for the purpose. * * * There is no discrimination and no denial of the equal protection of the laws. * * *
> "The Legislature was evidently convinced that it would help the public interest if farmers could be induced generally to take out hail insurance and 'temper the wind' so injurious to the agriculture of the state, and that they would be more likely to avail themselves of this protection if they could effect the insurance promptly and on the eve of the danger."

It is worthy of note that in the case just cited the Supreme Court forces a contract upon an insurance company against its will, justifying the legislation on the ground that the protection of the farmer's crop is a matter of public interest.

[12] The judgment, in so far as the appealing defendant is concerned, is affirmed. With respect to the judgment of the trial court in awarding the plaintiff the sum of $500 damages, we see no escape from the conclusion that in rendering this judgment the trial court was in error. If our conclusion with respect to liquidated damages under this character of contract is correct, it is determinative of this appeal. We know of no law that would justify the trial court in fixing an arbitrary amount as damages in contravention of the terms of the agreement made by the parties. This conclusion is confirmed by the cases hereinbefore cited, Poultry Producers v. Murphy, supra, and Consolidated Lumber Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 698, 166 P. 385. With respect to this phase of the case the judgment is erroneous. The judgment is modified by changing the $500 allowed plaintiff to $1,000, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, plaintiff to recover costs on appeal.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1928.

1. Electricity ⚷19(5)—In action for damage to household furnishings from fire alleged to have resulted from defective electric wiring, evidence did not sustain verdict for plaintiffs.

In action for damages to household furnishing, resulting from alleged defective electric wiring, evidence held not to support verdict for plaintiffs, when considered as whole, giving weight to testimony of experts to which it is entitled, namely, that whenever subject under consideration is one within knowledge of experts only, and is not within knowledge of laymen, expert evidence is conclusive on question in issue.

2. Evidence ⚷5(2)—It is common knowledge that, when mystery surrounds origin of fire, defective electric wires are invariably charged as cause.

It is matter of common knowledge that, whenever mystery surrounds origin of fire, defective electric wires are invariably charged as cause.

3. Abatement and revival 🔑9—Action for damage to household furnishings may not be abated because of prior suit by plaintiffs and son for damage to house.

In action for damages to household furnishings caused by fire, plea in abatement, based on previous action to recover damage by reason of burning of house which plaintiffs and son owned jointly, held that, because of additional plaintiff in previous case, that plea was defeated, since, in order to successfully maintain plea in abatement by reason of prior action pending, it must appear that such action is based on same cause and contested by same parties.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered upon a jury's verdict for the plaintiffs for damages suffered by reason of the destruction by fire of certain household furnishings belonging to the plaintiffs and located in a dwelling occupied by them as their home.

The complaint alleges that the defendant, without right or permission so to do attached its "high-powered electric service wires" to plaintiffs' house for the purpose of serving electric energy to a house located upon an adjacent lot; that the said wires were so defectively, negligently, and carelessly attached to plaintiffs' house, and were so defectively and negligently maintained thereon, that the said house and the furnishings therein contained were destroyed by fire on March 9, 1924; that the fire "was caused by the said energized electric wires"; and that, at the time of the fire plaintiffs were occupying said house, and had certain furnishings and personal property therein, all of which were destroyed by said fire through the careless and negligent acts of said defendant.

The answer admits that defendant attached its wires to plaintiffs' house, but denies that said wires were high-powered or other than the usual service wires used in connection with furnishing electric energy to dwelling houses for lighting purposes. The answer further denied all of the other material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition, sets up an affirmative defense in the nature of a plea in abatement, alleging that the plaintiffs herein with one L. A. Boomer did on the 4th day of September, 1924, file an action in the superior court in and for the county of Orange, for the purpose of collecting a claim of $3,500 as damages alleged to have been suffered by the said named plaintiffs by reason of destruction of their house by fire; that the house therein described and referred to is the same house described as destroyed by fire in the instant case, and its destruction was caused by the same fire which resulted through the same circumstances as alleged in the instant case causing the destruction of plaintiffs' furniture. The defendant further alleges that a judgment was rendered in the aforesaid referred to action in favor of the plaintiffs herein and their son, L. A. Boomer, for the sum of $2,500, and that an appeal has been perfected from the said judgment to the Supreme Court of the state of California.

Upon the submission of the case to the jury, a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,000. From the judgment entered upon this verdict the defendant appeals.

From the evidence in the record the following undisputed facts may be gleaned:

In the early morning of March 9, 1924, as day was breaking, the dwelling house occupied by the plaintiffs, and which was jointly owned by plaintiffs and their son, L. A. Boomer, was destroyed by fire, together with a large portion of the furnishings located therein owned by the plaintiffs. The house had recently been constructed, and had been occupied but a few months prior to the conflagration. On January 1, 1924, J. A. Boomer, one of the plaintiffs, signed a written request to the defendant company, which is a public utility distributing electric energy in that locality, to connect their house with electric wires for lighting purposes. About the same time a similar request was made of the defendant by a neighbor whose house was about 20 feet distant from plaintiffs' house. Defendant had a power line some 250 feet from plaintiffs' house, and on January 25th, for the purpose of supplying plaintiffs and the neighboring house with electric current for lighting purposes, ran two service wires from its power line, and connected the service lines by porcelain spools to the ends of the rafters on the northeast corner of plaintiffs' house. From this point the service wires ran up toward the gable and under the overhanging eaves to a point where they were fastened again to porcelain spools, which in turn were attached to a false beam nailed onto the rafters. From this point the wires were strung to the neighbor's house.

At the time of the fire, plaintiffs' house had not yet been connected with the service wires; the reason appearing for the delay being that the plaintiffs had failed to furnish or construct a meter box in which the defendant was to install its meter. The neighboring house, however, was connected with the service wires, and used electric energy carried over them for four or six weeks prior to the fire.

Attached to one of the poles on the defendant's power line, and at a point not far from where the service lines attached to the feed line, was a 5-kilowatt transformer such as is usually used for reducing the electric current from 2,200 volts, as carried on their feed lines, to 110 volts carried on the service lines. This transformer was equipped with 5–M spring fuses, which served the purpose of breaking electric connections in the event that an excessive voltage passed from the feed lines into the service lines. The service lines were insulated and of the size and character usually used for such purposes. It further appears that the service wires, as they approached plaintiffs' house, and were carried along from the ends of the rafters to a point under the eaves from which they left respondents' house for the neighboring house, at no point were nearer to each other than twelve inches. There is some testimony in the record that one of the insulated service wires touched the false rafter near the porcelain spool to which this wire was attached.

There is no direct evidence as to how the fire was started. Early in the morning, just about daybreak, plaintiffs were aroused by some one calling "fire." On reaching the outside of the house, they found that the roof was on fire; the fire burning under the eaves and running up toward the ridge of the gable. Apparently the fire was first observed by one Emma J. Williams, who stated that she lived "straight east two long blocks from plaintiffs' house, and that there was nothing to obstruct her view of plaintiffs' house." She further testified that on the morning in question she got out of bed and pulled up the shade of her bedroom window to see if it was daylight, and then for the first time observed a light located apparently on plaintiffs' house, which "looked unusually large to me for an ordinary electric light." She stated that she then remarked to her husband that the light did not look like an arc light, and that she believed it was a fire, and that upon further observation she thought that the light she saw was a blaze coming out of the roof of plaintiffs' house. She stated that she did not remember seeing any smoke at first, but that later she saw some smoke; that the light as she first saw it was quite pale, and not red, and fixed the location of the light as on the northeast corner of plaintiffs' house "right up on top of the eaves." The only other testimony in the record describing the fire is that of the plaintiffs and their son, who first observed the fire when it was well under way, burning up the end gable and through the roof. The witnesses all place the fire at its outset as burning in the vicinity of the northeast corner of the roof where the two service wires were attached.

Among the witnesses for the defendant were those who had charge of the stringing of the service wires and the general oversight of the maintenance of the line. Their testimony to the effect that the wires used were new insulated wires of the character, size, and quality usually used for such purposes, and that the same were strung and attached to the house in the manner provided by the best usage and by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, was not disputed. Testimony was also offered to show that, after the fire, the service wires and the transformer were carefully examined; that the wires showed that there had been no short circuit, and the transformer was neither burned out nor were any of the fuses exploded; that there was nothing from an examination made of the wires and the transformers after the fire that indicated that there had been any excess voltage pass over the service line. The defendant's evidence further showed that prior to the fire no trouble had been reported to the defendant company affecting the service wires in question, and that they had served without trouble the neighboring house with electric energy for lighting purposes. In addition to this evidence, as to the conditions of the wiring and transformer, defendant offered the testimony of three expert witnesses, who gave it as their unqualified opinion that, under the conditions existing, as testified to by the witnesses in relation to the character and condition of the service wires before and after the fire, the manner in which they were connected to the house, the condition of the transformer before and after the fire, and all other matters presented in evidence relating to the service wires and their attachment to the house, it was impossible for the fire to have been started from the service wires. No expert testimony was offered by the plaintiffs to refute the opinions given by defendant's experts. To discuss in detail the reasons given by these expert witnesses for their conclusion would extend this opinion to unwarranted length without serving any useful purpose.

[1, 2] The jury undoubtedly inferred from the fact that the fire was first seen burning near where the wires were attached to the house, there being no other explanation offered for the fire, that it must have started from the electric wires. It is a matter of common knowledge that, when mystery surrounds the origin of a fire, "defective electric wires" are invariably charged as the cause. The inquiring lay mind, seeking an explanation, will often, in the absence of specific information, dignify a guess with the assurance of a conclusion. Possibly the evidence presented in the instant case might have gained judicial sanction for this custom were it not for the undisputed evidence given by the electrical experts that the fire could not have been started from the service wires under the conditions existing as appeared in the evidence. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the evidence in the case justified more than a guess as to the cause of the fire, and that the evidentiary facts supported an inference that the fire was caused by the wires, we are met with the rule as emphasized in the case of William Simpson Const. Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., 74 Cal. App. 239, 240 P. 58, "that whenever the subject under consideration is one within the knowledge of experts only, and is not within the common knowledge of laymen, the expert evidence is conclusive upon the question in issue." This rule would seem to be particularly applicable in the instant case. As already pointed out, the meager facts bearing upon the origin of the fire hardly justify more than a guess that the fire was caused by the service wires. Respondents lay emphasis on the testimony of the witness Emma J. Williams to the effect that the light she first observed gave forth no smoke, but was quite pale in color. This respondents urge, would justify the inference that the first light she observed was created by a short circuit induced by the two service wires coming together. This inference would seem to entirely lose its weight in the light of the undisputed evidence that the wires in question were insulated and fastened apart not less than twelve inches. Furthermore, it is significant that the witness in question testified that but a few minutes after she first observed the light she and her husband were both satisfied that what they observed was the plaintiffs' house burning. Then, too, considering the distance of the witness from the plaintiffs' house and the early morning hour, at which time, according to her own testimony, there was a haze, all this would lead to but one reasonable conclusion, and that is that what the witness Emma J. Williams saw was the blaze in its incipient stage.

Considering all of the evidence, and particularly the evidence of the experts, giving to it the weight which it has been held in this state it is entitled to, we are led to the conclusion that the evidence does not support the charge that the fire was caused by defendant's service wires. From this it would follow that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

In view of our conclusions on this vital point, the question as to whether or not the plaintiffs have borne the burden of proving the charge that the defendant was negligent in constructing and maintaining the service wires, becomes unimportant.

As the case will be remanded for further proceedings, it is proper that we should consider the point urged by appellant that the court committed error in refusing to give a requested instruction to the jury that the evidence offered in support of defendant's special defense of "plea in abatement" entitled appellant to a verdict in its favor.

[3] The plea in abatement is based upon the fact that, in a previous action filed to recover damages suffered by reason of the burning of the house in question, plaintiffs and their son, L. A. Boomer, were plaintiffs with the defendant here as defendant. It appears that the plaintiffs, with their son, jointly owned the house in question, while the plaintiffs here were the sole owners of the furnishings therein contained. Appellant contends that under these circumstances respondents should have included in the prior action their claim for damages for the furniture which was destroyed by the fire. Even if it be admitted that this point would be well taken, if in the prior action the plaintiffs were the same as in the instant case, yet the fact that there was an additional plaintiff in the prior case would seem to defeat appellant's contention.

In order to successfully maintain the plea in abatement by reason of a prior action pending, it must appear that such action is based upon the same cause and contested by the same parties. 1 Cal. Jur. 31; Cobe v. Crane, 173 Cal. 116, 118, 159 P. 587; Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 150 Cal. 734, 89 P. 1108.

In view of the conclusions we have heretofore indicated, the judgment is reversed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1928.

1. Trespass ⚿40(4)—Complaint charging that defendant, "without right, license or permission," attached electric wires to plaintiff's house, which resulted in its destruction, stated cause of action for trespass.

Complaint charging that defendant, "without any right, license, or permission," went on plaintiff's property and attached its wires to plaintiff's house, and, as result of this trespass, plaintiff's house was destroyed by fire caused by such electric wires, stated cause of action for trespass.

2. Negligence ⚿108(2)—It is unnecessary to aver that facts complained of were negligently performed, where facts necessarily exclude any other hypothesis.

It is not necessary to aver that facts complained of were negligently performed, where facts alleged necessarily exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence.

3. Negligence ⚿111(1, 3)—To allege cause of action based on negligence, it should appear in what respect defendant was negligent, and that negligence caused injury.

In order that complaint shall sufficiently allege cause of action based on negligence, it should appear in what respect defendant was negligent, and that such negligence had causal connection with plaintiff's injury.

4. Trespass ⚷43(1)—That evidence material to issue of trespass supported issue of negligence did not justify court in declaring case was tried on theory of negligence.

In action for damages alleged to have resulted from burning of house, where complaint stated cause of action for trespass and plaintiff asserted that complaint presented issue of negligence, the fact that evidence material to establish trespass tended to support issue of negligence held not to justify court in declaring that case was tried on theory of negligence.

5. Electricity ⚷19(5)—Assuming issue of negligence was involved, evidence did not sustain verdict that fire damaging house was caused by electric wiring.

In action for damage to house from fire alleged to have been caused by electric wiring, assuming that issue of negligence was involved, evidence held not to sustain verdict for plaintiffs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by J. A. Boomer and others against the Southern California Edison Company for damages suffered by reason of a fire. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Roy V. Reppy and E. W. Cunningham, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James L. Allen and James L. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The case before us for review is one wherein plaintiffs were awarded a judgment for $2,500 as damages suffered through the loss by fire of their house.

The complaint briefly alleges that plaintiffs were owners jointly of a dwelling house to which the defendant, without any right, license, or permission so to do, attached its high-powered electric wires, and that by reason thereof plaintiffs' house was totally destroyed by fire on March 9, 1921; that said fire was caused by the electric wires so attached to plaintiffs' house, and by reason thereof plaintiffs suffered damages, etc.

The answer in brief and concise form denies each and all of the allegations of the complaint.

Defendant and appellant, in urging a reversal of the judgment, makes two contentions: First, that the complaint is based on trespass and not on negligence, while the findings fail to find on the issue of trespass, but do find on an issue of negligence, which is nowhere raised in the pleadings; second, even if the pleadings could be interpreted as raising an issue of negligence, the evidence in the record is insufficient to support the finding of negligence.

We have this day filed an opinion in the case of J. A. Boomer et ux. v. Southern California Edison Co., 267 P. 178, being Civil No. 5330, which case arose out of the same fire that caused the loss which is the subject of controversy in this action. The evidence presented in that case relating to matters bearing on defendant's responsibility for the fire, and the question as to its right to attach its wires to plaintiffs' house, was substantially the same as that present in the instant case. For the sake of brevity, we refer to that opinion for a detailed statement of facts and cirsumstances bearing upon the origin of the fire, and make only such reference to the evidence as may seem necessary in considering the points here involved.

It appears that on January 25, 1924, defendant, a public utility corporation engaged in the business of distributing electric energy for lighting purposes, ran two service wires from its feed line along the alley bordering on plaintiffs' property to the northeast corner of plaintiffs' house, where the wires were attached to the ends of the rafters by porcelain spools. From this point the wires were continued up under the eaves and attached to porcelain spools fastened to a false beam, from which point they were carried to a neighboring house, distant about 20 feet from plaintiffs' home. The wires were intended to serve both houses with electric energy. It was and is plaintiffs' contention that defendant had attached these wires to their house without any permission being granted therefor, and that, as a result, plaintiffs' house was set on fire by these wires and destroyed. Two of the plaintiffs testified that they had not given such permission, but it appears uncontradicted that J. A. Boomer, the third plaintiff, signed a written order or request dated January 21, 1924, to the defendant to connect their house with its electric system. By reason of the failure of the plaintiff to furnish the necessary meter box, defendant, although ready so to do, was not furnishing electric current to plaintiffs' house at the time of the fire, but the neighbor's house was connected up and being served with electricity for some time prior thereto.

There was no direct evidence presented in the case as to how the fire started. Respondents urge that there were sufficient facts presented in the testimony to justify the inference evidently drawn by the court that the fire was started by the two service wires attached to the northeast corner of plaintiffs' house.

[1-3] The complaint clearly is one for damages based on trespass. The essential allegations to support such an action are therein alleged, and nothing more. Defendant is charged with having, "without any right. license or permission," gone upon plaintiffs' property and attached its wires to plaintiffs' house, and it is claimed as a result of this trespass plaintiffs' house was destroyed by fire which was caused by the electric wires.

There is no direct allegation in the complaint charging the defendant with negligence, either in making the connection of its wires with plaintiffs' house or in maintaining its wires. It is true that it has been held that it is not necessary to aver that the acts complained of were negligently performed where the facts alleged "themselves necessarily exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence." Silveira v. Iverson, 125 Cal. 266, 57 P. 996. It has also been held, in order that a complaint shall sufficiently allege a cause of action based upon negligence, that "it should appear in what respects the defendant was negligent and that such negligence had a causal connection with plaintiff's injury." Simons v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 64 Cal. App. 74, 220 P. 425. The acts of the defendant complained of and described in the complaint do not "exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence." In fact, it is only by a stretch of the imagination that plaintiffs' complaint can be interpreted to mean that the pleader intended to rest his case upon proof of negligence. The only reasonable interpretation that can be put on the complaint is that the plaintiffs haled the defendant into court to answer to the charge that it had wrongfully trespassed upon their property with its wires, and this resulted in the burning of the house. The complaint clearly and concisely states a cause of action for trespass, and, moreover, the evidence in the record clearly shows that the plaintiff offered evidence only for the purpose of supporting the charge of trespass that the fire was started from the electric wires and the amount of damage suffered. No attempt was made in plaintiffs' case in chief to prove either that the wires in question were negligently strung or attached to plaintiffs' house, or that thereafter they were negligently maintained. In meeting these issues, it is true that the evidence of the defendant in some respects would support a contention that the defendant had strung and had maintained the wires in a good, workmanlike manner, and that there was no negligence on its part in either the material that was furnished or the manner in which the work was done, or the wires maintained, but the evidence none the less went directly to the issue as to whether or not the fire was started from the wires.

We have examined the cases cited by respondents in their brief as supporting their contention that the complaint sufficiently raises the issue of negligence, but we do not read these cases as supporting appellant's view. They deal with pleadings that were defective, but none the less susceptible to the conclusion that the pleader was attempting to allege but one cause of action, and that was one based on negligence. The complaint in the instant case is not to be measured by the rule applied in those cited.

[4] Respondents contend further that, even if their complaint does not sufficiently raise the issue of negligence, the case was in fact tried on the theory that the negligence of the defendant in attaching its wires to plaintiffs' house, and thereafter maintaining them there, was involved, and that appellant will not be heard at this time to raise the question that the issue of negligence was not before the court. Appellant asserts that neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant presented evidence to meet the issue of negligence, but that all of the evidence offered went directly to the issues raised in the complaint, namely, that defendant was a trespasser, and that the fire which destroyed the house was caused by defendant's wires.

While it is true that some of the evidence would have been pertinent to an issue of negligence, it is equally true that all of the evidence related directly to the question of trespass and the cause of the fire. The fact that evidence material to an issue may tend to support some matter not involved does not justify the court in declaring upon such foreign matter is clearly decided in the following language used in the case of Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 41 P. 299:

> "It is frequently the case that evidence which is admissible to establish one issue may tend to establish another issue than that for which it is offered, and it is a rule that evidence so introduced is available to establish any of the issues in the case. This rule is, however, limited to the issues which are to be tried. If the other issue that the evidence may tend to establish is not before the court the evidence must be limited to the actual issue. The fact of its introduction cannot be used to establish an issue that the parties have not made in their pleadings. The court would not be authorized to consider it as establishing an issue that was not before it for trial. Even a finding upon such evidence would be disregarded in determining the correctness of the judgment."

The court, in the case of Crescent Lumber Co. v. Larson, 166 Cal. 168, 135 P. 502, considering the same question, declares the rule in the following language:

> "All of the evidence on this point was relevant to the issue of payment, which was in the case, and its introduction cannot, therefore, be regarded as authorizing the determination of some other issue not presented by the pleadings."

[5] But, even if we were to assume that there is merit in respondents' contention that the case was tried on the theory that the issue of negligence was involved, it would be unavailing to respondents here, for the reason that in our opinion the evidence that would be material to the issue of negligence is insufficient to support the court's finding, "that said fire was caused by reason of said wires being defectively and carelessly attached to, and defectively and negligently maintained on, plaintiffs' said house by defendant, which defect and negligence was unknown to plaintiffs prior to said fire." As stated in our opinion in the appeal of Boomer v. Southern California Edison Co. (Civil No. 5330) hereinabove referred to, there was no direct evidence that the wires in question did start the fire. At most, it was only an inference which might be drawn from certain facts observed. The effect of this inference, however, was overcome by the expert testimony in the case that under the conditions existing just prior to and at the time of the fire, as testified to by witnesses at the trial of the case, the fire could not have been started from the electric wires. This question is so fully discussed in case Civil No. 5330 that, for brevity's sake, we refer to that opinion for our extended views on the subject.

GLENDORA BANK v. DAVIS et al.

1. Bills and notes 🔑152—Note containing clause making it payable out of sales of merchandise for which it was given held nonnegotiable (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3084, 3085).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3084, 3085, relative to requirements of negotiable instrument, a note containing a clause that payment thereof was to be made out of sale of merchandise in consideration for which note was executed held nonnegotiable as containing a contingency for payment dependent on sale of merchandise.

2. Appeal and error 🔑173(4)—Obligation of maker of note, payable from proceeds of merchandise, to sell merchandise, within reasonable time, cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

Question relative to liability of maker of note, payable on sale of merchandise for which it was given, on theory that he was obliged to sell merchandise within a reasonable time, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal, in that reasonableness of conduct of litigant should be measured by circumstances appearing in particular case.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Glendora Bank against E. A. Davis and the Foothill Finance Corporation. From the portion of the judgment against defendant first named in an amount less than asked, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leland S. Bower, of Los Angeles, and Warren D. Isenberg, of Glendora, for appellant.

Marks, Launer & Collins, of Fullerton, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff sued the defendants on a promissory note for $1,935.48. Judgment by default was rendered against the defendant Foothill Finance Corporation, as indorser and guarantor, for the full amount of the note, and from this portion of the judgment no appeal has been taken. After trial, the court also rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Davis for the sum of $192.80. From this portion of the judgment only the plaintiff appeals.

The only question here involved is whether the promissory note is nonnegotiable in form. If it is, the judgment must stand. The note is dated October 19, 1923, is made payable to the defendant Foothill Finance Corporation or order "one day after date," is signed by the defendant Davis, and appears to be negotiable in form, except that immediately preceding the signature of the maker is the following provision:

> "This note is given in payment of merchandise and is to be liquidated by payments received on account of sale of such merchandise."

It appeared in evidence that the defendant Davis had purchased certain automobile accessories from his codefendant, and executed said promissory note in payment for the same, with the understanding that the note should be paid out of the receipts by Davis from the sale of such merchandise. This understanding was expressed on the face of the note, as above quoted. The trial court found and concluded:

> "That said promissory note is nonnegotiable, for the reason that its payment is to be made out of moneys to be realized from a sale of the personal property for which the note was given, and for the further reason that the clause as to payments out of sales of said merchandise makes it payable on a contingency which may not occur."

[1, 2] We think the conclusion of the trial court was correct. Section 3082 of the Civil Code requires, among other things, that an instrument, to be negotiable, must contain an unconditional promise to pay a certain sum in money. Section 3084 provides that a promise to pay out of a particular fund is not unconditional, and section 3085 provides that "an instrument payable on a contingency is not negotiable, and the happening of the contingency does not cure the defect." It is clear that the last clause of the note, above quoted, is susceptible of no other reasonable interpretation than that payment of the note or any part thereof was to be made out of receipts from the sale of the merchandise for which the note was given, and that this provision is "a promise to pay out of a particular fund," the existence of which depended on the contingency of the sale of the merchandise which might not take place at all or might take place to some, but to an uncertain, extent. These factors were fatal to the negotiability of the note under the Code sections referred to. See Tomlin v. Neale, 76 Cal.

App. 726, 245 P. 800. The amount of the judgment against the defendant Davis was the amount of his receipts from sales of the merchandise prior to the commencement of the action, and which the court directed to be applied as a partial payment on the note. It is insisted by counsel for appellant that, if the note was not payable until Davis sold the merchandise, he was obliged to sell it within a reasonable time, and that his delay was unreasonable. Assuming that this question might be considered if properly and timely presented, it is enough to say that it was not raised in the trial court, and it is now too late to raise it for the first time. The reasonableness of the conduct of a litigant should be measured by the circumstances appearing in the particular case. We are unable to determine from the record whether the defendant Davis was or was not at fault in not selling more of the merchandise before the action was commenced.

TANNER v. HOBART ESTATE CO. et al.

(Sac. 4071.)

Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1928.

1. Venue ⚷50—Allegations of antagonism in county and that there was litigation between communities and persons engaged in business similar to defendants held insufficient for change of venue (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392–400).

Allegations, in motion for change of venue from county where case would be tried, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392–400, because of land involved being situated therein, in action against companies supplying water for private, public, and domestic consumption, that there existed in county where trial would be held a general spirit of antagonism toward any person or association furnishing water for private, public, and domestic consumption, and that certain communities in county were engaged in litigation with other persons engaged in similar business, and that by reason thereof an unfriendly, biased, and prejudicial attitude of a large part of the residents of the county toward defendants existed, wherefor defendants believed they could not secure an impartial trial in said county, held insufficient showing for change of venue, since it was not alleged trial judge or any of court officers were biased or prejudiced, nor that any member of jury or person eligible for jury service was biased or prejudiced.

2. Venue ⚷37—Prior to issue joined, court should not be compelled to decide finally that cause cannot be fairly tried.

Prior to issue joined, the court should not be compelled to decide finally that at the time of trial the cause cannot be fairly and impartially tried in county.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Ammon Tanner against the Hobart Estate Company, a corporation, and others. From an order denying defendants' motion for change of venue, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. B. Huberty, of San Andreas, for appellants.

George F. McNoble and Stanley M. Arndt, both of Stockton, and Virgil M. Airola, of San Andreas, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from an order denying their motion for a change of the place of trial without prejudice to a renewal of the motion at the time of trial. The motion was made on numerous grounds, two of which need now be considered, to wit: (1) That there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had in the county of Calaveras wherein said action was commenced; and (2) that all of the defendants, except the defendant Wilson, are nonresidents of the county of Calaveras, and as to the other defendant Wilson that no sufficient cause of action has been alleged against him. The notice of motion was filed concurrently with a notice of motion to strike certain portions of the complaint and a demurrer to the complaint, and the motion was heard and denied before any decision on the notice to strike or the demurrer and therefore before answer filed.

The action is one for trespass on real property, diversion of waters therefrom, and the destruction of a dam thereon. The action is triable in Calaveras county, where the real property is situated, unless the place of trial be changed as provided in the Code. Sections 392–400, Code Civ. Proc. The defendant Emma Rose is a nonresident of the state and may be sued in any county of the state. The defendant Hobart Estate Company is a California corporation and is suable in Calaveras county as the county wherein the liability is alleged to have arisen. Const., § 16, art. 12. The defendant Utica Mining Company is the alter ego of the defendant Emma Rose. The defendant Wilson is a resident of Calaveras county and is the resident manager of the defendants Hobart Estate Company and Emma Rose in said county. He is properly joined with his principal, and a cause of action is stated against him.

It is urged by the defendants that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion on the ground set forth in the affidavits supporting the motion that the defendants have reason to believe that they cannot have a fair and impartial trial. The Hobart Estate Company and Emma Rose are engaged in the business of supplying water to inhabitants and landowners in said county for private, public, and domestic consumption. It is alleged in the supporting affidavits "that there is a general spirit of antagonism existing on behalf of the residents in the county of Calaveras toward any person or persons or associations engaged in and furnishing water for private, public and domestic consumption"; that certain communities in said county are engaged in litigation with other persons and corporations engaged in a similar business; and that by reason of the business operations of the defendants and the controversies at present existing between said defendants and its many consumers, the unfriendly, partial, biased, and prejudicial attitude of a large portion of the residents of said county toward defendants, and the antagonistic feeling and spirit in general existing throughout the county toward such other persons and corporations engaged in a similar business, all cause the defendants to believe that they will be unable to have a fair and impartial trial in said county. These allegations were not denied, and it is for that reason that an abuse of discretion is charged against the trial judge.

[1, 2] We think the showing was entirely insufficient. It was not alleged that the trial judge or any of the officers of the court are biased or prejudiced. Nor was it alleged that any member of the jury panel or any person eligible for jury service is biased or prejudiced, nor that any of the persons claimed to be prejudiced or partial are eligible for jury service in said court. Indeed, it is not alleged that the cause will be tried before a jury. The cause is not at issue. Prior to issue joined the court should not be compelled to decide finally that at the time of trial the cause cannot be fairly and impartially tried. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72, 79.

We find no error in the order. It is therefore affirmed.

Anna Grazide ALVARADO and William P. Alvarado (Her Husband), Plaintiffs, Cross-Defendants and Appellants, v. Fannie STANTON, Executrix of the Estate of A. A. Stanton, Deceased, and Fannie Stanton, Defendants, Cross-Complainants, and Respondents. (L. A. 9787.)

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Montgomery, Stick, Moerdyke & Gibson, George W. Seith, and Louis P. Pink, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. W. Sorenson and Kemper Campbell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Respondents have made two motions to dismiss appeals. The appellants, as plaintiffs in the court below, instituted two actions against respondents, as defendants, one in ejectment (No. 182980), the other to quiet title (No. 191794). Judgment in each case was entered for the defendants. Motions for new trial were denied, but on motion of the plaintiffs the trial court vacated and set aside the judgments and entered new judgments in their stead. Plaintiffs appealed from each of the new judgments, but subsequently the orders vacating the original judgments, and the substituted judgments entered thereon, were annulled by this court on certiorari. Stanton v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 1001. The remittitur was filed in the court below January 28, 1928.

Any question raised by the appeals having become moot, the appeals are, and each is, dismissed.

Rehearing Denied June 13, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑346(1)—Time to appeal from original judgment held not extended by pendency of matters arising from motion to vacate and substitute other judgments (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a).

Where court set aside original judgment for defendant and entered substituted judgment on motion by plaintiff, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, which judgment was subsequently annulled on certiorari, pendency of matters arising from motions to vacate original judgment did not extend time to appeal from original judgments, and hence appeal from original judgment not made in time after notice of denial of new trial must be dismissed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑345(1)—Motion to vacate judgment and substitute another held not motion for new trial and does not affect appeal from judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a).

Motion to set aside and vacate judgment and to substitute another judgment, authorized by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, is not a proceeding on motion for new trial, and has no connection with an appeal from judgment.

executrix of the estate of A. A. Stanton, deceased, and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion to dismiss appeals. Appeals dismissed.

John C. Stick and Stick, Moerdyke, Gibson, & Untereiner, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. W. Sorenson and Kemper Campbell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Respondents move to dismiss appeals from two original judgments. The actions and the parties are the same as those referred to in the decision, this day handed down, dismissing two appeals from the substituted judgments. Alvarado v. Stanton (L. A. No. 9787) 267 P. 313.

Judgment was originally given in each action in favor of the defendants, now the respondents here, and notices of entry of judgment were served on the plaintiffs on the 6th day of July, 1926. Orders denying motions for a new trial made by the plaintiffs in each of the actions were regularly entered on the 21st day of July, and notices of the giving of such orders were served upon the plaintiffs on the 21st day of September, 1926. Sixteen months later, on January 28, 1928, the plaintiffs filed their notice of appeal from the judgments.

[1, 2] In explanation of their failure to give timely notice of appeal, the appellants rely upon the fact that, after the court denied their motions for new trial, it granted another motion made by them under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and vacated and set aside the original judgments and entered other and different judgments in their stead. The substituted judgments were annulled by this court on certiorari (Stanton v. Superior Court [Cal. Sup.] 261 P. 1001), and plaintiffs' appeals therefrom have been this day dismissed (Alvarado v. Stanton [L. A. No. 9787] 267 P. 313). But, because of the pendency of the matters arising from the motions to vacate and set aside the original judgments and to substitute others, the appellants contend that their time to appeal from the original judgments was thereby extended until the final determination of the proceedings in this court. That is not the law. The proceeding authorized by sections 663 and 633a, supra, has no connection with an appeal from a judgment. It in no manner or degree affects or controls the latter proceeding. Modoc Co-operative Ass'n v. Porter, 11 Cal. App. 270, 274, 104 P. 710. Such a motion is not a proceeding on motion for a new trial, and does not extend the time within which an appeal must be taken from the original judgment. Spotton v. Superior Court, 177 Cal. 719, 171 P. 801. See, also, California Delta Farms v. Chinese American Farms (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 1097.

The appeals from the original judgments are, and each is, dismissed.

FRANTZ v. MALLEN. (L. A. 8693.)

Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1928.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑180(2)—Demurrer raising defense of statute of limitations held properly sustained, where complaint showed on its face that limitations had run.

In action to enforce agreement to purchase stock, where complaint showed on its face that statutory period of four years had run and contained no allegation of absence from state, etc., to stop running of statute, demurrer raising defense of statute of limitations was properly sustained.

2. Pleading 🔑238(4)—Court had jurisdiction to change interlocutory order refusing amendment, where final judgment had not been entered.

Where court sustained demurrer without leave to amend and subsequently refused to allow amendment on theory court had lost jurisdiction to do so by its previous order, held that, since court had jurisdiction to change its judgment during that period, it had jurisdiction to change interlocutory order refusing amendment on which final judgment had not been entered.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑191—Amendment to avoid defense of limitations, alleging defendant had not been resident of state for four years, sufficiently alleged defendant had been physically within state.

Proposed amendment to complaint intended to show that action was not barred by four-year statute of limitations which contained allegation that defendant had not at time of commencement of action been resident of state for continuous period of four years or lived in said state for period held sufficient allegation to avoid defense of limitations that defendant was not physically within state during period involved when construed liberally, at least in absence of demurrer directed to that point.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑191—Amendment to show absence from state tolling limitations should allege physical absence.

Amendment to complaint intended to toll statute of limitations by showing that defendant was absent from state should allege that defendant was not physically within state during period involved.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑189—Trial court should have permitted amendment to avoid defense of limitations, where delay did not appear to have prejudiced defendant.

In action to compel purchase of stock, where complaint showed on its face that action was barred by statute of limitations and demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, held that, cause being meritorious one, trial court should have sustained demurrer and afterwards on application of plaintiff allowed him to amend his complaint showing absence from state tolling statute of limitations, especially where delay in moving to amend did not appear to have prejudiced defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by J. H. Frantz against H. J. Mallen to enforce an agreement for purchase of stock. From a judgment of dismissal on sustaining of demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 261 P. 510.

C. A. Ballreich, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal upon sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend.

The complaint, filed December 17, 1924, alleges that:

> "Defendant is a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., and that during all the time herein mentioned said defendant was a resident of the state of Colorado, and during said time the plaintiff was and still is a resident of said state of Colorado."

It is then alleged that plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement in Colorado, set out in full in the complaint, by which, in consideration for the purchase of certain shares of stock by plaintiff from defendant for $2,000, defendant agreed to purchase said stock from plaintiff "and pay him $2,500 in cash therefor on or before August 4, 1920." If, on or before August 4, 1920, defendant offered to pay plaintiff $2,500, and plaintiff refused, defendant not to be under any obligation to buy it. Plaintiff bought and paid for the stock.

The complaint then alleges that a week or two prior to August 4, 1920, desiring to turn the stock back and receive the $2,500, plaintiff inquired as to defendant's whereabouts and learned he was in Europe; that defendant never offered to buy back the stock; that in the fall of 1920, upon defendant's return from Europe, plaintiff demanded the buying back of the stock by defendant, who refused and still refuses; soon after this demand defendant left Colorado and plaintiff "knew not of his residence until some few months since when he learned that he was in Los Angeles county, Cal." Judgment is prayed for $2,500 and interest.

[1, 2] The claim sued upon had accrued in August, 1920, and, as stated, the action was begun in December, 1924. The complaint showed upon its face, therefore, that the statutory period of four years had run. The complaint contained no allegation, such as absence from the state, etc., to stop the running of the statute. The demurrer, raising the defense of the statute of limitations, was therefore properly sustained. However, on January 23, 1925, when the order was made sustaining the demurrer, it was done without leave to amend, and plaintiff claims the order was made in the absence of his counsel, so that no request for leave to amend could have been made. On February 16, 1925, plaintiff filed a motion to amend the above order and grant him leave to amend and offered a proposed amendment setting up, upon information and belief, the absence of defendant from the state during the statutory period and the fact that the action was not barred in Colorado, where it had accrued. The court refused to allow the amendment upon the theory that it had lost jurisdiction to do so by its previous order. Since it had jurisdiction to change its judgments during that period, it certainly had jurisdiction to change this interlocutory order upon which final judgment had not been entered at that time.

[3, 4] The proposed amendment contained an allegation:

> "That the defendant had not at the time of commencement of this action been a resident of the state of California for a continuous period of four years or lived in said state for said period in that the plaintiff is informed and believes and upon such information and belief alleges that he did not take up his residence or abode in the state of California until long after the first of the year, 1921, and that prior to said time he was not a resident of the state of California, nor was he living therein, but was at said time a resident of the state of Colorado."

It is contended by respondent that this language does not allege that defendant was not physically within the state during the period involved and that such an allegation is necessary. While, technically, he is correct, nevertheless, a liberal construction of the proposed amendment, in the interests of justice, would hold it to allege, sufficiently, physical absence from the state at least in the absence of demurrer directed to this point.

Respondent contends that plaintiff waited too long before making his motion to amend his complaint. While, perhaps, the plaintiff should have made his motion in less than three weeks after the order was entered, it does not appear that this delay in any way prejudiced the defendant.

[5] It would seem that in the interests of justice—the cause of action appearing to be a meritorious one—the trial court should have sustained the demurrer, and afterwards, upon application of plaintiff, should have allowed him to amend his complaint as proposed. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint.

In re ARNOLD et al. (Cr. 3132.)

Contempt 🔑6—Action of officers of committee of political party and another in sending communications to Supreme Court relative to pending case held contempt.

The action of officers of the county central committee of a political party and of the chairman of a reapportionment executive committee in sending communications to the Supreme Court relative to, and giving their views on, a case pending in the Supreme Court, held contempt.

Langdon, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Original proceeding for contempt of court against Ralph Arnold, Alfred F. Andrews, and Frank C. Tracy. Respondents committed.

R. M. J. Armstrong, of Los Angeles, for respondents Tracy and Andrews.

Marshall B. Woodworth, of San Francisco, for respondent Arnold.

PER CURIAM. In an action entitled "Frank S. Boggs, Petitioner, v. Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State of the State of California, Respondent (S. F. No. 12911)," there was filed in this court on March 16, 1928, a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent secretary of state to disregard certain referendum certificates then on file in his office relative to an act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to amend section seventy-eight and to repeal section ninety of the Political Code, relating to the division of the state into legislative districts and defining and establishing such districts and to repeal all acts in conflict with this act" (Stats. 1927, p. 1757), and to take no further action with respect to said referendum certificates or proceedings thereunder. An alternative writ of mandate and an order to show cause were thereupon issued by this court and were served upon the respondent secretary of state. Said respondent thereupon made answer and return, and the matter came on regularly for hearing before the court in bank on the 3d day of April, 1928, petitioner and respondent each being represented by respective counsel. At that time certain counsel, among them Henry E. Carter, Esq., sought and obtained permission to file briefs amici curiæ for respondent. By agreement of all parties the cause was then ordered by the court to be submitted on briefs. No decision has yet been handed down in said cause, and the matter is now pending for consideration and determination by this court.

On April 12, 1928, there was handed to the clerk of this court a communication written by Ralph Arnold, reading in full as follows:

"Clift Hotel, San Francisco, April 12, 1928.

"The Clerk, Supreme Court of California, San Francisco, Calif.—Dear Sir: Mr. Henry Carter of Los Angeles will file a brief with your court to-morrow in reference to the validity of the petitions for the referendum on the reapportionment measure now before the court.

"This is to advise you that Mr. Carter in this proceeding represents the all parties reapportionment committee of Los Angeles county, said committee in turn representing the Republican county central committee, the Democratic county central committee, the Prohibition, Socialist & Progressive organizations, the Los Angeles, Hollywood, and other Chambers of Commerce, and numerous other organizations and individuals in Los Angeles county, in all representing a majority of the votes cast at the last election on the reapportionment question.

"Please convey to the court the information that the weight of the above citizens goes behind this brief.

"Yours very truly,

"[Signed] Ralph Arnold,

"Chairman, All Parties Reapportionment Executive Com. and Rep. Co. Central Com.

"My address is 639 So. Spring St., Los Angeles, Calif."

The clerk placed the communication in the hands of the justices of this court. On the same date there was handed to the clerk of the court, with directions to hand the same to the members of the court, a communication purporting to be "on behalf of the Republican county central committee of San Francisco," signed by Alfred F. Andrews and Frank C. Tracy, chairman and secretary, respectively, of said Republican county central committee, in which said Alfred F. Andrews and Frank C. Tracy, on behalf of said county central committee, protested "against the action Boggs v. Jordan, Secretary of State"; said communication reading in full as follows:

"Republican County Central Committee, City and County of San Francisco.

"April 12, 1928.

"To the Members of the Supreme Court, State of California, State Building, San Francisco, Calif. Re Boggs v. Jordan.

"Honorable Sirs: On behalf of the Republican county central committee of San Francisco we file herewith protest against the action Boggs v. Jordan, Secretary of State, to prevent from becoming effective the duly executed referendum of the electorate of the state against the so-called Farm Bloc Reapportionment Act.

"We feel that this question involves fundamental principles of initiative government and that the clear will of the people will be defeated should the action of the proponents in this case prevail. Not only will the express desires of the qualified number of electors who signed the referendum petition be defeated, but the whole principle of legislation by initiation from the people will be given a serious blow.

"This question involves all petitions by electors. It involves the referendum, the initiative and the recall. It also involves the practice of obtaining signatures to place candidates upon the ballot. Who can say if there is a public official in the state whose nominating petition signatures were of a sufficiency as regards technical requirements as justify his holding present office; and shall we go behind the record of their various elections if we now find that some of their petitions may have vulnerable technical validity?

"The referendum against the Reapportionment Act represents a true exercise of the right of review by the electorate of an action of the Legislature, within the constitutional guaranties to citizenship. We feel that because this is so fundamental, and that it does constitute the people's right of initiative review, interpretations of the act and all of its provisions should be constructively liberal.

"We feel that the signatures obtained for the referendum against the Reapportionment Act are not only valid but authentic. As we understand it, the authenticity of the signatures is not questioned as much as their validity; i. e., having to do with whether the date was written in by the elector or by the solicitor, and other technicalities. However, though we feel that all of the signatures are both authentic and valid, nevertheless, if there were a few in which the validity might be questioned because of a technicality, we believe that the intention of the elector in signing the referendum is the principal, the most important, and a most conclusive feature to consider. Clearly, the electors signing this petition intended to referendum the act, though in making this statement we by no means acknowledge that there were any quantity of such signatures with these technical omissions, or that their number, if they existed, substantially affected the validity of the petitions.

"We take the view that any objection to technical circumstances surrounding the signatures should have been made to the county clerks, or registrar of voters, who accepted for filing, the petitions. Clearly that is the place, and the only place, for the lodging of protest, as to the sufficiency of the signatures. We feel that it is an imposition upon the electorate of the state, the administrative office of the state, and upon the Supreme Court to inject this protest at this tardy time. Furthermore, we consider that the proponents of this action have not acted in good faith in permitting this lapse of time and opportunity in making their protest, and that they are striking at the whole question of initiative action, which is a much bigger and far more fundamental governmental question than the one involved herein.

"We trust that the members of your honorable body will see the justice of the claims we make above, and that you will recognize the legal soundness of the defense which will have already been filed with you by the Attorney General, and that you will deny the mandate which is being sought by the proponents.

"Yours very truly,
"Republican County Central Committee,
"City and County of San Francisco,
"Chairman [Signed] Alfred F. Andrews.
"Secretary [Signed] Frank C. Tracy."

The manifest purpose of preparing the foregoing communications, and each of them and sending the same, at the particular time mentioned, to the court in which this cause is pending, was and is to prejudice the minds of the members of the court, and to influence the consideration of the court against the cause of the petitioner in the action Boggs v. Jordan, Secretary of State, supra, and to influence the views of the members of the court, and to procure, if possible, a decision of the matter contrary to the contentions of the petitioner.

The said Ralph Arnold, Alfred F. Andrews, and Frank C. Tracy are not, nor is either of them, an attorney at law, and are not, nor is either of them, a party to the action Boggs v. Jordan, supra.

The sending of such communications, under the circumstances, to the court which still has before it the duty of exercising judicial functions in the case is an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court and an attempt to obstruct the course of justice, and, therefore, a contempt of court.

Citation having issued, due return and appearance having been made, and no good cause being shown why they and each of them should not be found in contempt and punished therefor, it is adjudged by the court that the said Ralph Arnold, Alfred F. Andrews, and Frank C. Tracy are, and each of them is, guilty of contempt of this court, as specified in the citation, and that as punishment therefor the said Ralph Arnold, Alfred F. Andrews and Frank C. Tracy each pay a fine of $500, and that in default thereof they, and each of them, stand committed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and, until such fine is paid, be imprisoned in the county jail of such city and county at the rate of one day's imprisonment for every $2 of such fine.

Let a commitment issue.

LANGDON, J. I dissent. I find myself unable to concur in the order fixing the punishment just made by the court majority. I am of the opinion that in this matter the penalty should be either the maximum provided by law—$500 fine and five days' imprisonment in the county jail—or, it should consist of an admonition or, at most, a reprimand. If this unwarranted interference with the due administration of justice were prompted by selfish or corrupt motives, or was knowingly and designedly intended, by secret communications, to exert an undue and unfair influence on the court, nothing less than the maximum penalty would be adequate. On the other hand, if, with no improper motives, but through ignorance of court procedure, with no realization of the improprieties of the act complained of, these defendants openly blundered into this embarrassing situation, neither the dignity nor the integrity of this court, nor the ends of justice, require more than an admonition, or, at most, a reprimand, to these defendants.

Because I am satisfied that the defendants, none of whom is a lawyer, did not realize the impropriety of their acts and were actuated by no improper motive, I think the punishment is excessive and unwarranted under the circumstances of this case; that an admonition, or, at most, a reprimand, would be amply sufficient.

BARNES v. CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF LONG BEACH et al. (L. A. 10453.)

Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑30—Alleged invalidity of annexation held not to justify city council's refusal to render effective vote of city and inhabitants of annexed area for its exclusion (St. 1913, p. 587; St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421).

Alleged invalidity of annexation of territory to city under St. 1913, p. 587, on account of the annexed area's having been uninhabited and noncontiguous held not to justify city council's refusal to direct clerk to transmit to secretary of state certified abstract of vote taken on election to exclude such territory from the municipality under St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421, where election was regularly called, and both the city and the district to be excluded voted in favor of exclusion.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑30—Statute providing for exclusion of territory from municipality is applicable to uninhabited and noncontiguous areas (St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421; St. 1913, p. 587).

St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421, relative to exclusion of territory from municipalities, applies to exclusion of territory whether inhabited or uninhabited, contiguous or not contiguous, within meaning of St. 1913, p. 587; suit not being necessarily the converse of proceedings to annex territory.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑30—Act for exclusion of territory from municipality held not repealed by subsequent act permitting annexation (St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421; St. 1913, p. 587).

St. 1889, p. 433, relating to exclusion of territory from municipality was not repealed by St. 1913, p. 587, providing for annexation of areas to city, since there was no express repeal and St. 1889, § 1, was amended by St. 1927, p. 421.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑30—Refusal of city council to take steps for exclusion of annexed territory pursuant to vote of city and territory held not warranted by pendency of action challenging annexation proceedings (St. 1913, p. 587; St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421).

Pendency of suit challenging validity of proceeding for annexation of territory to municipality under St. 1913, p. 587, held not to warrant city council in refusing to take steps for exclusion of such territory in accordance with vote of the city and the excluded district in favor of exclusion under St. 1889, p. 433, § 1, as amended by St. 1927, p. 421.

In Bank.

Application by Martha L. Barnes for mandamus to be directed to the City Council of the City of Long Beach and others to require the certification of a vote at an election for the exclusion of certain territory from the city. Writ granted.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald and Alexander Macdonald, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Nowland M. Reid and Edmund J. Callaway, both of Long Beach, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. The issue of law here before us is presented by a petition for writ of mandate, with general demurrer thereto, Petitioner is a property owner in a disputed area which is either in or near the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles, state of California. Respondents are the city council of the said city and the individual members constituting said council.

The petition recites proceedings in due and regular form under the Act of March 20, 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 433), as amended by the Act of April 22, 1927, in effect July 29, 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 421), to exclude from the municipality of Long Beach certain territory therein described, known as the West Shoestring Strip exclusion district. Elections were regularly called, and voting occurred both in the exclusion district and in the remaining area of the city and decisive majorities resulted in both areas in favor of exclusion. As required by statute, the city council met following said elections, canvassed said returns, and declared said results. But the statute imposes upon said council a further duty, to wit, that said body "shall, by an order entered upon their minutes, cause their clerk, or other officer performing the duties of clerk, to make and transmit to the secretary of state a certified abstract of such vote, which abstract shall show" certain things set forth in said statute and "from and after the date of filing such abstract, such exclusion of territory from such municipal corporation shall be deemed complete, and thereafter such territory shall cease to be a part of such municipal corporation."

The city council refused to issue the order directing the city clerk to transmit to the secretary of state a certified abstract of the vote taken at said elections and the other data required by said provision of the statute; this step being necessary to make effective the result of such elections, and this suit for writ of mandate followed.

[1] The chief reason assigned by respondents for refusal to comply with this provision of the statute is that such territory proposed to be excluded was never a part of said city of Long Beach. This contention arises out of the following facts: In 1923, pursuant to the act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 587), a territory known as Greater Long Beach was supposed to have been annexed to the city of Long Beach. This proceeding for annexation became effective in January, 1924. The West Shoestring Strip exclusion district is a part of that area, and the contention is that such part of said area was uninhabited and noncontiguous territory within the meaning of said act, and thus the whole proceeding failed and became a nullity. Justification of the position of respondents is further sought in the fact that one A. C. Brown and others, among whom is petitioner, have an action pending which has for its purpose the securing of a judgment declaring the whole of said annexation scheme a nullity.

There is, in our opinion, no merit in this position so taken by the said city council. In the first place, conceding the invalidity of the annexation proceedings, the action of the city in excluding it is but to render assurance doubly sure and thus end any controversy respecting the city's territorial jurisdiction over this shoestring area. If the invalidity of this proceeding be conceded, it does not render ineffective the elections. The most that could be said is that it might have been superfluous.

[2] Moreover, we are of the opinion that the statute of 1889, as amended in 1927, applies to the exclusion of territory whether it be inhabited or uninhabited, contiguous or noncontiguous, within the meaning of the Annexation Act of 1913, supra. The statute before us is not necessarily the converse of proceedings to annex territory. Uninhabited territory might have been made a part of the original area forming the municipal territory.

The matter of exclusion is determined by a vote of the qualified electors within the municipality, provided also a majority of the qualified voters in the area to be excluded have voted for exclusion. But if no voters are in said area, or if an opportunity to vote is given and no votes are cast in said territory, and this fact is made to affirmatively appear, we see no reason why exclusion would not be effective based upon the majority vote of the municipality alone. Otherwise from 1889 to 1913 there was in existence no method whereby a city could exclude uninhabited territory by an alteration of its boundaries. The method provided in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 703, c. 346) makes necessary a resolution of the board of supervisors of the county wherein the municipality is situated approving the exclusion, followed by a special election in the municipality for the purpose, wherein a majority vote for exclusion must be had. The favorable resolution cannot be made if a majority of property owners to be excluded protest. The two systems, though widely different in some respects, have the same essence, to wit, a majority consent in both the area to be excluded and in the remainder of the territory of the municipality.

[3] The act of 1913 does not purport to repeal the former act, and in fact only applies specifically to uninhabited territory. It seems to be but a special procedure as to that kind of territory without attempting to supplant the former act. Then again the earlier act has recently, as above noted, been amended, and this without disclosing any attempt to repeal the act of 1913. We feel that both statutes are intact, and that it must be so held. But the fact is that persons were residing in said area who voted at said election at voting places regularly established therein, and a majority so voting favored exclusion.

[4] The fact that Brown and others, including petitioner, have still pending and undetermined a suit challenging the validity of said annexation proceeding does not warrant respondents here in persisting in their policy of inaction. There is no analogy between the position of persons attacking said proceeding and the position of the city here. The annexation proceeding is in the nature of a proceeding adverse to the rights of the property owners, but, so far as the city council is concerned, the proceeding was a voluntary one on its part.

Let the writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

HIETT et al. v. INLAND FINANCE CORPORATION et al. (Sac. 4045.)

Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1928.

1. Corporations 🔑503(1)—Action against corporation for cancellation of note and mortgage held properly brought in county where instruments were executed and land lay (Const. art. 12, § 16).

Action against corporation for cancellation of note and mortgage given it on ground of duress held properly brought in county where note and mortgage were executed and where land lay, under Const. art. 12, § 16, and corporation was not entitled to change of venue to county in which it had its principal office and place of business.

2. Appeal and error 🔑151(2)—Defendant against whom no case was stated and no relief sought held not aggrieved by order denying change of venue.

Where complaint, in action against corporation and its managing agent for cancellation of note and mortgage, stated no right of action against the agent and sought no relief against him, agent was not aggrieved by order of trial court refusing change of venue, and was therefore not entitled to maintain appeal from such order.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by H. C. Hiett and another against the Inland Finance Corporation and another. From an order denying defendants' motion for change of place of trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louttit & Stewart and Louttit & Marceau, all of Stockton, for appellants.

Roy A. Bronson, E. D. Bronson, Jr., and Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendants from an order of the superior court of the county of Stanislaus denying their motion for change of place of trial to San Joaquin county, where at the time of the institution of the action the defendant corporation had its principal office and place of business, and where also the defendant Ross resided.

The plaintiffs commenced this action in the county of Stanislaus against the Inland Finance Corporation, joining with said corporation the defendant Ross, who was alleged in the plaintiffs' complaint to be the president and managing agent of said corporation. By the action the plaintiffs sought the cancellation of a certain note and of the mortgage securing the same upon the ground of duress and menace exercised upon the plaintiffs by said corporation through its president and manager, Ross, said note and mortgage having been executed in the county of Stanislaus, the property described in said mortgage being in the county of Stanislaus. The defendants separately moved for a change of place of trial which motions were by the trial court denied; whereupon the defendants appealed to this court from the order made in the foregoing regard.

[1] As to the appeal of the Inland Finance Corporation, it is clearly without merit, for the reason that the action was properly commenced against it in the county in which the contract which constitutes the gravamen of the plaintiffs' cause of action was made and was to be performed, under the provisions of section 16 of article 12 of the state Constitution.

[2] As to the appeal of the defendant Neil I. Ross, we are of the opinion that it is also without merit, for the reason that it clearly appears upon the face of the plaintiffs' complaint that, as to the defendant Ross, no right of action exists in favor of the plaintiffs, and it also appears that no relief or remedy of any sort against said defendant Ross is sought or prayed for by the plaintiffs, or would be proper in any aspect of the plaintiffs' alleged cause of action. The mere fact that the plaintiffs, out of abundance of caution or for other undisclosed reason, may have united the defendant Ross with his codefendant in said action, would not justify the defendant Ross in seeking a change of place of trial to the county of his residence, or in appealing from the order of the trial court of the county of Stanislaus denying such change, since it is apparent that he has been in nowise aggrieved by said order.

The order is affirmed.

UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. CONEJO OIL CO. (Civ. 4734.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 8, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑106(2)—Defendant who had not answered within time specified in summons nor within extension period was in "default," requiring clerk to enter judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 585).

Where defendant, in an action to recover money for goods sold and delivered, did not file an answer either within the time specified in the summons or within the further time of ten days granted by the court, he was plainly in default within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 585, making it necessary for the clerk to enter judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Default.]

2. Costs 🔑260(1)—Costs of appeal were entered against appellant, where appeal from default judgment on ground of clerk's unauthorized entry thereof was frivolous (Code Civ. Proc. § 585).

Costs of appeal were entered against appellant, where appeal from default judgment on ground of clerk's unauthorized entry thereof was, under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, held frivolous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by the Union Oil Company of California against the Conejo Oil Company. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ben S. Hunter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cooney & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This was an action to recover money alleged to be due for certain goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant.

Defendant filed a general demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant given ten days to answer. Upon defendant's failure to answer, its default was entered, and subsequently judgment was entered by the clerk pursuant to the prayer of the complaint.

Appellant's sole contention on this appeal is that the judgment is void, in that the county clerk is without authority to enter a judgment against a defendant who has appeared in the action.

Appellant cites authorities to sustain the proposition that the clerk in entering a judgment acts, not in a judicial, but in a purely ministerial, capacity, and can only enter a judgment when expressly authorized to do so by statute. Section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes when judgment may be had if defendant fails to answer the complaint. Subdivision 1 is as follows:

> "In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if the defendant has been personally served and no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint, including the costs, against the defendant, or against one or more of several defendants, in the cases provided for in section four hundred and fourteen."

In the instant case, no answer was filed within the time specified in the summons. Upon the overruling of the demurrer, a further time of ten days was granted, and no answer was filed within such further time so granted, and the statute provides that in such case, upon the application of the plaintiff, the clerk must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter the judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint and for costs.

The clerk is not only "expressly authorized" to enter the judgment, but he "must" enter it.

Appellant states that the precise question here involved has not, so far as appellant has been able to ascertain, been directly passed upon. That may be, but the fact remains that the point was decided in 1884, and a bit of diligence would have uncovered the authorities of Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 P. 349, and Wall v. Heald, 95 Cal. 364, 30 P. 551.

[1] No answer having been filed by defendant, either within the time specified in the summons or the further time of ten days granted by the court, the defendant was plainly in default within the meaning of section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The appeal is so obviously without merit that we are compelled to the conclusion that it is purely frivolous, and intended solely for the purpose of delay.

[2] Judgment affirmed, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of respondent and against appellant for the sum of $100 and costs of this appeal.

MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5964.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Findings of Industrial Accident Commission are conclusive on certiorari, unless facts testified to are inherently improbable or inferences drawn therefrom unreasonable.

Determination of Industrial Commission as to facts on basis of evidence is binding on certiorari, unless facts testified to are inherently improbable, or inferences drawn from them are manifestly unreasonable.

2. Master and servant 🔑417(9)—Finding as to injury to employee's left eye held not to require annulment of compensation award on ground testimony showed direct injury was to right eye.

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that employee was burned in left eye by flame from gas stove, causing injury to left eye, and affecting vision of both eyes, held not to require annulment of award, though application for compensation was based on blinding of right eye and partial blindness of left eye, and evidence showed that direct injury was to the right eye only; there being no issue raised as to which eye was directly injured.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Master and servant 🔑417(3)—Court's authority over Industrial Accident Commission on certiorari is less extensive than that given on appeal from decisions of courts.

Powers of appellate court over award of Industrial Accident Commission on certiorari are less extensive than those given on appeal from decisions of the courts.

4. Master and servant 🔑405(6)—Evidence held to sustain award of Industrial Accident Commission allowing cook compensation for injury to eyes from flame of gas stove.

Evidence held to sustain award of Industrial Accident Commission for compensation for cook's loss of sight of eyes resulting from burning of left eye by flame from gas stove, notwithstanding conflicting testimony as to existence of pre-existing disease causing blindness, where it was admitted that the accident may have hastened the final result.

5. Master and servant 🔑376(2)—Acceleration or aggravation of pre-existing disease in employment constitutes "industrial injury" (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing disease is of itself an injury in the occupation causing such acceleration, for which recovery may be had under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended).

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Calvert Briley, opposed by the Maryland Casualty Company, insurer, and the California Lutheran Hospital, a corporation, employer. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, employer and insurer apply for certiorari. Award affirmed, and writ discharged.

Kidd, Schell & Delamer, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. The petitioners seek to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Calvert Briley, an employee of petitioner California Lutheran Hospital, for an injury to his eyes. Briley was employed by the California Lutheran Hospital as a cook, and testified that while he was engaged in his work as such cook he stooped over to look into the oven of a gas range, and that as he did so there was a gas explosion in the range, and a blast of flame suddenly came out of the oven door and struck him in the right eye, burning the eye and some of the hair on his face around it, and causing a sharp pain in the eye; that the eye immediately swelled shut; and that he has not been able to see out of it since. He further testified that the flame did not strike his left eye, and he then felt no pain in it, but that since the accident the sight of his left eye has gradually failed, and that before the accident occurred his sight was good in both eyes. The Industrial Accident Commission found that Briley was "burned in left eye by flame from gas stove, causing injury to left eye, affecting the vision of both eyes."

[1-3] The petitioners contend, first, that the evidence does not show that Briley suffered any injury at all to either eye, and hence does not support the finding on that point. The only direct testimony as to the accident is that of Briley, and petitioners' argument is based upon an analysis of his testimony in an attempt to show that it is vague, uncertain, and contradictory. But, conceding it to be so, it was evidently believed by the Industrial Accident Commission, and their action in that respect is binding upon us, unless the facts testified to are inherently improbable or the inferences drawn from them are manifestly unreasonable, which we do not think can be said in this case. We notice that, while Briley testified that the direct injury was to his right eye only, and that there were apparent subsequent effects upon his left eye, the commission found that the direct injury was to the left eye. The petitioners do not stress this discrepancy, and we are satisfied that it affords no ground for annulling the award. Briley's application for compensation, filed with the Industrial Accident Commission, merely states that "right was totally blinded, left eye was partly blinded," thus raising no issue as to which eye received the direct injury; and the answer filed thereto, while denying that either eye was injured, does not specifically attempt to put that question in issue. It is manifest that there was a clerical error in drawing this finding, but it does not affect the substance of the issue litigated before the Industrial Accident Commission, which was whether Briley received an injury which affected the sight of both eyes. Since the commission found on sufficient evidence that there was such an injury, the question whether the direct injury was to the right eye or to the left eye may be considered as immaterial. To annul this award for such an error on an immaterial issue would be to prefer form to substance. Such a ruling would not be made even on a direct appeal from the judgment of a court (2 Cal. Jur. 1028, 1029); and it is well settled that our powers over an award of the Industrial Accident Commission are less extensive than those given us on appeal from the decisions of the courts. (Dearborn v. Industrial Acc. Com., 187 Cal. 591, 203 P. 112; 27 Cal. Jur. 582.)

[4, 5] Petitioners contend further that there is no evidence showing that the accident to which Briley testified caused the disability for which the award was made or affected the vision of either eye. We have carefully read the evidence on this point, but can see no sufficient reason for reproducing it here. Undoubtedly the petitioners made a strong showing by the testimony of their expert witnesses that Briley's loss of vision was due to a pre-existing disease, and that the burn caused by the gas explosion was not severe enough to affect his vision at all; but there was some evidence from which a contrary inference could be and was drawn by the commission, and we cannot substitute our judgment for theirs or annul the award, even should we entertain different views as to the weight of the evidence. One of the petitioners' expert witnesses conceded that the accident may have "touched off" the disease, and thus hastened the final result. There was other evidence, but this alone would be sufficient to uphold an award. "Acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing disease is an injury in the occupation causing such acceleration." Eastman v. Industrial Acc. Com., 186 Cal. 587, 594, 200 P. 17, 20.

The award is affirmed, and the writ is discharged.

WATKINS v. PENSION BOARD OF CITY OF SACRAMENTO et al. (Civ. 3470.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 2, 1928.

1. Evidence 🔑12—Court must take judicial knowledge of growth of city of Sacramento.

Court must take judicial knowledge of growth of the city of Sacramento.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑200—Present office of city electrician of Sacramento held not same, except in name, as former office of superintendent of fire alarm system entitling one pensioned as superintendent to one-half salary paid city electrician.

Office of superintendent of fire alarm system created by city charter of Sacramento approved by St. 1893, p. 595, § 152, is not the same office, except in name, as the present office of city electrician created by section 16 of the present charter, but by reason of growth of city, rapid increase in use of electrical appliances, and more extensive use of electrical power, an entirely new and distinct office has been created, and hence one pensioned while superintendent of fire alarm system was not entitled to pension in sum of one-half of annual salary paid to city electrician.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by Richard Watkins prayed to be directed against the Pension Board of the City of Sacramento and others. From judgment denying writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Busick & Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Robert L. Shinn, City Atty., of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon an appeal from a judgment of the trial court denying the petitioner a writ of mandate to compel the defendants to grant to plaintiff a pension in the sum of $1,650 per annum, payable in monthly installments.

The record before us shows: That for a period exceeding 21 years prior to the 1st day of April, 1912, the petitioner had been continuously employed by the city of Sacramento as a member of the fire department thereof, and for more than one year prior to the 1st day of April, 1912, had been employed in the fire department of said city under the title and in the capacity of "Superintendent of the Fire Alarm System." That for more than one year preceding the said 1st day of April, 1912, the petitioner had received a salary in the sum of $1,800 per year, payable at the rate of $150 per month. That on the 1st day of April, 1912, the petitioner was retired on account of disability and granted a pension in the sum of $900 per year, payable monthly at the rate of $75 per month, and the petitioner was then and there placed on the pension roll of the fire department of the city of Sacramento, and has since said date been receiving a pension in the sum of $75 per month.

In the year 1911 the city of Sacramento adopted a new charter, which became effective shortly after the retirement of the petitioner herein, as just stated, in the year 1912. By this charter the position of superintendent of the fire alarm system was discontinued, and all the duties theretofore performed by the superintendent of the fire alarm system were provided to be performed by a person occupying the position of city electrician. That thereafter, and by a charter adopted by said city in November, 1920, and which became effective June 30, 1921, the office of city electrician was discontinued, and the duties theretofore performed by the person occupying the position as city electrician were consolidated with, and provided to be performed by, a person designated as the city engineer, or under his supervision and direction. That thereafter, in accordance with section 16 of the charter of the city of Sacramento, an ordinance was duly passed by the city council of the city of Sacramento establishing the office of city electrician, to be paid a salary in the sum of $3,300 per annum, payable in equal monthly installments. Upon this state of facts the petitioner alleges that he is entitled to a pension in the annual sum of $1,650, payable in equal monthly installments. The facts which we have just set forth all appear by the petition filed herein, to which the defendants interposed a demurrer, which was sustained, and judgment thereafter entered for the respondents.

The contention is here made that the city electrician of the city of Sacramento is now an officer of the same rank formerly held by the petitioner as superintendent of the city fire alarm system; that the city electrician is performing the same duties, and therefore, under the decisions of this court in the cases of Klench v. Board of Pension Fund Commissioners of the City of Stockton, 79 Cal. App. 171, 249 P. 46, Douglas v. Pension Board of the City of Sacramento, 75 Cal. App. 335, 242 P. 756, and Aitken v. Roche et al., 48 Cal. App. 753, 192 P. 464, is entitled to an annual pension equal to one-half of the salary now paid to the city electrician of the city of Sacramento. On the part of the respondents it is contended that there is now no office corresponding to that of superintendent of the fire alarm system; that the duties performed by such officer prior to the adoption of the city charter of the city of Sacramento which became effective in 1912 were consolidated with other duties to be performed by an officer named in the charter; and that there is no similarity between the rank and duties performed by the petitioner as superintendent of the fire alarm system and that provided to be performed by the city electrician, and later placed under the charge of the city engineer's department of the city of Sacramento, and hence no standard by which the court could fix the amount of increased pension, if any, to which the petitioner herein would be entitled. It is admitted by counsel for both petitioner and respondents that the petitioner has a vested right to a pension in the sum of $75 per month, and became possessed of such right upon his retirement in such a manner that subsequent charters could not take away that right.

The only question which we are really called upon to decide in this case is whether, under the varying changes of the city charter, the consolidation of offices and the attaching of the duties performed by the petitioner to other offices effected a change of salary belonging to an officer of the rank of superintendent of the fire alarm system of the city of Sacramento as it existed at the time of the petitioner's retirement. If there has been simply a change in name the petitioner is entitled to an increase in his annual pension; but if, on the other hand, there has been a consolidation of offices, or rather, if the duties and responsibilities connected with the office of superintendent of fire alarm system have been attached to and made a part of the duties and responsibilities of some other office, then and in that case the petitioner is not entitled to any increased pension. Or, to state the matter in another form: If other qualifications have been required of the person designated to perform the duties theretofore performed by the petitioner and additional services required to be performed by such officer, then and in that case there has been more than a mere change of name, namely, the creation of a distinct and separate office with which the duties formerly performed by the superintendent of the fire alarm system are required to be performed by the officer having charge of the newly created office. With this in view, we will consider the charter provisions of the various charters to which we have referred. By the city charter approved by the Legislature in 1893 (Statutes 1893, p. 595, § 152) it is specified that:

> "There shall also be attached to the fire department a fire alarm system, which shall be under the immediate charge of a superintendent, who shall devote his entire time to the duties of his office."

After setting forth how often the superintendent shall report to the chief engineer, the section further specifies:

> "All electric light or power, telegraph or telephone wires, erected or maintained in this city, shall be subject to the supervision and inspection of said superintendent, and shall be located, laid, erected and maintained only in such manner as may be approved by him, and so as not to endanger or interfere with the wires or apparatus of the fire alarm system."

Nothing is said in this section relative to the qualifications of the superintendent of the fire alarm system, whether he shall have had any practical knowledge of electrical engineering, or whether he shall be charged with the duty of enforcing any ordinances relative to the installation of electrical appliances, or whether he shall perform any duties in supervising the installing of electrical fixtures or wires conveying electrical energy to buildings or plants using the same in the city of Sacramento, or whether he shall exercise any duties in relation thereto, save and except to make sure that the stringing or laying of such wires shall be so done as not to interfere with the wires or apparatus of the fire alarm system. A reading of the section makes it clear that the duties of the superintendent of the fire alarm system were restricted to and circulated about the wires and apparatus constituting the fire alarm system.

By section 99 of the charter of the city of Sacramento ratified by the electors of said city in November, 1911, and which became effective in the year 1912 (Statutes 1911 [Extra Session] p. 332), in defining the duties pertaining to the commissioner of public works, it is specified:

> "The commissioner presiding over the department shall appoint a city electrician, who shall be a practical, qualified electrician or electrical engineer, and such other assistants and subordinates as may be authorized by the city commission."

Section 99 then sets forth that:

> "The city electrician shall have general charge and supervision over all municipal electrical matters, and, in particular, shall have charge of the construction and maintenance of the fire and police alarm systems. He shall have charge of the inspection of all the electrical wires and appliances for furnishing light, heat or power in, under, over or upon the streets and buildings of the city, and shall be charged with the duty of enforcing all ordinances, rules, regulations and requirements governing the installation and use of such wires and appliances."

Other and additional duties are also particularly set forth and specified in the section, to be performed by the city electrician.

By sections 60 and 61 of the city charter of Sacramento, which became effective in 1921 (Statutes 1921, p. 1940), the duties theretofore performed by the officer designated as city electrician were attached to the office of city engineer and placed under the supervision of the city engineer. Those sections required that the city engineer shall be a civil engineer of not less than five years' practical experience; that he shall have charge of a number of duties, and perform certain functions therein set forth, among which is listed the construction and maintenance of fire and police alarm systems, enforcement of rules and regulations relative to installation of electric wires for furnishing heat, light, or power, wiring of all buildings erected in the city of Sacramento, inspection of buildings, issuing permits for building operations in accordance with the rules and regulations as may be prescribed by ordinance, etc. Thereafter, and as we have stated, under the provisions of section 16 of the present city charter, the office of city electrician was created, and all the duties which we have set forth herein as required to be performed by the city electrician under the charter of 1911, and as required by the charter of 1921, and the ordinances passed in pursuance thereof, were attached to and made the duties of the city electrician.

[1, 2] If the same office, or if an office identical, save and except in name, as that of superintendent of the fire alarm system, had been maintained all through the various transmutations of the charters of the city of Sacramento, it may be admitted that the petitioner would be entitled to a pension in the sum of one-half of the annual salary paid for the performance of such duties, even though there had been a change in the name or designation of the officer performing the same. The résumé of the different charter provisions which we have herein set forth establishes that there has been much more than a change in name of an official designation. In the first place, qualifications have been required which were not attached to, or required to be possessed by, the superintendent of the fire alarm system under the city charter of 1893. The growth of the city, of which we must take judicial knowledge, and also the rapid increase in the use of electrical appliances, and the more extensive use of electrical power necessitated not merely a change in name, but the creation of an entirely new and distinct office, to which should be attached experience, learning, and qualifications entirely different and additional to those which were necessary in 1893. Not only was the city electrician provided for in the charter adopted in 1911 required to possess the additional experience, qualifications, and learning, but he was also required to perform additional and different duties, and there is no standard or measuring stick by which it is possible to determine just how much of the salary earned or paid to the city electrician was for what we may appropriately call the simpler duties attached to the office of superintendent of the fire alarm system and required to be performed by such officer. Again, by the charter adopted in 1921, it is reasonable for us to assume that the growth of the city, and the still greater extended use of electrical power, induced the placing of the supervision of all appliances relating thereto under the general direction of the city engineer, with a subordinate officer named a city electrician, with still greater and more extensive administrative powers as well as duties. Here, again, we are confronted with the impossibility of ascertaining what portion of the compensation now paid to the officer or person who may be occupying the position or rank of city electrician is paid to him by reason of his supervision of the fire alarm system of the city of Sacramento.

In view of what we have stated relative to the changes of the city charter of the city of Sacramento, and the changes and additions relative to the duties to be performed by the different officers named therein, we cannot very well perceive how any of the cases relied upon by petitioner are applicable to the issues here presented. The office or rank of superintendent of the fire alarm system of the city of Sacramento does not exist. The duties once performed by the person so designated are now discharged by an officer having other duties to perform. This is more than a mere change in names, and therefore the record does not show that the petitioner is entitled to any increased pension. It being conceded by the respondent that the petitioner has a vested right in the pension now paid him, that subject is not inquired into.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Proc. § 657.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Eminent domain proceeding by the City and County of San Francisco against the Tillman Estate Company. Verdict for plaintiff fixing value of defendant's property, and, from an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Charles J. McDonnell, Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued in eminent domain to condemn real property for public school purposes. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff, fixing the value of the defendant's property at $50,000. The trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and from this order the defendant has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The complaint was in the usual form. It contained all the allegations necessary to a proceeding in eminent domain, properly omitting any allegation as to the value of the property which the city desired to take. The answer, as amended, admitted the material allegations of the complaint, except the necessity for the use of the property sought, and affirmatively alleged the value of the property to be not less than $75,000. Proofs were submitted to the court establishing a "prima facie" case on all issues, save that of the value of the property, and these were determined by the court without contest. In accordance with the stipulation of the parties the jury was taken to view the premises and the plaintiff rested its case. The defendant thereupon rested without offering any evidence on the issue of value, and insisted that the burden of proving value was on the plaintiff. The trial judge ruled with the defendant, requiring the plaintiff, over its objection, to reopen its case for the purpose of proving value, and thereafter permitted defendant, over objection of plaintiff, to tender evidence in rebuttal. During the course of the direct examination of one of its witnesses the defendant was permitted to question her in detail as to the various transactions and particular sales of other lands in the immediate neighborhood in which she had participated, and this is assigned as one of the errors justifying the order for a new trial.

[1] That the trial court improperly reversed the order of proof of value admits of no doubt. Counsel for the city went into court relying upon a method of procedure accepted and followed by all the trial courts of the state and affirmed by all decisions. The rule is stated in Monterey County v. Cushing 83 Cal. 509, 510, 23 P. 701, where it is said:

> "In California the burden as to value is on the defendant. Section 1244 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides what the complaint shall contain, and it does not mention value or damage. And if the plaintiff is not required to allege value or damage, he is not required to prove it. This was the view taken in Cal. S. R. R. Co. v. S. P. R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 63, 64 [7 P. 123]."

The plaintiff having established its "prima facie" case, and the jury having viewed the premises, the plaintiff was entitled to rest and ask the jury to fix the value of the property it had viewed. The defendant, having declined to offer any proof of value, could not complain at any verdict which the jury might have returned. When, therefore, the trial judge required plaintiff to assume the burden of making proof of value, he committed an "error in law," within the provision of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, specifying the grounds for which a new trial may be granted. By thus reversing the well-established order of proof, the plaintiff was taken unprepared and the ruling was unquestionably to its prejudice.

[2] But upon another ground the order must be sustained. The defendant was permitted, over objection, to ask his witness on her examination in chief details of all the transactions, in real estate in which she had participated during a period of two years or more. This course of examination is defended as tending to show the qualifications of the witness to testify as an expert. It seems to have been offered for the purpose of showing the activity in sales of real estate in the vicinity of the defendant's property and to show the possibility of increased value if the property were subdivided. The impropriety of this method of examination is settled by a long course of procedure in our trial courts and the unanimous decisions of the courts on appeal. See Central Pac. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247, 262; Reclamation Dist. No. 730 v. Inglin, 31 Cal. App. 495, 500, 160 P. 1098, and cases cited.

If there is any virtue in the doctrine of "stare decisis," it is particularly appropriate to a proceeding of this kind, which involves the constitutional rights of the state as well as those of the individual. Rights of property which have grown up under an established method of procedure are better secured by an adherence to such method, leaving to the lawmaking body the duty of providing a different method if a change is deemed necessary.

The order is affirmed.

DINGWELL et al. v. SEYMOUR et al. (Civ. 6140.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1928.

1. Perpetuities 🔑8(1)—Charitable trusts are not void merely because they are in perpetuity (Const. art. 20, § 9).

Under Const. art. 20, § 9, charitable trusts are not void merely because they are in perpetuity.

2. Charities 🔑10—"Charity" is gift for benefit of indefinite number of persons for purposes of education or religion, or to relieve their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint.

A "charity," in a legal sense, is a gift to be applied consistent with existing laws for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Charity.]

3. Charities 🔑11—Trust for hospital for care of free and pay patients held charitable trust.

Deeds of trust reciting that after grantor's death trustees should establish and maintain a hospital for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded of both sexes and for patients suffering from cancer and tubercular diseases, and providing that indigent patients admitted to hospital should at all times receive same care, treatment, and attention as that bestowed on pay patients, held to evidence intention to create a charitable trust, and validly created such trust.

4. Charities 🔑11—Provision for as many free beds in hospital as financial condition permits held not to destroy charitable character of trust (Civ. Code, § 2269).

Provision of deed of trust reciting that trustor desired to modify previous deed of trust provisions for 25 free beds in proposed charitable hospital because of fear that number arbitrarily fixed might injure operation of hospital, and that instead as many free beds should be provided as financial condition of hospital permits, held not to destroy the free bed charity provided in prior deed, and thereby destroy charitable character of trust, in view of provision that any surplus from pay patients should go to augment number of free patients, which under Civ. Code, § 2269, state will see carried out if trustees fail in duties.

5. Charities 🔑11—Gift to establish public institution to deal with misery and unhappiness of any person, rich or poor, is "public charity."

A trust may be charitable in its nature, uses, and purposes without giving alms to the poor, and a gift to establish and maintain a public institution where the misery and unhappiness of any person of high or low degree, rich or poor, may be considered and sanely dealt with comes within the definition of a "public charity."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Charity.]

6. Charities 🔑11—Provision of trust authorizing pay patients in hospital to assist in maintaining it for charitable purposes held not to make trust noncharitable.

Provision of trust for creation of hospital, allowing charges to be made for admission to or treatment in hospital of pay patients in order to assist in maintaining hospital for charitable purposes, held not to make trust noncharitable and therefore void.

7. Charities 🔑10—Provision setting aside property for annuities to trustor's nephews and nieces held not to destroy charitable features of trust.

Charitable features of trust creating hospital held not destroyed by grant in first trust deed setting aside certain property and funds for payment of annuities to trustor's nephews and nieces, where such use of property to pay annuities, though noncharitable, did not go beyond lives of persons in being.

8. Charities 🔑4—Reservation of life estate in deeds conveying property in trust for charitable purposes held not to destroy trust by creating passive and active trusts (Civ. Code, §§ 693, 694).

Life estate reserved to trustor in deed creating charitable trust for hospital held not to destroy trust by creating a passive or primary trust operating in trustor's lifetime for benefit of heirs, and an active or secondary trust for charitable purposes to take effect on her death, where life estate was not a part of trust scheme, but was expressly reserved from trust res conveyed to trustees, and trust was not to be put into operation during trustor's lifetime and deeds conveyed to trustees a vested future interest in properties conveyed under Civ. Code, §§ 693, 694.

9. Charities 🔑4—Deed of trust provision authorizing trustor to sell property during her lifetime with trustees' consent under certain circumstances held not objectionable as creating passive and active trusts.

Provision of deed of trust, creating charitable trust and reserving life estate in trustor, that if during trustor's life it should be deemed for best interests of all concerned and for accomplishment of purposes of trust to sell properties therein described, trustor by and with consent of trustees might sell and convert property into good interest-bearing securities, revenues from which should belong to trustor and principal to take place of property so converted, and providing that suitable grounds for proposed charitable hospital might be purchased and paid for out of said funds if deemed advisable, held not objectionable as creating passive and active trusts.

10. Charities 🔑4—Provision authorizing establishment of hospital during trustor's life, on her waiver of life estate, instead of waiting until her death held not objectionable as creating passive trust.

In deed of trust conveying property to trustees for charitable hospital, provision authorizing trustor to surrender her life estate in property conveyed, and with trustees' consent to sell property, and with their aid and co-operation establish proposed charitable hospital during her lifetime instead of waiting until her death, held not objectionable as creating passive trust in addition to the active trust provided for therein.

11. Charities 🔑4—Trust deed provision, that if trustor sold trust property without trustees' consent proceeds should go for trust purposes held merely limitation on power to sell for private gain.

In deed of trust conveying property to trustees for charitable hospital, provision that if trustor should sell and convey any of property involved, with or without trustees' consent, proceeds thereof should go to trustees in same manner as property so sold or conveyed would have gone if conveyance had not been made, held not a reservation of power by trustor to sell trust property which destroyed charity created in deeds, but was a limitation on her power to sell for private gain.

12. Charities 🔑4—Certainty of express trust must be determined by rules of construction and code essentials for valid trust.

The certainty or uncertainty of an express trust, whether contained in deeds or in trust agreement, must be determined, like any other contract, by laws or rules of construction and the code essentials for a valid trust, and if instrument shows trustor's intent to create charitable trust and interpretation of language creating trust discloses essential elements of contracts and of a valid trust, instrument is not void for want of certainty.

13. Charities 🔑4—Deeds of trust for charitable hospital held sufficiently certain to create valid charitable trust (Civ. Code, §§ 2221, 2222).

Deeds conveying property to trustees for charitable hospital for benefit of sick and wounded of both sexes, where poor should have free beds and considerate and efficient treatment, and accurately describing and identifying property conveyed, held to create valid trust under Civ. Code, §§ 2221, 2222, requiring voluntary trusts, to be valid, to disclose intent to create trust, subject-matter, purpose, beneficiary, and acceptance of trust by trustee.

14. Charities 🔑4—Recital that trustor did not wish to bind trustees' discretion respecting disposition or holding of property held not tantamount to direction to hold property indefinitely.

In deed conveying property to trustees for charitable hospital, recital that trustor did not wish to bind trustees' discretion with respect to disposing of or holding certain property for rising market, except that it was her desire that hospital be erected and put into working operation as soon as possible, held not objectionable as tantamount to a direction to indefinitely hold property in violation of law charitable trusts, or as suggestion that property should be held in perpetuity.

15. Trusts 🔑377—Trustor's administrator suing to quiet title as against trustees held not entitled to attorneys' fees out of trust estate.

Deceased trustor's special administrator substituted as plaintiff for trustor in her unsuccessful action to quiet title to properties previously conveyed to trustees for charitable purposes held not entitled to attorneys' fees out of trust estate, action not being for benefit of trust estate but for benefit of trustor's heirs; and such fees being allowed only where litigation is a benefit and service to trust.

16. Trusts 🔑377—Where two conflicting trusts involving same property necessitated litigation, trustees of unsuccessful trust held entitled to attorneys' fees out of estate.

In action involving determination of validity of two conflicting trusts respecting same property, it was the duty of trustees of both trusts to defend their respective trusts when attacked, and trustee of trust declared invalid was therefore entitled to attorneys' fees out of trust estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Millicent H. Olmsted, for whom on her death were substituted Earl C. Dingwell and another as executors of her estate, against J. H. Seymour, Hugh K. Walker, and others. From the judgment, defendant last named and certain other defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Newlin & Ashburn and Ray E. Nimmo, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Security Trust & Savings Bank.

Lissner, Roth & Gunter, of Los Angeles, for amicus curiæ.

WELCH, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced by Millicent H. Olmsted in her lifetime to quiet her title against appellants and a number of other codefendants who have disclaimed any interest herein. The Attorney General of the state was made a defendant, who, although served with summons, did not appear. The complaint is in the usual form of actions to quiet title to real estate. The complaint simply alleged that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the property described in the complaint, and that the claim of defendants is without any right whatever, and that they have no right, title or interest in either the real or personal property described in the complaint. The properties described in the complaint are situate in Los Angeles county.

The complaint was filed August 3, 1923. Plaintiff died on October 15, 1923, and Robert M. Clarke, special administrator, was substituted as plaintiff for deceased. There is a statement in the brief of respondent that since the taking of the appeal Earl C. Dingwell and Henry K. Elder have superseded the special administrator as executors.

Appellants, who are trustees named in certain deeds hereinafter described, answered the complaint and deny that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of said properties. By way of cross-complaint they set forth four deeds in full, which deeds were made and executed to appellants by the original plaintiff in the action. The properties described in the complaint are properties described in some one or more of said deeds, which properties were conveyed to appellants in trust to establish and maintain in or near the city of Los Angeles a hospital for sick, wounded, and poor persons. Appellants made the Security Trust & Savings Bank a party defendant; but later the defendant bank came into the action as a fictitiously designated defendant and filed an answer to the complaint; it also cross-complained against all the parties to the action in which it set up six deeds to the real estate described in the complaint, which deeds were made and executed by the original plaintiff in the action; also it alleged an assignment by said original plaintiff to respondent of all the personal property described in the complaint, and finally it set forth a document denominated "Trust Agreement" in which the respondent bank is named as trustee, in which trust agreement many uses and trusts concerning the property conveyed are named and among them is one to establish and maintain a "public charitable hospital" in Los Angeles county.

The cross-complaints of appellants and of respondent were duly answered by the respective cross-defendants. The special administrator in his answers to the cross-complaints of appellants and of respondent alleges that the deeds of conveyance to appellants and to respondent and the trusts therein alleged to be created were and are null and void. He sought to secure all the property for the heirs and devisees of the grantor, Millicent H. Olmsted, deceased.

The result of the trial was a judgment and adjudication that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in and to the property involved; that the deeds relied upon by appellants are null and void; and that the respondent bank is the owner of all property involved in the action, subject to and upon and with the uses and trust prescribed and contained in the trust agreement above mentioned. The special administrator did not appeal from the judgment against him and therefore the judgment is final as to him.

The appeal is upon the judgment roll and involves questions of law alone, for there is no evidence in the case except the documents set forth in full in the pleadings. In the subsequent documents to the bank there is not even a suggestion or word to indicate the trustor's reason for making these subsequent deeds and trust instrument, nor is there any reference to the former deeds. There is not an expression anywhere in the record to suggest the grounds of the trial court's judgment holding the prior deeds null and void. No word has escaped the lips of the trustor so far as this court knows from the record of otherwise giving or explaining her act or motive for commencing the suit to quiet her titles against her trustees named in the prior deeds. And counsel for appellants are discreetly circumspect in refraining from assigning any motive or alleged motive for Mrs. Olmsted's later act in bringing the suit and in making the documents to the respondent bank; while counsel for the respondent throughout their briefs persist in asserting that Mrs. Olmsted made the subsequent trust documents because she knew of the defects and weaknesses of her prior deeds and because of her desire to carry out her original hospital trust scheme in a businesslike manner.

We know nothing of the intentions and motives which induced Mrs. Olmsted to make the deeds and trust agreement to respondent except such as may be implied by the acts themselves. We are not permitted to draw the inference insisted upon by respondent. Subsequent change of mind and motives are of no consequence, unless the grantor had the legal right to make the subsequent documents to respondent. It is to be determined herein if she had such right.

This is not a contest between trustees and heirs. Mrs. Olmsted provided for certain heirs in both trust schemes, and since these relatives disclaimed in this action they apparently are satisfied. The contest was initiated by the grantor and maker of the prior deeds above mentioned when she sued the trustees named therein to quiet her title to the properties described in said deeds. After the death of Mrs. Olmsted, the original plaintiff in the action, the contest settled down to a question as to the validity or invalidity of three of the four of said prior deeds and, incidentally, to the validity of the trust agreement with the bank. In its ultimate analysis it is a contest between the individual trustees of the prior deeds and the respondent bank, trustee named in the subsequent trust agreement to it.

A brief history of the documents involved is essential to the treatment of the appeal.

Millicent H. Olmsted, a widow of El Monte, Los Angeles county, Cal., was the owner on November 5, 1905, of many parcels of real estate and considerable personal property, valued at the time of the judgment at more than $500,000. On said November 5th Mrs. Olmsted made a deed of conveyance of the bulk of her estate to five trustees, with which to build and maintain in Los Angeles county a hospital to be known as the Millicent H. Olmsted Hospital. Two years later on October 12, 1907, Mrs. Olmsted, discovering that three of the grantees and trustees named in the 1905 deed were not members of the Presbyterian Church, of which church she was a member and to which church she desired her trustees to belong, filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county an ex parte petition in which she stated that it was her desire "to provide for the establishment of a hospital in or near the city of Los Angeles, California, wherein indigent and worthy poor persons of both sexes might be cared for and treated without charge, as well as others" for pay; that in order to carry out and execute said trust according to her original desires, purposes and intentions it was necessary that the 1905 deed be annulled, canceled and set at naught, and that another trust deed, made in 1907, be substituted therefor. This deed, which is dated October 12, 1907, the date of filing the ex parte petition, was made an exhibit to the petition and is known in the record as the 1907 deed. It contains the principal but not all of the trust provisions herein involved. All five trustees accommodatingly tendered their resignations to the court.

The court heard the petition and granted it. In its order and judgment the court recited that the 1907 deed "affords and furnishes a more certain, definite and efficacious means of executing and carrying out said trust, and the wishes of the trustor in relation thereto, and the court being fully advised and sufficiently informed is of the opinion that the prayer of said petition ought to be granted * * * and that the instrument of date October 12th, 1907, executed by petitioner as aforesaid, a copy of which is attached to the petition filed herein, marked Exhibit F and made a part of the record in this cause, be and the same is hereby substituted for and in lieu of said original instrument." Appellants claim that this is an adjudication of the validity of the 1907 deed, binding alike on trustor and trustees. We will not have occasion to pass upon this claim and will not further refer to it.

In May, 1916, Mrs. Olmsted made another deed to her seven trustees named in the 1907 deed, of additional property, and impressed these properties with the same uses and trusts as those expressed in the 1907 deed.

Again, in April, 1920, Mrs. Olmsted made still another deed herein known as the 1920 deed in which she conveyed to her seven trustees other and all of her real estate owned by her in trust, excepting such property as may be disposed of by her by will. In this deed certain nephews and nieces are provided for and additional uses and trusts to those in the 1907 deed are created. In this 1920 deed the grantor modifies some of the trust provisions of the 1907 deed. The 1920 deed declares that all three deeds of 1907, 1916, and 1920 "shall be construed as one instrument, and that the later trust conveyances (1916 and 1920 deeds) are created by her to feed the first trust, save and except to build as part of it, the memorial to her said brother," for which she makes a special grant of property, and, finally, she ratifies and confirms both the 1907 and the 1916 deeds.

Later in the year in October Mrs. Olmsted and her trustees named in the three deeds above mentioned made and recorded a document wherein the three deeds are mentioned with approval and the name of the hospital by mutual agreement is changed to "Olmsted Memorial Hospital."

In the discussion herein the three deeds will be construed together, and the matters therein contained will be designated herein the Walker trust.

In July, 1923, Mrs. Olmsted entered into a trust agreement with the respondent, the Security Trust & Savings Bank, herein called the bank, and on or about the same time conveyed and assigned all the property described in the Walker trust to the bank; nevertheless, for certain uses and trusts designated in the trust agreement.

Both the appellants and respondent regard these instruments to respondent as hostile to the Walker trust and that the two sets of instruments cannot stand together. This court will so treat the Walker trust and the matters described and contained in the instruments to the bank, designated herein the bank trust.

Each of these three deeds of 1907, 1916, and 1920 was in form a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveying to the grantees the lands and properties therein described to have and to hold the same forever; nevertheless, in trust for certain uses and trusts hereinafter mentioned and quoted when necessary. Each of these three deeds reserved a life estate to the grantor. Appellants accepted the trusts therein set forth by signing and acknowledging each of the three deeds.

No reserve of power to revoke any of said deeds by the trustor is found or expressed in the deeds, but on the contrary the deed of 1907 provides that "the trust herein created and the conveyance hereby made shall in no sense be revoked or impaired." On this point counsel for respondent admit in their briefs: "No power of revocation was reserved and none is implied." To foreclose the question of the power of the trustor to revoke the Walker trust, we cited section 2280, Civil Code.

All of the three deeds were duly recorded before the making of the deeds and the agreement to the bank.

Appellants do not attack the bank trust, but content themselves by endeavoring to maintain and defend the Walker trust; while respondent attacks the Walker trust and severely arraigns it. It maintains that the equitable principle that charitable trusts are favorites of the law and should be carried into effect when possible, has no special application here for the reason that if the Walker trust is held to be void the bank trust will carry out the charitable ideas of the trustor.

This court will confine its consideration to the validity or invalidity of the Walker trust, but in doing so it will have occasion to contrast and compare certain provisions of the two sets of documents containing the two trust schemes. In treating the subject of this appeal we cannot specifically notice all of the many points made by counsel in their briefs, but will cover all the essential contentions either specifically or on broad principles.

[1] We begin with the premise that the trusts sought to be created by the deeds of 1907, 1916 and 1920, are in perpetuity and for this reason are void unless they are of a charitable nature; but we take it that the converse must be true, that if these trusts create a charity they are not void merely because they are in perpetuity (section 9, art. 20, state Constitution; Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457); and in order that we may not drift too far afield in the discussion of the subject of trusts let us establish another legal monument by defining a charitable trust so that we may be guided in our course and from which monument we may take bearings.

[2] We do not find it necessary to define a charity in our own language. In the Matter of the Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 537, 77 P. 475, the Supreme Court has approved a definition of charity which we adopt as follows:

> "A charity in a legal sense may be more fully defined as a gift to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons—either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education, or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government."

The quotation is from Mr. Justice Gray, in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen (Mass.) 556, which, definition Mr. Perry says leaves nothing to be desired.

The deed of 1907 reads in part as follows:

> "The parties of the second part, herein called trustees, or their successors as hereinafter provided for, shall, upon the demise of the party of the first part, take immediate possession of all of said property, and shall, as soon thereafter as practicable, having due regard to the objects hereby sought to be accomplished, convert the same, in whole or in part, as to them may seem best, into cash, or good and solvent interest bearing securities, and out of the proceeds thereof said parties of the second part shall purchase suitable grounds * * * and as soon as practicable establish and maintain thereon a hospital for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded of both sexes, said hospital to be known as the 'Olmstead Memorial Presbyterian Hospital.'"

This deed also provides that the trustee shall "set apart and provide an endowment of $5,000 each for the maintenance of at least 25 free beds for the care, accommodation, and treatment in said hospital of poor and worthy persons of both sexes who may be pecuniarily unable to pay the expenses of their maintenance therein; the trustees of said institution to be the judges of the indigency and worthiness of those applying for admittance to said hospital as free patients under the provisions hereof. And it is hereby expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that indigent patients admitted into said institution as herein provided shall at all times receive the same care, treatment, and attention as that given and bestowed upon other patients who pay for admittance therein as herein provided. Said trustees shall also receive into said hospital other patients for care, treatment, and attention, for which reasonable charges shall be made and paid, and the revenue derived therefrom shall be applied to the maintenance and operation of said institution; and the surplus thereof, if any, shall go to augment the number of free patients that may be kept and treated in said hospital, to the end that there shall at all times be kept, treated and cared for in said institution the largest number of poor and worthy patients that the finances of said institution will admit of or justify."

In her 1920 deed Mrs. Olmsted provided for the erection and maintenance of the memorial building to perpetuate the memory of her brother, Seth H. Hickcox, deceased, which building was to be a part of the main hospital, but as a special building to be known as the Seth H. Hickcox Memorial building and the trustees "shall maintain the same for the purpose of nursing and caring for therein patients who are suffering from cancer and tubercular diseases and for such other purposes, incident and kindred, in aid of the general hospital mentioned." The deed further provides that the Hickcox Memorial building should be supplied "with the best equipment that medical and surgical science can reasonably provide * * * it being the intent and purpose of the party of the first part, in the creation of this trust, to provide for this memorial building sufficient funds to erect the same and equip and maintain the same after its construction for the benefit of persons afflicted as aforesaid."

[3] In referring to her 1907 deed, Mrs. Olmsted declares in her 1920 deed "that the purpose of said trust as expressed therein, is that, after the death of the party of the first part, the said trustees should establish and maintain a hospital for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded of both sexes."

In executing said deeds of 1907, 1916 and 1920 the intention of Mrs. Olmsted as plainly shown on their face was to provide ample means with which her trustees after her death could and they were empowered and directed to erect and maintain a hospital for the use and benefit of persons of both sexes who may be poor, sick, wounded, or suffering from disease.

By consensus of opinion the poor, from the Mosaic law down the ages to the present, have been considered objects of charity. Those features of the Walker trust which provide for free beds for the care, accommodation and treatment of the poor and worthy, are highly charitable in their character and the charitable mind that conceived this hospital and generously endowed it with "all her worldly goods" to be in part used to make the worthy poor well, comfortable, and happy, further enjoined upon her trustees and exacted from them written promises that indigent patients admitted to her hospital "shall at all times receive the same care, treatment and attention as that given and bestowed upon" pay patients. Her charity for the worthy poor is not only manifested in providing a place where they might be treated, but her charitable purpose goes beyond and provides for kind and the best care without neglect or favoritism, and her broad charity was not exhausted by her thought for the poor alone, but she recognized that all humanity is heir to disease and subject to accidents and thus provided that the hospital should receive, care for and treat the sick and wounded of both sexes without any qualification or limitation other than the capacity of the hospital. On the face of the Walker trust during 15 years of the trustor's life it is apparent that Mrs. Olmsted gave deep and solicitous thought to the establishment and maintenance of her hospital. In her 1920 deed she provided for the Seth H. Hickcox Memorial building and directed that it be equipped with the best and most modern hospital appliances. For what use and purpose did her charitable mind provide this building with its superb, modern equipment? "For the purpose of nursing and caring for therein patients who are suffering from cancer and tubercular diseases." Thus her charity went out to persons of whatever degree or station in life who are suffering from the two fell diseases which annually carry to the grave prematurely more of her fellow men and women than any other two diseases.

The mere statement of the purposes of the trusts refutes conclusively the contention of respondent that the 1907, 1916 and 1920 deeds are devoid of charitable features and are not charitable on their face. Measured by the legal rule or interpreted by the approved usage of language or the applied teachings of the Master, the intention and purpose of the maker of the Walker trust were to create a charitable trust. And these deeds did create a charitable trust and are valid unless for some reason hereinafter discussed the trustor destroyed the charitable features of her said deeds.

[4] Counsel for respondent half concede that the provision in the 1907 deed for free beds is a charity, but maintain that the 1920 deed totally destroys this charity and that without free beds the trust or any trust which shuts its doors to the poor and needy as distinguished from the rich, well-to-do, or those in moderate circumstances, is not a charitable trust.

In the 1920 deed Mrs. Olmsted expressed the wish to modify the provisions concerning the 25 free beds because she feared that the number arbitrarily fixed might work an injury to the operation of the hospital and proceeded to say:

> "* * * It is the desire of the party of the first part that as many free beds be provided by the trustees as the financial condition of the hospital shall permit without reference to the number and that instead of the twenty-five beds, the number may be decreased or increased by the trustees as the hospital funds shall be sufficient to provide for the same."

Interpreted in a broad sense which the rules of construction in cases of charitable trusts permit and require, the provision of the 1920 deed did not destroy the free bed charity provided in the 1907 deed. Reading the two deeds together, Mrs. Olmsted said in effect to her trustees: For fear that it might work an injury in the operation of the hospital I do not fix any arbitrary number of free beds which you shall establish and maintain for the care, accommodation and treatment in said hospital of the poor and other persons of both sexes who may be pecuniarily unable to pay the expenses of their maintenance therein, yet it is my desire that you provide as many such free beds as my endowment and the financial condition of the hospital shall permit. Evidently it was not the intention of the trustor to eliminate free beds from her trust scheme. Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 97, 59 P. 315. This interpretation is further strengthened by other references in the Walker trust concerning the poor and their admissions to and treatment in the hospital. For example: Any surplus revenues derived from pay patients "shall go to augment the number of free patients that may be kept and treated in said hospital to the end that there shall at all times be kept, treated and cared for in said institution the largest number of poor and worthy patients that the finances of said institution will admit of or justify." In our seeking the intention of Mrs. Olmsted to provide for free beds for the poor we are not particularly concerned with the possibility that the trustees may so manage or mismanage the hospital as to preclude the maintenance of any free beds whatever as contended by respondent. The state through its officers and courts will see that the intention and purposes of the trustor are carried into effect. Section 2269, Civ. Code. But the free bed feature of the Walker trust could be entirely eliminated, and yet poor and worthy persons are thought of and provided for in other portions of the deed above quoted.

[5] Also the insistence of respondent that a trust without providing for the poor is not and cannot be a charity must go unrewarded, for both the law and reason are against the contention. People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269. Any person, the rich as well as the poor, may fall sick or be injured or wounded and become a fit subject for charity. St. Luke, chapter 10, verses 30–37. A trust may be and often is charitable in its nature, uses and purposes without giving alms to the poor. It is true that poverty is a condition which, even when brought about by indolence and waste of life's opportunities, arrests the attention and commands the consideration of charity. Yet perhaps more worthy and deserving members of society than the ne'er-do-well poor may under certain conditions be proper objects of charity. A gift to establish and maintain a public institution where the misery and unhappiness of any person of high or low degree, rich or poor, may be considered and sanely dealt with would come within the purview of the definition of a public charity. And yet the dollar may not and would not be the sesame to open the door of such an institution.

[6] This discussion brings us to a kindred subject—that of pay patients. It is claimed by respondent that this feature of the Walker trust makes it possible for the trustees to so operate the hospital as to exclude every poor person or any free treatment in the hospital. Such a possibility is remote and can and will be prevented by courts. Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 541, 77 P. 475; Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 1, 60 P. 471; People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269. The provision of the Walker trust allowing charges to be made for admission to or treatment in the hospital of pay patients does not make the trust noncharitable and therefore void under the law laid down in the Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 102 Cal. 920. Without taking coveted time and space to point out the difference between the Sutro trust and the Walker trust, suffice it to say that they are so dissimilar in structure and purpose as to make the Estate of Sutro, supra, of little or no aid in construing this provision of the Walker trust. This provision to admit and treat pay patients in the hospital is a provident provision for supplementing the gift of the donor with additional means to support the hospital. The provision is not only wise, but it is also legal if the hospital is not operated for private gain. Burdell v. St. Luke's Hospital, 37 Cal. App. 310, 173 P. 1008; In re McDowell's Will, 217 N. Y. 454, 112 N. E. 177, L. R. A. 1916E, 1246, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 853; Butterworth v. Keeler, 219 N. Y. 446, 114 N. E. 803; Daly's Estate, 208 Pa. 58, 57 A. 180; Parks v. Northwestern University, 218 Ill. 381, 75 N. E. 991, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 556, 4 Ann. Cas. 103.

In her 1920 deed Mrs. Olmsted removed all question of the hospital ever being run for private gain and thereby becoming noncharitable by providing:

> "Lastly, it is the wish of the party of the first part and she desires and she charges the trustees that, in the general plan, conduct and operation of said hospital they shall be controlled by the following:
> "1st. The said hospital shall not be run for profit;
> "2nd. That the charges for treatment for patients who pay for same shall be placed at the lowest sum or sums possible taken in connection with good service."

What language could be plainer?

[7] We grant that the provision in the 1920 deed providing for certain named nephews and nieces is a noncharitable use; but certain property and funds were designated to take care of certain annuities to these kinsmen during their lives, and upon the death of the last of such annuitants the remainder of such property is to be devoted to hospital purposes under the general trust scheme.

This use of property to pay certain annuitants did not go beyond the lives of persons in being. Such a provision is authorized by law and did not destroy the charitable features of the Walker trust.

[8] Respondent, perhaps anticipating that the court would hold that Mrs. Olmsted's trust scheme was charitable in character, makes its severest assault on the Walker trust on the grounds that the trust intruments contain two trusts, a passive and an active trust, the passive or primary trust to operate in her lifetime for the benefit of herself, and the active, or secondary trust, eleemosynary in its character, to take effect after her death. The respondent bank strenuously maintains that these two trusts exist in the Walker trust, and that the trust is null and void under the principles laid down in the case of Carpenter v. Cook, 132 Cal. 621, 64 P. 997, 84 Am. St. Rep. 118, because it is asserted that the two trusts are inextricably interwoven and are mutually interdependent, resulting in the invalidity of the whole scheme. In support of its claim here made respondent specially cites three features of the 1907 deed as examples of passive or primary trusts, namely, the life estate reserved to the trustor, a conditional provision made for the sale of any or all the property devoted to the trust, and a conditional or optional provision to initiate the establishment and operation of the hospital during the trustor's life instead of waiting until after her death as provided in the deeds. We will take up the consideration of these provisions of the deeds in the order named.

The deeds of 1907, 1916 and 1920 each expressly reserve a life estate to the trustor. The life estate is in the following language:

> "It is expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that the party of the first part reserves to herself a life estate in and to all the property herein conveyed, and shall be entitled to the management thereof, and to the revenues arising therefrom, for the period of her natural life, and shall in like manner during said time be responsible for the care, maintenance and preservation of the same."

We think that the argument of respondent is based on a false conception of the meaning and purpose of the life estate. In the first place, the life estate was never a part of the trust scheme. It is an estate authorized by the Civil Code and was by express terms in the instruments themselves carved out of and reserved from the properties—the trust res—conveyed to the trustees. By general provisions the trust was not to be put into operation during the lifetime of the trustor. By her deeds she vested a present title in the trustees subject to the life estate and subject to the trust to be put into operation after her death. By her deeds Mrs. Olmsted conveyed to her trustees, to the appellants, a vested future interest in her properties described in said three deeds. Sections 693 and 694, Civ. Code. In imposing upon herself the responsibility for the care, maintenance, and preservation of her properties, out of which she carved her life estate, she did nothing more than to express in words what the law implies as to the duties and responsibility of a life tenant. While it is no argument in favor of the validity of the Walker trust on this point, nevertheless it is not amiss to mention that the bank trust also reserves a life estate to the maker of the trust agreement. The only difference discernible between the two is that in the Walker trust the life tenant undertakes all responsibility concerning the property during her life, whereas in the bank trust the bank in excess of caution declined any and all responsibility or liability for any waste or for any act or debt of the trustor in the management or care of said property during the life of the trustor.

[9] The deed of 1907 provides and the trustees expressly agree that if during the life of the trustor it should be deemed to the best interests of all concerned and for the accomplishment of the purposes of the trust therein, to sell any of the properties therein described, Mrs. Olmsted "by and with the consent and approval of said trustees, or a majority thereof, may sell and convert said property into good and solvent interest-bearing securities, the revenues arising therefrom to be and belong to the party of the first part absolutely, and the principal thereof to take the place of the property so converted and to pass under this instrument; provided suitable grounds for said hospital may be purchased and paid for out of said funds, if deemed advisable."

Mrs. Olmstead lived for more than 15 years after she executed her 1907 deed. It may be presumed from the natural desire of humanity generally that she expected to live to a ripe old age and enjoy her ample income. Therefore to have neglected to provide a mutual power of change of form of this trust res would have been shortsighted. Many things may happen even in a short 15 years that would make it advisable to sell real property, and especially so in a locality where real estate values are fluctuating. Barring the quoted portion concerning the purchase of a building site the provision of the deed goes no further than to change the form of the trust res. The title or holding of either the life estate or remainder was not changed. The trustor, by the provision, was to enjoy the revenues which were to belong to her while the title to the principal remained in the trustees "to take the place of the property so converted." There was no primary or secondary estate created or attempted to be created. The trustor was to get nothing more than she was entitled to have and to enjoy under the original terms of the trust, namely, the rents and profit of the property. No trust was created for her benefit in her lifetime, for her life estate was not a part of the trust res.

And the provision to the effect that out of the principal fund suitable grounds may be purchased for the hospital was another wise and thoughtful provision. During the lifetime of the trustor an opportunity might present itself to acquire a suitable site for the hospital, while without the provision under consideration such opportunity may be lost. It cannot be said that the purchase of a site for the hospital during the lifetime of the giver was a trust, passive or active, created in her favor and for her personal benefit. But the fact is the site was not selected, nor was any property sold except one piece. The proceeds of this sale were delivered to the trustees to hold for the establishment and operation of the hospital, while Mrs. Olmsted took and reserved the revenues arising out of the proceeds of such sale, in consonance with the trust scheme. At the time of the death of Mrs. Olmsted the trustees held these proceeds intact as a part of the trust estate and for the uses and purposes thereof.

[10] The 1907 deed also has in it an agreement between the parties thereto, the trustor and trustees, that the trustor "shall have the right at any time she may elect so to do to waive and surrender her life estate in and to any or all of the property herein conveyed, and by and with the consent and approval of said trustees, or a majority thereof, sell and convert said property in whole or in part, into cash or into interest-bearing securities and with the aid and assistance of said trustees, and with their consent, approval and co-operation during the lifetime of said party of the first part, establish and put into operation said hospital in accordance with the provisions hereof."

We can see in the quoted provision none of the elements essential to make the trust a passive trust. The purport of the provision is to the effect that at any time Mrs. Olmsted should choose to waive her life estate the property so released from the life estate may be sold by mutual consent of trustor and trustees and the date when the hospital should be built and put into operation be advanced and the trust scheme initiated during the life of the trustor instead of waiting until after her death. No part of the trust article indicates that Mrs. Olmsted was to establish and manage the hospital alone during her life. It was not only with the consent and approval of the trustees that the hospital could be established and operated during the life of the trustor, but the trustees agreed to aid, assist and co-operate with the trustor to "establish and put into operation said hospital in accordance with the provisions hereof as hereinbefore set forth." This last-quoted clause negatives the claim of respondent that Mrs. Olmsted reserved the power to establish and operate the hospital during her life "for the benefit of herself and the hospital." The wish and desire to see in her lifetime the establishment and operation of her hospital of 15 years of solicitous thought and meditation was a natural longing, which calls for neither apology nor criticism.

One or two further observations on this branch of the case: A reservation in a trust to revoke does not make void the trust. Then on what principle does the provision to sell by mutual consent of the trustor and trustees to better accomplish the purposes of the charity, and in harmony with it, destroy the trust? Certain it is that the law of passive trusts is not applicable to the provisions of the 1907 deed to sell under certain conditions therein named, but always with the consent of the trustees. The trustor was so guardful of her trust plan to build and operate a hospital for the sick, wounded, and afflicted that she provided that neither she nor her trustees, nor both together, could change, annul, alter, or modify any provision of her trust which would revoke or impair the trust. In other words, after providing the power for necessary and desirable changes with the consent of the trustees, or perchance without their consent, she added this clause: "Provided, the trust herein created and the conveyance herein made shall in no sense be revoked or impaired."

In support of this claim that the Walker trust contains a passive as well as an active trust which makes void the whole trust scheme, counsel for respondent cites and relies upon Carpenter v. Cook, 132 Cal. 621, 64 P. 997, 84 Am. St. Rep. 118, as above stated. That case involved what is known as the Willey trust. Willey made a deed in which he disposed of all his property to two grantees in trust for certain uses and purposes; that during his life the trustees were to hold the property and the rents and income "to the sole use and behoof of the trustor; and that whenever directed by him the trustees were to sell such property to such person or persons designated by the trustor and to hold the proceeds of such sale to the use and behoof of the trustor; that after the death of the trustor the trustees were "to have, hold and possess all and singular the residue and remainder of said property" in trust for certain enumerated uses and purposes. The provisions were made a part of the trustor's will. Manifestly there were two trusts created by the Willey deed, one to operate in his favor during his lifetime and the other in favor of other beneficiaries after his death. The trust scheme of the Walker trust is so dissimilar to that of the Willey trust it would seem a waste of time and space to contrast and point out the patent differences between the two trusts were it not for the insistence of counsel for respondent.

The Walker trust was not to be put into operation until after the death of the trustor, as provided in the general scheme; the Willey trust began at once and in the lifetime of the trustor. The Walker trust reserved from and carved out of the property conveyed in the life estate; the Willey trust made no such provision. The Walker trust assigned no duty to the trustees during the life of the trustor except to hold a vested estate with which to build and operate a hospital after the decease of the trustor; the Willey trust imposed on the trustees an immediate duty to devote all the property conveyed to them together with the income—not to charity, but to the personal use and behoof of the trustor both before and after sale. The Walker trust did not reserve the right to direct her trustees to sell at her will, but provided that a sale could be made in the interest of the trust by the mutual consent of trustor and trustees and that the proceeds of sale should go to the trustees to hold and to be applied for charitable purposes named, while the increase should belong to the trustor and not to the trustees; the Willey trust arbitrarily reserved the right to compel the trustees to sell any or all the property at any time during his life and to whomsoever he chose to name and to apply the proceeds—to charity? No; "to his own use and behoof." This court in its discussion of the life estate and the provisions to sell and to advance the date of beginning to build the hospital set forth in the Walker trust decided and again decides that there was but one trust created or attempted to be created in the Walker trust. If we are right in that conclusion, then the Carpenter v. Cook Case, supra, has no application to the facts of the Walker trust. That case and the principles there laid down must have at least a primary and a secondary trust with which to deal and to compare which are absent in the Walker trust. The foregoing also answers the brief of amicus curiæ.

[11] In connection with this subject of sale of the trust property, respondent makes another claim that Mrs. Olmsted reserved the power to sell the property without the consent of her trustees, and that the natural effect of such reservation is to overthrow the whole trust scheme, leaving in Mrs. Olmsted every muniment and prerogative of title. After a general provision conveying to her trustees all of her property owned by her, or in which she may have an interest, including after-acquired property, Mrs. Olmsted, in her 1920 deed, says:

> "And she further provides that in case she should sell and convey any of the property herein described or described in any of the other deeds of trust, with or without the consent of said trustees, that the money or property received therefrom shall go to the said trustees in the same manner as the property so sold or conveyed would have gone, if said conveyance had not been made, it being the intent and purpose of party of the first part that all the property she now has, or which she may acquire hereafter, real, personal or mixed, except such property as may be devised by the will of the party of the first part, shall go to the said trustees for the construction and maintenance of said hospital and of said memorial to Seth H. Hickcox."

Money and securities in bank are excepted from this conveyance in general terms.

In all of the provisions to sell found in the Walker trust, Mrs. Olmsted made the consent of the trustees a prerequisite to the sale. Indeed, without such provision the terms of the grant deeds of 1907, 1916 and 1920 required the consent of and signature to every conveyance of any piece or parcel of the trust corpus in order to pass legal title. Taking all the deeds together and taking into consideration the context of the provision itself, it cannot be said that the provision to sell "without the consent of said trustees" is a reserve power to sell the trust property, which would thereby destroy the charity created in the deeds. She plainly said that if perchance she should sell any part of the trust property conveyed to her trustees without their consent, then the proceeds arising from such sale should go to said trustees for the same purposes, uses, and trusts as if the property had not been sold, namely, to the construction and maintenance of a charitable hospital as described in the Walker trust. The provision is clearly a limitation on her power to sell for private gain, or for any purpose except to establish and operate a hospital so described, but in any event such sale should not "revoke or impair" the Walker trust. Mrs. Olmsted never sold, or attempted to sell, any property described in the Walker trust without the consent of her trustees.

Respondent cannot successfully maintain that the six deeds and the trust agreement to it were made under an exercise of a reserve power to revoke the Walker trust, or a reserve power to sell the trust property without the consent of the grantees named in the Walker trust. The deed and instruments to the bank were made without consideration and were not a sale of property. The trust agreement recites "no consideration was given by the trustee for such conveyances and transfers," and that the trustor paid the trustee $500 "for the acceptance and undertaking of the trust." It will hereinafter appear that the property conveyed to the respondent was not necessarily for the purpose of establishing and maintaining the same kind of a hospital as that described in the Walker trust. The bank trust, if valid, wholly destroys the Walker trust.

The Walker trust scheme is most critically analyzed by counsel for respondent. They charge that it is void for uncertainty. One-third of their elaborate briefs is devoted to maintaining this point. There is scarcely a paragraph in the three deeds, except as to description of property, that is not either quoted or commented upon, criticized, and condemned. On the other hand, throughout their briefs they hold up before the court the bank trust as a model of a public charitable trust in which a complete business plan is devised for the management of the trust property and for the establishment and operation of a "public charitable hospital." They suggest that this court need not be particularly concerned about invoking the cy pres doctrine in favor of the Walker trust, for the reason that in any event the original charitable object of Mrs. Olmsted will be carried into effect through the bank trust, which it is asserted "expresses the real wish of the donor." We cannot agree with the suggestion. It is not only our duty to give due consideration to the objections of respondent to the legality of the Walker trust, but it is equally our duty to carefully consider the argument of appellants, to examine the trust scheme of the Walker trust and uphold it if it violates no principle of law and is sufficiently certain to be carried into effect. The appellants—the trustees of the Walker trust serving without compensation—are here doing their duty as such trustees by defending the Walker trust and maintaining that it is valid. They are entitled to a fair consideration of the question as to whether or not the deeds containing the Walker trust are null and void as found by the trial court, whatever may be the perfection or imperfection of the bank trust.

In this case the court does not find it necessary to resort to the doctrine of cy pres in order to sustain the Walker trust. Nevertheless a few quotations from leading cases and authorities on the attitude of courts toward charitable trusts are pertinent, since they have a direct bearing on the laws of construction:

> "Charitable trusts are the favorites of equity; they are construed as valid whenever possible, by applying the most liberal rules of which the nature of the case admits, and are often upheld where private trusts would fail." 11 C. J. 307.

We quote a sentence from the Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457:

> "* * * Courts look with favor upon all attempted charitable donations, and will endeavor to carry them into effect if it can be done consistently with the rules of law. A bequest intended as a charity is not void, and there is no authority to construe it to be legally void, if it can possibly be made good."

Again, from the Estate of Dwyer, 159 Cal. 680, 115 P. 242:

> "It is well settled here that dispositions to charity are looked upon with favor and the courts will uphold all such gifts whether made by a donor in his lifetime or by a testator, when it can be done consistently with the rules of law."

And from the Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 P. 315:

> "It must be remembered that charities—both as to the trustees and the beneficiaries—are more liberally construed than are gifts to individuals." "An interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void." (Sec. 3541, Civ. Code.)

California, perhaps, is more advanced than any other state in the Union in establishing and maintaining public charities; also in encouraging individuals to dedicate their private fortunes to public charitable uses. Such privately established charities are beneficial to the welfare of society and tend to lessen the cost of government.

In the light of the principles laid down in the cases and law above quoted and in consonance with such policy of the state we proceed to consider the question of the alleged uncertainties of the Walker trust.

[12] The certainty or uncertainty of an express trust, whether contained in deeds or a trust agreement, must be determined, like any other contract, by the rules or laws of construction and the code essentials for a valid trust. If the deed or trust instrument shows the intention of the trustor to create a charitable trust and the interpretation of the language creating the trust discloses the principal or essential elements of contracts and of a valid trust, such deed or instrument is not void for want of certainty.

[13] The five essential elements of every valid, voluntary trust are: (1) The intention to create the trust; (2) the subject-matter of the trust; (3) the purpose of the trust; (4) the beneficiary of the trust; and (5) the acceptance of the trust by the trustee. The deed or instrument containing the trust must indicate with reasonable certainty each and every one of these essential elements. Sections 2221 and 2222, Civ. Code.

In the deeds of 1907, 1916, and 1920, Mrs. Olmsted indicates her intention to create a trust—to establish and maintain a public charitable hospital for the benefit of the sick and wounded of both sexes where the poor could have free beds and considerate and efficient treatment; where persons afflicted with cancer and "consumption" could be treated and cared for in a modern well-equipped hospital. Her intention is not only reasonably certain, fulfilling the law's requirement, but it is so plain and explicit that even the wayfaring man may run and read and understand. Can so much be said of the bank trust? The trust agreement of the bank granted all the property described in the Walker trust to the bank in trust and for the uses and purposes to hold, maintain, sell, assign, convert, lease, mortgage, exchange with the bank's own securities, invest, loan, purchase, contract buildings; to equip, to furnish and operate and maintain a charitable hospital; to organize another corporation to carry out the purposes of the trust contained in the trust agreement, to the bank, and to convey any and all of the property described in the trust to such organization, "on such terms and subject to such conditions as it (the bank) may deem advisable"; to accept or exchange stock of such corporation for its own stock; to employ all agents and attorneys and to fix their compensation; to reimburse itself for outlays, fees and expenditures; to be compensated in the management of the properties and trust; to be released from nearly every conceivable liability in the management and operation of the trust and trust properties; "to sell and convert into cash sufficient of the principal of the trust estate to erect or cause to be erected a public charitable hospital in, or in the vicinity of, the city of Los Angeles * * * to be forever known as Olmsted Memorial Hospital"; to have "full and absolute discretion" in the erection and operation and maintenance of the hospital. The trust finally provides that for the purpose of indemnifying the trustee against all liability, and to secure the bank for any advances, losses and expenses made or suffered by it, the trustor "hereby creates and grants to the trustee and it shall have a first and prior charge and lien on the entire trust estate both income and capital."

We submit there is not a word in the bank trust that indicates that Mrs. Olmsted intended to create a charitable trust except the provisions to erect, furnish and operate a "public charitable hospital." The character of the charity is absolutely in the discretion of the trustee. Section 2269, Civ. Code. The trustees could make, establish, and maintain a hospital for the insane, or any other one or more of the different eleemosynary charities, and yet not violate any expressed intention of the donor. The intention to create a charitable trust is vague and uncertain in the bank trust; but to what legal degree of uncertainty we are not called upon to determine. Suffice it to be shown and held that the Walker trust expresses a clear intention to create a public charitable hospital of a particular character.

We return to the essential elements of a valid trust. The subject-matter of the Walker trust is more than reasonably certain. The properties conveyed, both real and personal, are accurately described and identified, being practically the same properties as those described in the trust agreement and deeds to the bank.

[14] The industry of counsel for respondent has found some fault with the mode of dealing with the trust res of the Walker trust. Some of these objections have already been dealt with and answered herein, and some are deemed of little or no consequence. We will specially notice one criticism and dispose of it here. The trustor stated in her 1920 deed that she left it to the discretion of her trustees whether or not they should sell a certain piece of property known as the San Pedro property, within a reasonable time after her death, or to hold it for a rising market; that she did not wish to arbitrarily bind their discretion, but wished them to act freely and use their own discretion in the matter, "except that it is her desire that said memorial building and that said general hospital be erected and put into working operation as soon as possible." The claim is that this provision is tantamount to a direction for the trustees to indefinitely hold this property which it is claimed would be a violation of the mandate of the law of charitable trusts; also that if the trustees withhold the San Pedro property from sale it would make the trust res uncertain; that such holding would be in perpetuity, thereby destroying the charitable feature of the trust. The provision in our judgment is not a direction or a suggestion that the trustees shall hold the San Pedro property in perpetuity in violation of the Constitution or any law of the state, as argued by respondent. It is only a business suggestion with an inference drawn from her language that the trustees must not hold it too long for a rising market if by so doing the erection and operation of the hospital be unduly delayed. It must be presumed that the trustees will do their duty and devote the property to charity, as positively directed in the trust scheme, and if they do not they can be compelled to do so. Section 2269, Civ. Code; People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269. If the court should hold this provision of the 1920 deed illegal it would affect the San Pedro property only and not make void the whole instrument. Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 1, 60 P. 471. In the event of the court holding the provision illegal, the Walker trust by explicit language rededicates the property to the uses and trusts described in the deeds.

The Walker trust is at least reasonably certain as to its purpose clearly complying with the Code requirement. This purpose is shown by the intention of the trustor to establish and maintain a charitable hospital for the wounded, sick, and needy. Again we ask, does the bank trust display the purpose of the donor in certain terms when it goes no further than to direct her trustees to erect or cause to be erected a public charitable hospital and to "pay all costs and expenses in furnishing, erecting, operating and managing the charitable hospital"?

Again, the Walker trust is more than reasonably certain as to beneficiaries: They are the "sick and wounded of both sexes;" "the poor and worthy persons of both sexes;" "patients who are suffering from cancer and tubercular diseases." The trust does not attempt to limit the number of beneficiaries and is therefore within the rule laid down in the definition of charitable trusts cited hereinabove. The bank trust is sufficiently indefinite as to the essential element of beneficiaries, inasmuch as it names none at all for any particular charity. It is true it says "that the hospital shall be nonsectarian and for the use and benefit of all persons alike," and, half apologizing for directing the power and discretion of her trustees, the trustor indicates her desire "without, however, in any way limiting or restricting the character of the hospital * * * persons in accord and harmony with the doctrine and teachings of the Presbyterian Church be admitted and cared for in such hospital so far as practical and consistent with the general character and purpose of this charity." "This charity" is nowhere in the bank trust described mentioned or defined except in the words "public charitable hospital." The bank trust scheme is businesslike for the management of the property by the trustees, but therein the quality of charity is strained. Between the bank trust and the Walker trust there is little in common except the name "Olmsted Memorial Hospital." Therefore Mrs. Olmsted's intention to carry out her original ideas in the later bank instrument is not manifested or even suggested.

There can be no doubt about the certainty of the acceptance of the trustees of the Walker trust, for they signed, acknowledged and agreed to the contents of each of the three deeds. The essential Code element of certainty in this respect is beyond cavil. As to the religious qualifications of the trustees, the courts are open to determine that question if necessary as well as to appoint trustees to carry into effect valid trusts. Sections 2269 and 2287, Civ. Code.

In our decision in this cause we have not gone far into the realms of common-law trusts. In our entrance into and way out of the half-explored realms of trusts we have found our Codes and laws sufficient light and guides. So, if counsel think we should have gone further with them into the labyrinths and mazes of trusts, pray do not charge us with being too timid to do so, but, rather, that we did not find it necessary to explore further.

The court holds that the deeds of 1907, 1916, and 1920 created a valid charitable trust; that these deeds were not revoked by Millicent H. Olmsted in her lifetime, and could not be revoked by her without the consent of the trustees, signatory parties to the deeds, which consent the trial court found was never given or obtained; that all three deeds of 1907, 1916, and 1920 were duly recorded; that the law of recordation was binding on all parties; that the bank took the trust agreement and the deeds to it, without paying any consideration therefor and with constructive notice as to the real estate and actual notice as to the personal property therein described; that said deeds of 1907, 1916 and 1920 vested the title to the whole of the property both real and personal in appellants, the grantees and trustees named in said deeds, subject only to the execution of the charitable trusts therein provided; that the deeds of conveyance and the trust agreement to the respondent set forth in the cross-complaint of the bank purporting to convey said properties to the bank are without force or effect to grant, transfer, or convey any right, title, or interest of whatever nature in and to the properties described in the Walker trust.

The trial court allowed $7,500 attorneys' fees each to the plaintiff, to the trustees of the Walker trust, and to the trustee of the bank trust.

[15] As special administrator, substituted plaintiff herein, plaintiff undertook to maintain this action for the avowed purpose of obtaining all of the property of the trust for the heirs and estate of Millicent H. Olmsted, deceased. In no proper sense can the action of the special administrator be for the benefit of the trust estate. It was exactly the opposite. It was for the benefit of the heirs of the decedent, and they or the estate of the decedent alone were to receive the property free from the trust, if the plaintiff should succeed in the action. Plaintiff's purpose was to destroy and not to benefit or sustain either the Walker or the bank trust. His claim, therefore, for attorneys' fees will be disallowed. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 582, 6 S. Ct. 870, 29 L. Ed. 940. This case has been frequently cited and followed. Rose's Notes U. S. Reports, vol. 13, p. 440.

The underlying principle which guides the court in allowing costs and attorneys' fees incidental to litigation out of a trust estate is that such litigation is a benefit and a service to the trust. So far as the allowance of attorneys' fees to the Walker trustees is concerned, there can be no doubt as to its propriety in view of our decision. Estate of Duffill, 188 Cal. 556, 206 P. 42, holds that it is the right and duty of a trustee to employ counsel in the prosecution or defense of an action where in the proper administration of the trust such action is necessary for the preservation of the trust, and that such trustee may be reimbursed for such expenditures out of the trust fund. State of O'Connor, 2 Cal. App. 470, 84 P. 317.

[16] In respect to the allowance of counsel fees to the bank trustee a somewhat different question is presented. In view of our conclusion upon the main issue of the case the bank trustee, in one respect, was an unsuccessful litigant claiming the trust property as against the true trustees. However, the purpose of the part of the litigation conducted by the bank trustee has also some analogy to the part conducted by the Walker trustee, in that it was for the benefit of the only trust fund involved in this case. The bank trustee did not begin this litigation. This action was commenced and prosecuted up to the time of her demise by the common trustor of the Walker trust and the bank trust. The object of the litigation by the trustor was presumably in favor of the bank trust and against the Walker trust. After the death of the original plaintiff in the action the bank was drawn into the litigation by subsequent pleadings. It must be borne in mind that it was equally the duty of the bank trustee to defend its trust when attacked, as it was the duty of the Walker trustees to defend and maintain their trust when attacked. See Estate of Duffill, supra, 555 (206 P. 50). It must also be remembered that the trust res in the two trusts is the same and that the purpose of the two trusts was to establish and maintain a public charitable hospital. The fact that the beneficiaries in the two trusts may in a sense be different is immaterial. It was the duty of the trustees of each trust to defend and maintain their respective trusts for the benefit of the beneficiaries mentioned therein. That the part of the litigation conducted by the bank trustee was for the benefit of the trust fund is determined for us by the finding of the court, which reads:

> "Plaintiff, the Walker parties and the bank, all did, and each of them did, participate in this action to the extent that they have participated in good faith and in compliance with their duties; and that such participation was necessary for the determination of the validity or invalidity of the various instruments involved in this action and of the trust therein provided therefor, and this action has inured to the benefit of the trust property and the trust desired to be imposed thereon by the said Olmsted; and this action was necessary in order to clear and establish the true status and title to the trust property, in order that the uses and trusts to which it had been put should be finally determined and established."

This appeal being upon the judgment roll alone, we assume that there was ample evidence to support this finding so far as the Walker parties and the bank trustee are concerned. We think the action of the bank trustee in taking part in this litigation is to be governed by the rule which allows compensation out of the trust fund to a trustee who has conducted necessary litigation or court proceedings to obtain an interpretation of the trust provisions, and is not ruled by the decisions which deny such compensation to one who claims the trust fund as an adversary against the beneficiaries and those interested in the trust. The action of the plaintiff against the two groups of trustees was not for the benefit of the trust, and had the plaintiff never filed the suit the trust and the trust fund would be as secure as after the action was tried. But the administration of the trust could not proceed in view of the two conflicting groups of trust deeds and trust agreement until a determination by court had been made deciding which group of documents controlled the trust. Whatever differences there are between the Walker trust and the bank trust the fund and the trustor are the same. The litigation which cleared the way for the administration of the charity was a benefit to the trust. By virtue of the unusual act of the decedent in executing two sets of trust documents the court proceedings were made inevitable. By the execution of the bank deeds and trust agreement a duty was cast upon the trustee named therein to defend the trust from failure if possible. This was a duty which the trustee owed to the trust fund and those interested therein, and for this reason it is proper to allow the bank trustee compensation for attorneys' fees out of the trust fund for which the service was rendered.

We conclude, therefore, that the allowance of attorneys' fees to the Walker trustees and to the bank trustee should be affirmed, and the award to the plaintiff should be disallowed.

It is hereby ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the appellants and in accordance with this decision.

CASHIN, J. An action by the plaintiff to quiet the title to the west half of lot 15 of

Encanto, a subdivision situated in the city of San Diego.

The plaintiff claims title by virtue of a tax deed to the property executed by the tax collector of the city, and the defendants were the owners of the property subject to the proceedings leading to the execution of the tax deed. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff, from which an appeal was taken by the defendants.

The city by its charter—which was adopted in 1889 (Stats. 1889, pp. 644–729)—made express provision for taxation for municipal purposes of property situated therein; the state laws then in force with respect to the method of assessment, the collection of taxes, and the sale and redemption of property sold being closely followed.

Sections 15 to 27, inclusive, of section 3, chapter 1, of article 6 of the charter provided for the sale each year at public auction, after notice of all real property upon which the taxes assessed the preceding year were delinquent; and also that, in case there should be no purchaser for the same, the property be struck off to the city; that, in the latter event, the city, at any time after the expiration of the period for redemption, to wit, twelve months, would be entitled to a deed whenever called for by the common council. The charter also contained the following general provisions, which are still in force:

> "Except as in this charter otherwise provided the assessment of property taxable in the city for municipal purposes, the equalization of assessments and collection of taxes, and the sale of property for unpaid taxes, and the redemption of property sold for taxes, shall be made in the same manner and with like effect as now or as may be hereafter provided by law for the assessment of property, equalization of assessments, levy and collection of taxes, and sale of property, * * * for state and county purposes and redemption thereof; and all provisions of law applicable to such assessments, equalization, levy, collection, and sale for state and county purposes are hereby applied to and shall be the law governing such assessments, equalization, levy, collection, and sale for municipal purposes." Charter, § 3, c. 1, art. 6.

The last section also provides that "all powers and duties so by law conferred or imposed" upon the following county officers, the assessor, tax collector, treasurer, clerk, and auditor, "are hereby conferred and imposed" upon the corresponding city officers.

In 1905, sections 19 to 27, inclusive, of the above charter, were repealed, and section 18 thereof amended (Stats. 1905, pp. 913–924). The material portions of the section which as amended makes provision for the sale of property for delinquent municipal taxes, its redemption and the execution of deeds therefor to the city after the expiration of the period for redemption, are as follows:

> "On the day and hour fixed for the sale, all the property delinquent, upon which the taxes of all kinds, penalties, and costs have not been paid, shall, by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector, be sold to the city of San Diego, and said tax collector shall make an entry 'Sold to the city' on the delinquent assessment list opposite the tax (and a duplicate certificate of sale shall be delivered to the city auditor and filed by him in his office, and a like certificate shall be filed in the office of the city clerk). * * * A redemption of the property sold may be made by the owner or any person in interest within five years from the date of the sale to the city, or at any time prior to the entry or sale of said land by the city, in the manner provided by law for the redemption of property sold to the state for state and county taxes, at the time such redemption is made. * * * If the property is not redeemed within five years from the date of the sale thereof to the city, the tax collector of said city, or his successor in office, must make to the city a deed to the property. * * *"

By the above amendments to the charter provisions respecting sales for unpaid municipal taxes were made to conform substantially to the sections of the Political Code relating to tax sales as the same were amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 18), and no amendments to the charter to conform with subsequent changes in the above Code provisions have been made.

The charter makes no express provision for a resale of property sold by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector to the city, or for its resale after execution to the city of the tax collector's deed; and it is urged by appellant that the proceedings leading to the execution to respondent of a deed to the property here involved were unauthorized and the deed void.

The proceedings leading to the execution of the deed in question, as shown by the record, were as follows: Under date of February 17, 1919, the tax collector issued to the city of San Diego a certificate of sale of the property, reciting that the property had been assessed for the year 1918 to W. A. Shaules; that the same, by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector, had, on January 25, 1919, been sold to the city for the nonpayment of taxes assessed for the previous year, with the percentage, costs, and charges thereon. The certificate also contained the following statement:

> "Unless said real estate so sold as aforesaid is redeemed within five years from the date of sale the purchaser thereof will be entitled to a deed therefor on 26 day of January, A. D. 1924."

Under date of January 28, 1924, the tax collector executed and acknowledged a deed to the city, reciting the previous sale, that no redemption had been made, and that the city was entitled to a deed on January 26, 1924. This deed was recorded on March 19, 1924. On January 26, 1924, the city tax collector also executed and acknowledged a deed to respondent for the same property, reciting that the property "was duly assessed for taxation in the year 1918 to W. A. Shaules, and was thereafter on the 28th day of January, 1924, duly sold to A. M. Shook for the nonpayment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year 1918 and were a lien on said real property," and further "that all taxes levied and assessed against said property prior to the year 1924 have been paid and discharged. * * *"

It appears that the execution of the deed to respondent followed proceedings by the tax collecter under the provisions of sections 3764, 3771, and 3785b of the Political Code as amended in 1913 (St. 1913, pp. 556–558), and respondent contends that the provisions of section 18 of chapter 1 of article 6 of the Charter were superseded by the amendments to the above sections of the Political Code, and that sales for delinquent municipal taxes assessed after the year 1913 were governed by the Code provisions.

The amendments to the charter adopted in 1905 provided a complete scheme for the levy and assessment of municipal taxes, for sales for their nonpayment, and for the redemption of property sold to the city. While these amendments conformed substantially to the general laws then in force, the changes in the latter made in 1913 were not followed by corresponding amendments to the charter, and to the extent that the plan or method expressly provided remained unchanged by amendment the charter had "otherwise provided." Its provisions in those respects were within the exception contained in section 3 (c. 1, art. 6), and were not affected by the Code amendments of 1913. As stated, the charter makes no express provision for a resale by the city of property acquired through tax proceedings; but it is further contended by respondent that the tax collector is authorized by section 3, chapter 1, article 6, of the charter to sell such property in the manner provided by sections 3897 and 3898 of the Political Code. Under the above Code sections county tax collectors are without power to sell property sold for taxes and which has been deeded to the state, unless directed to do so by the controller. Pol. Code, § 3897. No officer or body is clothed by the charter with authority to direct or make a sale of property, however acquired, which is owned by the city, except the common council (Charter, § 1, subd. 50, c. 2, art. 2), which may provide for such sale by ordinance; and it is not contended that the sale in question was authorized by that body.

Respondent further suggests that the city tax collector has for several years pursued the method provided by sections 3764, 3771, and 3785b of the Political Code, and that his practical construction of the charter provisions should not be disturbed, citing Marysville v. Smith, 178 Cal. 786, 790, 175 P. 13. As to this contention, however, it will be sufficient to say that no sales by the tax collector other than those involved in this action are shown by the record to have been made.

For the reasons stated, it is our conclusion that the sale by the tax collector was unauthorized, and that the deed to respondent was for that reason void; and it will therefore be unnecessary to consider the further claim by the appellants that the proceedings had were not conducted in accordance with the requirements of the above Code sections.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Gale against J. W. Dixon. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor originally entered, thought to be insufficient, and from a subsequent adverse judgment entered on an amendment of the court's conclusions of law, and from an order striking out plaintiff's cost bill, plaintiff appeals. Findings amended, and judgment last entered reversed, with directions, and order striking out cost bill affirmed.

Maynard F. Stiles and Caesar A. Roberts, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas T. Porteous, of Riverside, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The parties to this action entered into a contract in writing whereby appellant agreed to construct for respondent at the city of Riverside two bungalows and a garage according to plans and specifications, and respondent agreed to pay therefor the sum of $6,900, as the work progressed, in three equal installments of $2,300 each. The buildings were completed, respondent paid the first two installments, and took possession, but declined to make the final payment on account of various alleged willful or negligent violations of the contract through failure to comply with the specifications. This action was instituted for the recovery of the sum last mentioned.

The case was tried before the superior court, without a jury, and the trial court made findings from the evidence, enumerating twenty-four technical specifications, designated by letter from "a" to "x," inclusive. Twelve of these it found had not been complied with, and also that the defendant had been damaged thereby in the sum of $1,213. It further found that $140.90 had been paid in addition to the $2,600 admitted by the complaint, and that the amount remaining unpaid was $946.10. Conclusions of law were signed and filed, reciting that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for this latter amount, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

Finding numbered IV recites:

> "The said defects were caused by the want of proper care and attention of the plaintiff and the workmanship was not first class, and the materials used in the construction of said houses and garage is not first class, and defects, omissions, and changes from the plans and specifications pervade the whole of said structures, and the plaintiff has not performed his contract as agreed, and he did not substantially perform same, or attempt honestly and in good faith to perform the same. The defendant did not accept said houses as being constructed in compliance with said contract."

The plaintiff made a motion for new trial on August 7, 1923, and on August 11 the defendant moved that the judgment be vacated; that judgment for costs be entered in his favor; that the plaintiff be denied any relief; and that the conclusions of law be amended to conform thereto. The latter motion was argued and submitted, and the trial court granted the same, striking out its former conclusions of law, "and substituting in lieu thereof the following: As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts the court finds that the defendant is entitled to judgment, that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant is entitled to recover of and from the plaintiff his costs of defense herein." Judgment was then entered in accordance with this latter ruling and conclusion.

The plaintiff appealed from the first judgment upon the ground, among others, that he should have been awarded the full amount demanded, less $140, and that the judgment was not supported by the evidence. He also appealed from the judgment last entered upon the ground that the trial court was without power to alter its conclusions of law and judgment, or to do more than grant a new trial, which the defendant did not request. It is insisted by appellant that the substituted judgment is void for the reason that conclusions of law may under such circumstances be modified or amended only to conform to the findings of fact, whereas, as amended, the conclusion above quoted is contrary to the findings.

It is the theory of respondent, and was stated by the trial court in granting the motion to vacate the original judgment, that a builder acting in good faith may recover the contract price, notwithstanding slight and trivial defects or deviations from the specifications, and is not held to a strict and literal compliance therewith, but that there is no legal basis for one acting in bad faith to recover either a reasonable value of the services or the contract price less the damages.

[1] The Code of Civil Procedure, in section 663 thereof, provides that a judgment of the superior court may be vacated and another and different judgment entered when the conclusions of law are incorrect or inconsistent with the findings of fact, and that in such event the conclusions of law shall be corrected and amended. It has been held that such a matter is properly reviewable in the trial court under said section, rather than by motion for new trial. Elizalde v. Murphy, 11 Cal. App. 32, 39, 103 P. 904.

Therefore we proceed to inquire, first, as to whether or not the plaintiff, under the finding that he failed to attempt honestly and in good faith to perform his contract substantially in accordance with agreed plans and specifications, but having received about two-thirds of the contract price, is entitled to judgment for the balance; and, second, as to whether or not under the facts presented such finding is warranted by the evidence.

[2] We think that, if the finding in question be sustained, the trial court properly vacated the original judgment, and that the one which was substituted therefor, and the amended conclusions of law, must be upheld. It seems to be the established rule in this and many other jurisdictions that where a builder willfully and without justification fails substantially to perform, though the owner cannot avoid availing himself of the benefit of partial performance because the labor and material are attached to his freehold, the contractor is not entitled to compensation, even though the owner may take possession of the incomplete structure. 9 C. J. 819, and cases there cited. Our Supreme Court, in Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 556, 150 P. 769, 775, quotes from 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1607, as follows:

> "A substantial performance must be established, in order to entitle the party claiming the benefit of the contract to recover; but this does not mean a literal compliance as to the details that are unimportant. There must be no willful or intentional departure, and the defects of performance must not pervade the whole or be so essential as substantially to defeat the object which the parties intend to accomplish. Whether, in any case, such defects or omissions are substantial, or merely unimportant mistakes that have been or may be corrected, is generally a question of fact."

The court found in the instant case that through want of proper care and attention the plaintiff failed to furnish first-class materials or workmanship; that he did not substantially perform or attempt to perform his contract honestly or in good faith; and that the defects complained of pervaded the whole of said structures. The rule above stated was followed, and a judgment for an alleged balance, after partial payment, was likewise denied in each of the following cases: Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 P. 391; Merchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 669, 49 P. 840; Lynip v. Alturas School District, 24 Cal. App. 426, 141 P. 835.

It will be observed, however, that in those cases wherein all compensation was denied, the performance was not substantially complete or in compliance with the contract of the parties; there was a willful and intentional departure, causing defects which were so essential, and so pervaded the whole structure, as substantially to defeat the object which the parties intended to accomplish.

A technical and detailed statement of the evidence in this case as to alleged omissions or departures from the plans and specifications is unnecessary. The defendant, a resident of Chicago, was not familiar with building, nor with building contracts, plans, or specifications. While visiting in California he expressed a desire to build, and inquired as to the employment of a competent, experienced builder. The plaintiff was introduced as such by others for whom he had successfully and satisfactorily performed services of like character. The defendant attempted to draw his own plans, and thereafter, upon his return to Chicago, he forwarded to plaintiff additional plans, in the nature of blueprints, and certain specifications. It appears from the plaintiff's testimony that some of the items consisted of improvements which were patented, and which the plaintiff could not legally make or use, except by purchasing them from the manufacturers; two coolers, or air ventilators, clothes closets, and linen closets were of slightly different dimensions from those specified; the plans called for three gables, whereas but two were furnished; shelving in the basements was omitted, the plaintiff says, by agreement; brick chimneys about four inches off center, were not specified at all, but the defect could be remedied at small expense; a cracked baseboard, hammer marks, rough bread boards, a glass knob missing, and other small items, constitute the sole basis of the finding, as facts, that there was not a substantial performance of the contract, that the defects and omissions pervaded the whole of said structures, due to a want of honesty and good faith on the part of the plaintiff.

From the whole record before us, it is apparent that the evidence does not support such a finding. The contract merely provided that Gale should "furnish all labor and materials for the erection and completion of two bungalows and garage house at 163 So. Monroe St., Riverside, Cal., according to plans and specifications as agreed for the sum of sixty-nine hundred dollars ($6,900.00). Payments to be made in the following order: $2,300.00 when the buildings are roughed in, $2,300.00 when the plumbing and wiring is in and the buildings are plastered, $2,300.00 when completed." It appears that the plans and specifications were crude, requiring in some instances technical measurements which, owing to other considerations, were impossible. Patented articles which the contractor could not build were specified, and many of the items were trivial. From the meager nature of the written contract it was obvious, and the testimony tends to show, that much was left to verbal understandings between the parties, and to the judgment of the builder. The defendant took possession, and occupied the houses personally and by tenant for the period of about a year before complaint was made, at which time the defendant was prepared to make final payment if the plaintiff would make a few corrections. The plaintiff suggested that Dixon cause them to be made, and deduct the expense from the amount due, which the latter declined to do, and they have not been made, nor has the defendant, notwithstanding full use of the buildings, expended any amount for repairs thereon. It is not denied that Gale used every effort to perform his part of the contract to the satisfaction of Dixon, at an expenditure of about $800 more than the amount of the entire contract price. Certain of the omitted items were not specified as being required by the contract or plans, and in at least one instance an item charged against the plaintiff was, after much discussion and endeavor, constructed at the request and under the direction of defendant's wife.

[3, 4] As was said in Connell v. Higgins, supra, and other cases cited, a literal compliance as to all the details is not requisite to recovery. The object which the parties intended to accomplish was not defeated, or materially affected, by the deviations or omissions of which complaint is made. The trial court specifically detailed and found upon the evidence before it about twelve items upon which the parties seriously differed, and that an expenditure of $5 to $218 in various instances, aggregating $1,213, would compensate the defendant for his damage. We are not at this point concerned with the accuracy of the individual findings as to damages. It is sufficient to say that the plaintiff did not abandon the contract, nor did he display a lack of honesty or of good faith, such as is contemplated by the decisions, holding that in such cases the contractor is entitled to nothing. The buildings were fully completed, and the results of plaintiff's efforts, though not entirely satisfactory to the defendant, were accomplished by diligence, experience, and the exercise of plaintiff's best judgment under the circumstances. We think, therefore, that this finding was unwarranted, and, this being so, the substituted judgment and amended conclusions of law are without foundation.

Appellant next contends that the evidence was not sufficient to support the findings as to certain deductions for damages alleged by the defendant; that he should have been awarded the full amount prayed, less $140; and that the judgment first rendered should be reversed.

Upon final submission of the case, the trial court announced from the bench in the form of an opinion certain deductions for defects or omissions for which it decided that respondent should be allowed damages, stating that judgment would be given in favor of the plaintiff for $1,006.10, but directed that the defendant prepare findings and judgment. The findings submitted by respondent's counsel varied in some respects, as to certain items, from those announced by the court, and as finally signed and filed the findings, conclusions, and judgment awarded to the plaintiff the sum of $946.10. To these findings the plaintiff excepted, tendering other proposed findings, and thereafter moved for a new trial,, which motion was not formally acted upon, but was denied by operation of law. The defendant, as already observed, moved the court that said judgment be vacated, and that judgment in his favor, for costs, be entered, which motion was granted.

[5] It is but justice to the appellant to state that from the record before us it is obvious that he was confronted with a most complicated and difficult problem. There were various conferences between himself and respondent at which many of the details of the buildings were verbally agreed upon. No written specifications, other than mere typewritten notations of an admitted novice, were furnished. Blueprints, not drawn to scale, and drawings which simply approximated the measurements which he was required to follow, constituted all that he had before him as a guide, except a catalogue of ready-built houses containing pictures from which he was expected to gather ideas as to general design. Appellant testified that with these crude "specifications," rough drawings, the catalogue, and remembering to the best of his ability previous oral agreements, he constructed the bungalows and garage.

There is a sharp conflict in the testimony, however, as to what was actually agreed upon, as to what under ordinary circumstances is required by custom among builders, as well as concerning the amounts which should be allowed for negligent or inadvertent omissions in such cases. Appellant admits that items "n" and "o" may have escaped his attention, and as to ten other items the court found upon all of the evidence before it that, whereas first-class workmanship and materials were promised, the inside finish and certain other features were not so furnished, and that the aggregate expense of reconstruction and refinishing in these respects was $1,213. The deductions allowed for the respective defects which the trial court found to exist were in many instances considerably less than those contended for by respondent and his witnesses, whereas appellant insisted that there was no agreement to furnish them as alleged, and that no charge should be made therefor. We think, however, in view of the fact that the major portion of the contract was verbal, and was left to the memory and judgment of appellant, the trial court doubtless with all of the evidence at hand considered the frailty of human recollection, and the irreconcilable conflicts between the memories and opinions of various witnesses. Under the facts and circumstances before us we cannot say as a matter of law that the court erred in its computations and in the conclusions which it reached concerning this phase of the case.

[6] After the trial court announced judgment for the plaintiff and directed that findings be prepared accordingly, on the 5th day of July, 1923, plaintiff filed his memorandum of costs and disbursements. The findings and judgment were not signed and filed, however, until August 1, 1923. The defendant moved that the cost bill be stricken from the files, upon the ground that no judgment had been entered at the time the same was filed, which motion was granted. Section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the successful party must deliver to the clerk and serve upon the adverse party his memorandum of costs and disbursements within five days after notice of decision of the court. It has been held that the "decision" referred to by said section consists of the findings of fact and conclusions of law, signed by the court, and filed with the clerk (Porter v. Hopkins, 63 Cal. 53, 55; Mullally v. Irish-American B. Soc., 69 Cal. 559, 561, 11 P. 215), and that a cost bill filed before the filing of the findings and judgment is premature, and will be stricken out (Sellick v. De Carlow, 95 Cal. 644, 30 P. 795). The order striking out the plaintiff's cost bill in the instant case was therefore not error.

The findings are amended by striking out the language of finding IV herein quoted. The judgment entered October 10, 1923, is reversed. The superior court is directed to enter judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed, being in effect a re-entry of the judgment of August 1, 1923, and the order striking out plaintiff's cost bill is affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

VACA v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.★

(Civ. 6184.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 28, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨995—Value of photograph as evidence is for jury, not appellate court.

The value of a photograph as evidence is not for the appellate court to determine, but must be determined by the jury from all the evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Jury's finding on conflicting evidence as to truck driver's ability to see approaching train before reaching track will not be disturbed.

The jury's finding on conflicting evidence as to truck driver's ability to see approaching train before he reached the track will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Evidence ⇨597—Testimony that witnesses did not hear automatic railway crossing bell ring held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff on such issue in death action.

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, testimony of several witnesses that they did not hear automatic crossing bell ring, though they listened for it, held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff on issue whether bell sounded and defendant failed to use ordinary care in keeping it in condition.

4. Trial ⇨139(1)—Testimony of witnesses in position to hear and observe that they heard and saw no signals of train's approach, opposed to positive testimony that signals were given, presents jury question.

Negative testimony of witnesses in position to hear and observe that they heard and saw no signals of train's approach, opposed to positive testimony that signals were given, presents a question for jury, in action for death at railway crossing.

5. Railroads ⇨330(3)—One approaching railroad track must seize every reasonable opportunity to look and listen, notwithstanding custom or legal duty to give signals.

One approaching a railroad track, which is itself a warning of danger, must take advantage of every reasonable opportunity to look and listen, and may not depend on custom, or even duty enjoined by law, to give appropriate signals of approach of trains.

6. Railroads ⇨328(3)—Automobilist must leave machine and go forward to look for approaching train, if prudence requires.

Automobilist approaching railroad track must get out of machine and go forward on foot to look for approaching train, if required in exercise of prudence to ascertain whether his life is in danger.

7. Negligence ⇨122(1)—Contributory negligence is affirmative defense, which defendant must establish.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, the burden of establishing which is on defendant asserting it.

8. Railroads ⇨327(1)—Traveler's discharge of duty to stop and look before crossing railroad tracks must be measured in light of surrounding conditions and circumstances.

While traveler is generally charged with duty of stopping and looking before crossing railroad tracks, his discharge of such duty and his care or negligence is to be measured in light of surrounding conditions and circumstances.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

9. Railroads 🔑330(1)—In measuring conduct of traveler at railroad crossing, jury may consider railroad's creation of condition causing him to relax vigilance.

While traveler, struck by train at railroad crossing, may not seek redress for injury caused solely through his own carelessness, jury in measuring his conduct may consider railroad company's creation of condition which caused him to relax his own vigilance with resulting injury.

10. Negligence 🔑136(8, 9) — Law forbids recovery only when evidence is not conflicting, and contributory negligence is only reasonable inference from facts.

Law forbids recovery only when evidence is such that court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that reasonable men can draw from such facts, but one inference, pointing unerringly to plaintiff's negligence contributing to his own injury.

11. Railroads 🔑350(28)—Contributory negligence of truck driver held for jury on conflicting evidence as to whether railway crossing bell rang and was properly maintained.

Contributory negligence of truck driver, killed in collision with train at street crossing, held for jury on conflicting evidence as to whether automatic crossing bell rang as train approached and defendant exercised proper care in maintaining bell.

12. Railroads 🔑347(8, 11)—Testimony as to whether engine bell was rung held relevant on question of decedent's contributory negligence, though inadmissible on question of want of care in keeping crossing bell in good condition.

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, testimony as to whether engine bell was rung held admissible, not on question of defendant's want of care in keeping automatic crossing bell in good working order and condition, but as relevant to question of decedent's contributory negligence.

13. Railroads 🔑307(3)—Crossing bell's failure to ring as truck driver approached was not of itself negligence.

The momentary failure of automatic railroad crossing bell to ring as truck driver, killed in collision with train, approached tracks, was not of itself negligence.

14. Railroads 🔑348(3)—Evidence held not to show that crossing bell's failure to ring was due to railroad's want of ordinary care in keeping it in working order.

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, testimony of three witnesses that crossing bell did not ring as trains approached at undefined times in past held not to show that its failure to ring as decedent approached was due to defendant's want of ordinary care in keeping it in working order, nor to justify finding that defendant failed to use such care in inspection, renewal, or replacement.

15. Railroads 🔑346(1)—Burden was on plaintiff to prove defendant railroad's negligence in not properly inspecting, or taking steps to insure ringing of crossing bell on approach of trains.

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, burden was on plaintiff to prove defendant's negligence in not properly inspecting signal bell or taking steps to assure its ringing on approach of trains.

16. Railroads 🔑346(3)—Res ipsa loquitur rule held inapplicable in action for death at railroad crossing, because of failure of automatic bell to ring.

Principle of res ipsa loquitur held inapplicable in action for death of truck driver in collision with train at street crossing because of alleged failure of automatic crossing bell to ring as train approached.

17. Trial 🔑251(8)—Instruction as to duty to place bell on locomotive held erroneous as not within issues raised by complaint alleging failure of crossing bell to ring (Civ. Code, § 486).

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, because of alleged failure of automatic bell to ring as train approached, instruction in language of Civ. Code, § 486, as to duty to place bell weighing at least 20 pounds on locomotive, to be rung at certain distances, etc., held erroneous as not within issues raised by complaint, but mere abstract statement of law.

18. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Abstract instruction as to duty of placing bell on locomotive, in action for death at railroad crossing, held not reversible error (Civ. Code, § 486).

In action for death of truck driver struck by train at street crossing, giving of instruction, not within issues raised by complaint, as to duty of placing bell weighing at least 20 pounds on locomotive, to be rung at certain distances, in language of Civ. Code, § 486, held not reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by Pat F. Vaca, as administrator of the estate of Vidal Garcia, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company and another. From a judgment against named defendant, it appeals. Reversed.

C. P. Kaetzel, of San Luis Obispo (Henly C. Booth, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

John R. Stowe, H. J. Dubin and A. H. Brazil, all of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. On October 23, 1924, plaintiff's intestate, while crossing the track of appellant corporation where it crosses Palm street, a public street in the city of San Luis Obispo, in a Ford truck, was struck at a grade crossing by a south-bound passenger train of the Southern Pacific Company and received injuries from which he died. This action is prosecuted by the administrator of the estate of the deceased to recover damages on account of his death. The action was dismissed as to the defendant Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the jury before which the action was tried returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant Southern Pacific Company in the sum of $20,000.

The case was tried on the theory that an automatic bell maintained at the Palm street crossing to give warning of the approach of trains failed to ring on the occasion of the approach of the train which collided with the Ford truck driven by Vidal Garcia, deceased, and that this failure was due to a lack of proper care on the part of the railroad company in the maintaining of the automatic bell. The answer denies the alleged negligence and as a further defense charges contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff's decedent.

Appellant urges the following points on appeal:

> "First, on the issue of ordinary care in keeping the bell in condition the jury, though properly instructed, found directly against the uncontradicted evidence on this issue; second, that the verdict of the jury was not supported by the evidence, in that the uncontradicted testimony demonstrates that, as a matter of law, the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, even though there was a failure of the crossing bell; third, that the verdict of the jury was not supported by the evidence, in that there was no evidence that the crossing bell failed to ring; fourth, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury."

The facts are undisputed that the accident occurred in the afternoon of a clear day; that there was a sign, 6 or 7 feet high, with a circular disc 2 feet in diameter with "Crossing" on it, approximately 300 feet from where the accident occurred in the direction from which deceased approached, and two crossing signs directly at the crossing, and that the decedent was familiar with the crossing, he having crossed the railroad track at that point on numerous occasions. There is, however, a conflict in the evidence as to the distance up the track one approaching could see from a given point. Thomas J. Foley, trainmaster for defendant, testified that on the side of the track from which deceased approached he could, at a point 16 feet from the nearest rail look up the track for a distance of about 1,000 feet, and at 9 or 10 feet from the nearest rail could see the track for about half a mile, while the witness Maggetti testified that, "before the dirt was taken away (which was subsequent to the accident) you couldn't see up that track without being right on it," and, according to the witness William Mallagh, "it is a straight piece of track; you couldn't see up there until you got almost on the track."

[1, 2] A photograph of the scene of the accident, taken shortly thereafter, was introduced in evidence (Plaintiff's exhibit No. 2), which gives a view up the track in the direction from which the train approached. This photograph shows the track and the embankments on either side. From the photograph it appears that at the base or on a level with the rails on either side of the track there is a space of about 3 feet between the rails and the banks of the cut; that this space widens at an angle of approximately 45 degrees from the base to the top. Appellant argues—and with some merit—that the photograph shows that decedent's view of the track was not obstructed, but, on the contrary, that on approaching the crossing, if he had looked in the direction from which the train was approaching, he would have seen the on-coming train. The value, however, of a photograph as evidence is not for this court to determine, for, as was said in People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 133, 57 P. 785, 787:

> "We may assume that every one now understands the limitations upon the use of the photograph. It presents but one point of view, and may sometimes make an unfair representation of the points at issue. Like any other diagram, its value must be determined by the jury, from all the evidence."

The jury saw the photograph and examined it in view of the surroundings at the scene of the accident, which was also inspected by it. During the trial, by stipulation of counsel, the court and jury were conducted to the scene of the accident and there viewed the crossing and surroundings and such objects as respective counsel requested be inspected. It is true that subsequent to the accident and before the inspection by the jury a portion of the bank was removed; this, however, gave the jury even a clearer view of the track running through the cut than the deceased could have had. Furthermore, the jury saw and heard a train operated through the cut and over the crossing. This evidence presents a conflict on the question of the ability of the deceased to see the approaching train before he reached the track, and, therefore, under the well-established rule, the finding on this issue in favor of respondent will not be disturbed.

[3, 4] On the question as to whether or not the signal bell sounded and as to defendant's failure to use ordinary care in keeping the bell in condition, it may be said that several witnesses testified that they did not hear the bell ring, although they listened for it, and Kenneth Smith testified:

> "At the time I was looking out the window listening for a bell, which I always do, you know, habits of looking and listening for the train. At the time I heard no bell, about 2 o'clock looking for a train. I heard an engine coming, and I turned to go to my work when I heard a crash."

Ira Barlow testified:

> "Q. Now, prior to the time that the train struck the truck, while the train was approaching the crossing, did you hear the automatic bell at the Palm street crossing ring? A. I did not. Q. Do you know whether or not that bell rang? A. That bell did not ring until after that train started back as I stood on the concrete block up at the foot of it. Q. And you are sure of that? A. I am positive."

This is sufficient to sustain the verdict as to this issue. "In this connection it may be said that negative testimony of witnesses who are in a position to hear and to observe, who declare they heard no signals and saw none, even as opposed to positive testimony that signals were given, presents a question to be submitted to the jury, and it has been held such negative evidence may be sufficient to sustain a verdict." Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 74 Cal. App. 10, 239 P. 429; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709.

[5, 6] We concede the law to be, as urged by appellant, that a person approaching a railroad track which is itself a warning of danger must take advantage of every reasonable opportunity to look and listen, and that a traveler may not depend upon a custom or even a duty enjoined by law to give appropriate signals of the approach of trains, and has no right, because he heard no such signals, not to look and listen (Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 776, 151 P. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842), and that, where the exercise of prudence would require him, if necessary, to ascertain whether his life was in danger to get out of his machine and go forward a few steps on foot in order that the matter be placed beyond peradventure (Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 567, 161 P. 21; Murray v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 1, 169 P. 675). Nor are we at variance with the rule laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the recent case, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. Goodman, 275 U. S. 66, 48 S. Ct. 24, 72 L. Ed. ——, as that case establishes the same rule announced in Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, but in none of those cases did the element of crossing signals enter into the consideration of the cases. Here the appellant had erected a crossing bell to warn persons about to cross the railroad track of the approach of trains, which crossing bell we must conclude, under the finding of the jury on the conflict in the evidence, did not ring on the occasion in question, and, that being so, was the deceased under the circumstances disclosed by the record guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in attempting to cross the track?

[7] Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and the burden of establishing such negligence was upon the defendant who asserted it. The record is entirely silent as to the actions of the deceased before he drove upon the track and was observed by the engineer. In Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153, the court says:

> "In the absence of any direct proof we are of the opinion that the jury are at liberty to infer ordinary care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff from all the circumstances of the case—his character and habits and the natural instinct of self-preservation. To hold otherwise would be in effect to presume negligence on the part of one in excuse of negligence on the part of another."

Furthermore, the same degree of care is not required of a traveler approaching a railroad crossing at which a bell or signal is erected to warn him of danger. And in Gregg v. Western Pacific Co., 193 Cal. 212, 222, 223 P. 553, 557, the court uses this language:

> "It is true, as has often been stated, that a railroad crossing is itself a place of danger and is an effectual warning of danger which must always be heeded and the exercise of ordinary care in traveling over such place is not excused by the negligent omission of the railroad company itself to exercise reasonable care. But it is also true that a railway company will not be permitted to encourage the public to relax its vigil as to the dangers that lurk in railroad crossings by assurances that the danger has been removed or minimized by the adoption of safety devices and measures and at the same time hold a person to the same quantum of care as if no such safety measures had been provided."

[8-10] While a traveler about to cross a railroad track is generally charged with the duty of stopping and looking before crossing the tracks, in each particular case his discharge of that duty and his care or negligence is to be measured in the light of surrounding conditions and circumstances. It is true that he may not seek redress for an injury caused solely through his own carelessness, but in measuring his conduct a jury may take into consideration that the railroad company has created a condition which has caused the traveler to relax his own vigilance so that he is brought to his destruction or injury. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 P. 677; Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 166 P. 18. It is only when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, that the law steps in and forbids the plaintiff a recovery. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513.

[11] In Smith v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 500, the court uses this language:

> "The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty towards others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the > particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time."

See, also, Marini v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 257 P. 74, and Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 277, 55 P. 908, and we think in the present case the question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff under the circumstances disclosed was a question for the jury.

[12, 13] The most serious question is the one presented by appellant's assignment that "on the issue of ordinary care in keeping the bell in condition, the jury, though properly instructed, found directly against the uncontradicted evidence on this issue." The complaint counts solely on the failure of the automatic bell to give warning of the approaching train:

> "That said defendants, with reasonable care and diligence, could have kept said automatic bell in good working order and prevented the same from being out of order, on said 23d day of October, 1924, and at all times."

It is true the answer alleges:

> "The train of defendants mentioned in said complaint warned said Vidal Garcia of its approach to said railroad crossing by the rumble and roar of said train, the whistle of its engine, ringing of its bell, and the ringing of said automatic bell."

And testimony was introduced as to whether or not the engine bell was rung. This testimony was proper, not on the question as to defendants' want of care in keeping the crossing bell in good working order and condition, but was relevant on the question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff's decedent. The momentary failure of the crossing bell was not of itself negligence. The jury was so instructed, and the correctness of that instruction is not challenged, nor could it be. In Neale v. Atchison, etc., Ry., 178 Cal. 225, 229, 172 P. 1105, 1106, the court says:

> "This court has never said that evidence of the failure of machinery to do its allotted work may not be introduced, but the rule is that proof of the occurrence of the accident by reason of such failure, standing alone, is not proof of negligence."

If, therefore, plaintiff had proven that the accident occurred and that the crossing bell failed to ring and there rested, his case must have failed. But, says respondent, we have, as evidence from which the jury might infer negligence, the frequent inspections of the crossing bell which, if not careless, should have disclosed any defect which made the bell uncertain in its operation; the evidence of prior occasions on which the bell failed, and the fact of its failure to operate at the time of the accident, which could be considered with all the other facts and circumstances in evidence on the question of defendant's negligence.

[14] The only evidence directed to the issue of defendants' want of care in maintaining and keeping the bell in repair, aside from the failure of the bell to ring on the occasion in question, is the testimony of three witnesses that at undefined times the crossing bell did not ring as trains approached the crossing.

Plaintiff's witness Magetti testified that he remembered "once a long time ago" the bell did not ring when a train was approaching. The witness Herrera, called by plaintiff, testified that during "a good many years" there were occasions when the bell did not ring—"there has been no telling, maybe a dozen times and maybe twenty times, I don't know"; and plaintiff's witness Miss Shurrager testified as to times, not specified, during an 8 years' residence near the crossing when she did not hear the bell ring as a train approached. This testimony falls short of a showing that the failure of the bell to ring on the day in question was due to the want of ordinary care on the part of defendant in keeping the automatic bell in working order, and does not support the allegation of the complaint charging negligence with respect to the maintenance of the bell nor justify the jury in finding that defendant failed to use ordinary care in inspection, renewal or replacement. The evidence is without dispute that the bell did ring on the approach of a freight train earlier in the day of the accident, and also that it rang when the train which struck the decedent's automobile backed up to the crossing after the accident.

Added to this, the witness Charles C. Anthony, consulting engineer of the National Safety Appliance Company of San Francisco and an expert on signal bells, testified that he was familiar with the circuits and operation of the particular crossing; that in his opinion these circuits are in accordance with good practice and in design to insure correct operation of the bell. Frank Philbrick, assistant signal supervisor of the defendant company, explained how the bell works, and testified that he inspected the bell in September, 1924, and found it in perfect condition; that about the latter part of March, 1924, or the 1st of April, they renewed the entire mechanism of this bell by putting in a new one; that one part of the mechanism, which is the circuit breaker, lasts about four years, due to the burning of the contacts, the remainder indefinitely. Thomas F. White, the signal maintainer of the defendant company, testified that he inspected the bell every day he worked—that is, 6 days a week—and had done so for 8 years; that he inspected it at 2 p. m. of the day previous to the accident; that it was then in good working order, and that there was no corrosion in the circuit breaker; that he inspected it about 25 or 30 minutes after the accident and found the bell was working fine, all its parts and mechanism were in good order, and its condition fine. There was neither, on the day before the accident when he inspected it nor some time after 2 o'clock on the day of the accident when he saw it, anything wrong with the bell in any way. Thomas J. Foley, defendant's trainmaster, called by plaintiff, testified that the bell was in operation at 4 p. m. the day of the accident, that he had never received "any report that that signal was not operating," and that he had never heard of that signal failing to operate.

There is no charge made in the complaint that the statutory signals by bell and whistle prescribed by section 486 of the Civil Code were not given, nor is it made to appear in the complaint or by the evidence that the signal bell was installed by virtue of any law, ordinance, or regulation of the Railroad Commission.

Our attention has not been called to any California decision on the subject of the quantum of care required of a railroad company which voluntarily installs an automatic bell at a crossing, nor have we found any such case. In Kingsbury v. Boston & Maine R. R., 79 N. H. 203, 106 A. 642, in which case the facts are analogous and the principle of law involved the same as in the present case, the court says:

> "The burden was upon the plaintiff under the second count to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the warning bell did not ring when the southbound train passed the crossing, and that its failure to ring was due to the negligence of the defendant. If it is assumed, in accordance with the testimony of the plaintiff and his brother, that it did not ring, there is no evidence that its failure in this respect was due to the defendant's negligence. It appears from the plaintiff's testimony that it did ring a short time before upon the approach of the northbound train. At that time the system was in perfect working order, and the defendant was not notified that it was defective in any respect. Nor does it appear that it had failed to properly inspect the apparatus, or that in the exercise of ordinary care it could have done anything more than it did do to ensure the ringing of the bell when trains were approaching. * * * What happened to the mechanism of the system that caused the bell circuit to be open and give no danger signal when the collision occurred, and to be closed immediately afterwards and to give the signal cannot be said to be due to any cause for which the defendant is responsible. The mere fact that the bell did not ring, if it is a fact, does not authorize the inference that its failure to do so was due to the defendant's negligence, since it is apparent it may have been due to some cause for which the defendant was not responsible. (Boucher v. Railroad, 76 N. H. 91, 79 Atl. 993 [34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 728, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 847] L. R. A. 1917A, 1174, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 366.) The question of the defendant's negligence upon this count was improperly submitted to the jury for want of evidence."

In Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Adams' Administrator, 205 Ky. 203, 265 S. W. 623, which was a crossing case in which it was claimed that the electric bell failed to operate at the time of the accident, the court instructed the jury that it was the defendant's duty to "cause the electric bell to sound so as to give timely warning of the approach of the train." There it is held that the duty does not go that far, but merely to the extent that the company "should use ordinary care to see that it was kept and maintained in working order, and that it would be liable for its neglect to do so."

[15, 16] Here, as in Kingsbury v. Boston & Maine R. R., supra, defendant had no notice, actual or constructive, of the failure of the bell to ring, nor does it appear that the railroad company failed to properly inspect the signal bell, or that in the exercise of ordinary care it was called upon to do anything more than it did to insure the ringing of the bell on the approach of trains. The plaintiff, on whom rests the burden of proving negligence, furnished no standard of care for acceptance by the jury; the jury therefore could not shut its ears to the only testimony on the question and set up a standard of its own. The case is not one involving the principle of res ipsa loquitor or of the violation of a statutory rule that the bell must ring on all occasions.

Respondent, in support of his position that the jury may infer from the failure of the bell to ring on former occasions the lack of care on the part of the person in charge of the inspection and repair of the bell, cites us to Lake Erie, etc., R. R. Co. v. Howarth, 73 Ind. App. 454, 124 N. E. 687. There the complaint alleges certain facts with reference to the installation of the bell, its condition as to being out of repair, and the length of time it had been in such condition. It also alleged that the bell did not give the warning for which it was designed. There was evidence which tended to show that the device which operated the bell was out of repair on the occasion in question, and that such condition had existed for a long time prior thereto. This evidence the court held was "admissible for the purpose of showing that appellant had, at least, constructive knowledge that the bell was not serving the purpose for which it was designed," and "further tends to show that this condition continued to exist for several months immediately following the accident to appellee."

McCarragher v. Rogers, 120 N. Y. 526, 24 N. E. 812, decided by the New York Court of Appeals, cited by respondent, was a case where a boy was injured in a printing establishment where to do his work he was required to sit on a table two feet in width extending across the end of a machine. The employer's attention had been called to the fact that a boy similarly employed had been injured three months before. The court held this evidence was admissible. In Long v. John Breuner Co., 36 Cal. App. 630, 172 P. 1132, also cited, it is held that evidence of previous accidents on an incline leading in front of the entrance to the store, which was a fixed visible condition, was admissible as notice to the owner of the dangerous character of the entrance.

In the present case there is no evidence tending to show that the signal bell was out of repair. On the contrary, the evidence offered by defendant, which is the only evidence on the question, is that the bell was in good condition. Also is the evidence of inspection undisputed, and the evidence of the failure of the bell to ring on various unlocated times in a spread of years prior to the accident did not tend to prove lack of care and inspection at or near the time in question. If the bell had failed to ring within a time approximate to the accident, and such failure had been noted by the witnesses testifying to the failure of the bell to ring on former occasions, the probability is, with the fact of the accident to direct their memory to such failure, that they could have fixed the time when such signal failed to function at least with some degree of certainty.

[17, 18] As to appellant's assignment of error in the giving and refusing of certain instructions, we think that taking the instructions as a whole, they sufficiently presented the law. It may, however, be said that the instruction given in the language of section 486 of the Civil Code, relative to the duty of placing a bell of at least 20 pounds weight on the locomotive to be rung at certain distances, etc., is not within the issues raised by the complaint; it is, however, a mere abstract statement of law, and, while the giving of the instruction would not of itself call for a reversal, it should not have been given.

The record failing to disclose a want of ordinary care and diligence on the part of defendant to keep the automatic crossing bell in good working order as alleged by plaintiff, and on whom the burden rests of proving such want of ordinary care, the judgment must be reversed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

DAVIS v. SCHNEIDER. (Civ. 5814.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 7, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1928.

1. Quieting title 🔑44(3)—Ruling that cause of action to quiet title was barred by laches held justified by evidence.

Evidence that plaintiff took no action to enforce her rights under quitclaim deed for seven years and eight months, during which time grantor and his wife resided on premises, nor any steps to notify grantor's administrator or widow of claim, but caused administrator to bring in first account current, and made no objection thereto, despite recital that property was asset of estate, received share of estate on partial distribution, and made no objection when inventory listing property as belonging to estate was filed, nor when family allowance was made and property set aside as homestead for widow, held to justify trial court's ruling that right of action to quiet title was barred by laches.

2. Equity 🔑67—Whether action is barred by laches depends on peculiar circumstances and is largely within trial judge's discretion.

In determining length of time that would bar action on ground of laches, peculiar circumstances of each case must be taken into consideration, and a large discretion is reposed in the trial judge.

3. Appeal and error 🔑941—Appellate court should not interfere with trial judge's conclusion that action is barred by laches, unless manifest injustice is shown.

The appellate court should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusion that an action is barred by laches, unless it is shown that manifest injustice was done.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Mary Davis against George H. Schneider, as administrator de bonis non of the estate of James Kinley, deceased, and executor of the last will and testament of Anna Kinley, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 266 P. 959.

MacDonald & Thompson, and Kimball Fletcher, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kennicott & Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff on September 21, 1923, filed a complaint in the usual form seeking to quiet title to an undivided one-half interest in a parcel of real estate. Defendants, in addition to denying plaintiff's allegations of ownership, set up the defenses of laches, estoppel, and the statute of limitations. The findings of the trial court were favorable to defendant on all of these issues, and judgment was accordingly rendered, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Nearly all of the essential facts are covered in the following stipulation presented by the parties:

"(1) That upon the 1st day of August, 1913, title to the real property involved in this action was in Charlotte Stuckey, and Albert F. Stuckey, and that on said date they deeded the same to James Kinley and Anna Newheuser by a grant deed which was recorded August 7, 1913, in Book 5563 of Deeds, Records of Los Angeles County, California. (2) That the purchase price of said property was paid share and share alike by the said James Kinley and Anna Newheuser out of their own separate funds. (3) That subsequently, to wit, on the ——— day of August, 1913, the said James Kinley and Anna Newheuser intermarried, and immediately thereafter entered into the actual physical possession of the said property and premises, and continued to occupy the same as their home up to and including the date of the death of the said James Kinley, and that the said Anna Kinley, formerly Anna Newheuser, as the widow of the said James Kinley, continued in the actual physical possession thereof, occupying the premises as her home. (4) That plaintiff never at any time prior to the commencement of this action demanded the possession of the said property, and that, prior to the commencement of this action and service of process therein upon them, neither the defendant W. T. Largent nor the defendant Anna Kinley ever had any notice, or knowledge, of any claim of right of the plaintiff in or to said property, save and except in so far as the recording of the instrument under which plaintiff claims may have been constructive notice to them. (6) That all of the taxes and assessments for local improvements and expense of maintenance and repair have been paid from time to time by the said James Kinley, or Anna Kinley, or W. T. Largent as administrator of the estate of James Kinley, and without contribution from the plaintiff. (7) That the said James Kinley died on or about September 12, 1917, and the defendant W. T. Largent was duly appointed administrator of his estate on October 1, 1917; that he qualified as administrator, and ever since said date has been and now is acting as administrator. (8) That an inventory and appraisement was regularly filed in the said estate of James Kinley on the 3d day of January, 1918. That the third item mentioned in said inventory recites: 'Half interest house and lot 4452 Melbourne Ave., Los Angeles—lot 2, tract 822,' and the appraised value thereof is given as $1,000.00. That on February 23d, 1918, a petition was filed for an order to set aside a homestead for the said Anna Kinley, which said petition prayed that the said homestead consist of the undivided one-half interest of the decedent in the said lot 2, tract 822. That on the same date a petition was also filed asking for a family allowance to the said widow. That due notice of hearing of said petition was given, and thereafter the court did, on said hearing, set aside the homestead, as prayed, and ordered a family allowance to the said widow of $50.00 per month. (9) That on February 25, 1920, the plaintiff petitioned the court for an accounting, and distribution. That thereupon an order issued, and the administrator filed his 'first account current' on March 3d, 1920, which said account current contained the following item, among the items with which the said administrator charged himself: 'Half interest in house and lot situated at 4452 Melbourne avenue, Los Angeles, being lot No. 2 in tract 822, appraised at $1,000.00. Since appraisement, however, a homestead has been granted to Anna Kinley, widow of decedent, but the appraisement has not been changed—$1,000.00.' Upon subsequent proceedings duly noticed and heard, and on the 2d day of June, 1920, the court made its order directing a partial distribution of the estate, and in the same order, and as a part thereof, directed that the payment of the family allowance should cease. That by said order of partial distribution all of the estate in the hands of the said administrator was ordered distributed, save the property here involved, and a certain amount in cash. That the administrator thereupon made the said partial distribution as ordered, and the plaintiff herein accepted the part ordered distributed to her. That as appears from the reference thereto in the said 'first account current,' and as was brought out on the hearing thereon, the reason the estate was not in condition to be fully distributed at that time was that litigation was pending in the Supreme Court to determine certain claims against the estate. (10) That the said litigation was decided adversely to the estate, and upon further proceedings had in the superior court of Los Angeles county, judgment was rendered against the administrator, and the administrator has paid the said judgment out of the said undistributed portion of the said estate."

In addition to the facts set forth in the stipulation it was shown that plaintiff was a half-sister of James Kinley. She offered in evidence a quitclaim deed to the property in question, dated September 10, 1913, in which the interest conveyed was not limited to a one-half interest. This deed was recorded on August 3, 1918. Plaintiff testified that she first saw this deed about January 1, 1916, upon her arrival from her former home in Missouri and that James Kinley gave the deed to her at that time. He had told her that he wanted her to make her home on the premises. She further testified:

> "He wanted me to stay anyway after he got married, just the same as if he was not, and me do the cooking, and I said all right, and it was not congenial, and I did not stay there very much. I was there one time four or five months, and I was there every little while for a few days, but I did not stay there altogether."

No consideration passed between James Kinley and plaintiff.

[1] The ruling of the trial court that plaintiff's right of action, if any, was barred by her laches is justified by the evidence. She received the deed, according to her testimony, on January 2, 1916, but did not take action to enforce her rights for seven years and eight months. During this period Mr. and Mrs. Kinley continued to make their home upon the property until the death of Mr. Kinley on September 12, 1917, and thereafter Mrs. Kinley lived on the premises until the action was commenced. During the process of the administration of the estate of James Kinley the plaintiff took no steps to notify the administrator or the widow of any claim she might have to the property, but, on the contrary, caused the administrator to bring in his first account current, to which she made no objection despite the recital therein that the property now in litigation was an asset of the estate with which the administrator had charged himself. After the account current was filed, plaintiff received a share of the estate upon partial distribution thereof by order of the probate court. She made no objection when the inventory of the estate was filed in which the property in dispute was listed as belonging to the estate of James Kinley, nor when a family allowance was made and the property set aside as a homestead for the widow. Doubtless the probate court considered the property in question as belonging to the estate when it made the family allowance to Anna Kinley. The amount of the allowance might have been different had the court known that plaintiff had a deed to a half interest in the property, and thus the interest of the various heirs might have been affected. She delayed action until after the death of the main witness who could testify to facts which would negative her claims.

[2, 3] There is no definite rule as to the length of time that would bar an action on the ground of laches. The peculiar circumstances of each case must be taken into consideration and a large discretion is reposed in the trial judge. The appellate court should not interfere with the conclusion reached by the trial judge, unless it is shown that manifestly an injustice has been done. Pratt v. Pratt, 43 Cal. App. 261, 184 P. 956. We cannot say that the trial court improperly exercised its discretion in the present case.

The disposition which we have made of the contentions of the parties on the subject of laches makes it unnecessary to discuss other points which appellant has presented and by which she contends that certain findings on the subject of the delivery of the deed are not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Gilbert T. House against Walter H. Cook. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Van Lee Hood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Edward Johnson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $10,800 claimed to be due under an express contract for services rendered to defendant in securing a purchaser for real property owned by the defendant. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

The amended complaint upon which the cause was tried alleged that the parties executed a written instrument on January 21, 1922, wherein defendant promised to pay plaintiff $10,800 for services rendered by plaintiff "in connection with the sale by the plaintiff of certain real property," and that no part of said sum had been paid. At the close of plaintiff's case he obtained leave of court to file an amendment to this complaint in which he alleged that the contract had been fully performed, except in so far as performance had been prevented by the defendant. The answer denied the execution of any contract on January 21, 1922, and alleged that on January 23, 1922, he executed a contract with plaintiff, but denied that he promised therein to pay plaintiff any sum for services rendered by plaintiff or that any services had been rendered by him. As a special defense, it was pleaded that on January 18, 1922, the parties executed a contract in writing wherein defendant engaged plaintiff to sell the lands described, and agreed upon the compensation to be paid; that defendant, relying upon plaintiff's representations that they were able and willing purchasers, entered into a contract of sale with parties presented to him by plaintiff; that thereafter, on January 23, 1922, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract providing the manner of payment of compensation to plaintiff, which contract is pleaded in full. This amendment to the answer was filed over objection of the plaintiff after all testimony was in.

The trial court found that no contract was executed on January 21, 1922, as alleged in the complaint; that the defendant executed the contract pleaded in his amendment to his answer on January 23, 1922, but that said contract was not delivered to plaintiff; that plaintiff took possession of it without defendant's knowledge or consent; that it was executed on the part of defendant upon misrepresentation of plaintiff, and was without consideration. It was also found that the purchasers did not pay the sum of $108,950; that they were not at any time ready, willing, and able to purchase the property; and that performance of the contract relied on by the plaintiff was not prevented by the defendant.

Some confusion has arisen because of the two contracts mentioned and because of the frequent amendments to the pleadings, and this confusion has been carried into the findings. Because of this, the appellant has advanced a number of technical points in his attack upon the findings, claiming that the trial court failed to find upon material issues; that the pleadings are inconsistent; and that the findings are inconsistent with the pleadings. We are not disposed to give consideration to the points raised, because it would not avail the plaintiff anything if the findings were changed to meet his demands, as, upon the undisputed facts of the case, the judgment must be affirmed.

These facts are that on January 18, 1922, the parties executed a written contract wherein respondent agreed to pay appellant the sum of $10,800 out of the money coming in from the sale of respondent's property after the sum of $108,950, had been so paid. On January 21st respondent executed a contract of sale of the property to the purchasers secured by appellant upon the terms proposed. On January 23d appellant, upon the representation that his commission contract of January 18th contained an error in the description of the property, presented to respondent another writing which he represented to be the same as the former, except as to this error. The respondent signed this writing on this representation, but without reading it, and left the paper with his contract on January 18th in his office without delivering either to appellant. While he was out of the office, appellant obtained possession of both papers, and appellant later discovered that the writing of January 23d provided for the payment of compensation to appellant after $60,000 had been paid in instead of $108,950, as provided in the original contract. Though the original contract has been lost or destroyed, the undisputed evidence is that it provided no compensation to appellant until $108,950 was paid on the purchase price, and, as the evidence fully sustains the finding as to the manner in which the second paper was signed, the appellant must recover, if at all, upon the original contract of January 18th.

[1] This leaves but a single question of law to be determined—when the broker's contract with the owner provides for the payment of a commission only when a certain portion of the purchase price has been paid to the owner, is he entitled to any compensation for procuring a purchaser if the stipulated portion of the purchase price is not paid? The authorities are uniform that a broker is not entitled to any commission under such circumstances, unless the vendor by his own acts prevents the consummation of the sale or the payment of the stipulated purchase price. Ford v. Brown, 120 Cal. 551, 553, 52 P. 817; Fiske v. Soule, 87 Cal. 313, 323, 25 P. 430; McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 115, 25 P. 266; Beckwith-Anderson L. Co. v. Allison, 26 Cal. App. 473, 476, 147 P. 482.

[2] When, however, a vendor agrees to pay a broker a pro rata commission as payments on the purchase price are made, the entire commission becomes due when the vendor puts it out of his power to receive the stipulated payments. Ratzlaff v. Trainor-Desmond Co., 41 Cal. App. 586, 594, 183 P. 269.

[3] Here the trial court found that the vendor had not prevented or made impossible performance. The evidence is that the contract called for a flat commission of $10,800 when the sum of $108,950 was paid for the property. It did not mention the names of the purchasers procured by appellant, and did not make the commission contingent upon payment of the purchase price by any particular individual. If the vendor and the vendee, by mutual agreement, substituted another vendee, and the latter had paid the stipulated price to the vendor, the appellant would be entitled to his recovery under his contract, but this was an issue which he did not raise by pleading or proof.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by L. H. Bissell against J. Charles King and George W. Lamb, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of King & Co., and King & Co., a copartnership. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Lamb appeals. Affirmed.

Corbet & Selby and W. C. Sharpsteen, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. W. O'Neill, of Oakland, for respondent.

Bradley L. Wallace, of San Francisco, for trustee.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This action is upon a promissory note brought against J. Charles King and George W. Lamb, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of King & Co., and King & Co., a copartnership.

King & Co. is the name of a partnership composed of appellant, Lamb, and the defendant King. The partnership was formed for the purpose of conducting the business of draying. King was to manage the business, but under the articles of copartnership executed November 1, 1906, had no power to incur any indebtedness other than for current expenses. King agreed to keep accurate books of account, which were to be always open to the inspection of appellant, and appellant was not required to devote any of his time to the business. On January 1, 1922, an agreement was entered into by the terms of which appellant agreed to sell to King his interest in the partnership for a specified sum, which was to be paid in installments of not less than $500 a month. King agreed to pay all of the debt and liabilities then existing and all that might be incurred, and to save appellant harmless against such debts and liabilities. It provided that the execution of the agreement should not dissolve the copartnership, and that the same should not be dissolved until the payment of the final installment of the purchase price and the performance of all of the conditions of the agreement, and further provided that King should not contract any obligations other than those incident to the copartnership business.

Subsequent to the execution of this second agreement in January, 1922, Lamb took no part in the business, and the business was managed and carried on by King. In 1922 respondent was told that Lamb had sold his interest in the partnership to King. Concerning this information, respondent testified:

> "I had a conversation with Mr. Lamb concerning his selling out his interest in King & Co. to King. It was in the Ferry building, and he told me he had sold out to King. I absolutely believed his statement. I had no reason to doubt it. Mr. King also told me he had purchased the interest of Lamb in the business. This was shortly after Lamb had given me the information in April or May."

Lamb testified that he recalled having a conversation with respondent in the Ferry building, in which he told respondent he had sold out to King; that he said to respondent, "I have signed a contract to sell to him, but it will take a long time for him to pay for the interest."

[1] Respondent, subsequent to the conversations with Lamb and King concerning the disposal or attempted disposal of Lamb's interest to King, loaned money to King & Co., taking the note of the partnership, and it being—as we held in Jacobson v. Lamb et al. (No. 6194) 267 P. 114, this day decided by this court—a general partnership, bound Lamb as a partner of King, irrespective of whether or not respondent thought Lamb owned an interest in the partnership, as a partner's liability is measured, not by the impression a third party dealing with the partnership may have respecting his interest in the partnership, but is measured by the fact whether or not he is a partner. Thus, in cases of secret partnerships and dormant partners, a creditor is entitled to recover from all the partners when discovered, though the debt was not originally charged to all (Kennedy & Shaw v. Taylor, 3 Cal. Unrep. 697, 31 P. 1122), and even though one partner holds himself out as the sole owner, the ostensible partner is the agent of the dormant one, and the latter is bound by his representations (Willey v. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank, 141 Cal. 508, 75 P. 106).

That Lamb was in fact a partner with King in the firm of King & Co. is not disputed, but it is claimed that the promissory note was made and delivered without the authority, assent, or knowledge of Lamb, and not for the use or benefit of the partnership.

Reverting a moment to the conversation between respondent and Lamb with respect to the sale of Lamb's interest in the business to King, did respondent believe that Lamb had sold his interest to King outright, or did he gather the impression, not that Lamb had sold his interest to King, but that he had agreed to sell it to him when he could pay for it—that King was buying his interest and paying for it in installments, and that it would be a long time before he completed his payments and succeeded to the interest? Appellant stresses the fact that respondent testified that he absolutely believed his statement, and had no reason to doubt it. There is nothing in this statement to lead respondent to believe—as it was Lamb's judgment that it would take King a long time to pay for the interest—that at the time the note here was executed King had succeeded to Lamb's interest, nor would it matter if he had so believed, as it was not a fact, and King had not acquired Lamb's interest up to the time of the commencement of the action.

During the period from January, 1922, up to February 26, 1924, King, in the name of the partnership, executed a number of partnership notes to International Harvester Company without the signature of Lamb. Some of these notes were paid off during that period out of the partnership funds, and some were paid off by Lamb out of the partnership funds after he took charge of the business. During the same period King, in the name of the partnership and without the signature of Lamb, borrowed $10,000 from the Bank of Italy, and gave a King & Co. note therefor. Part of this note was paid by King out of the partnership funds prior to February 26, 1924, when Lamb took charge of the business, and the balance was paid by Lamb out of the partnership funds after he took charge of the business. During that same two-year period King, without the signature of Lamb, purchased equipment from Emmons Drayage Company, and paid for the same out of the partnership funds. During that same period King, in the name of the partnership, and without the signature of Lamb, on four occasions borrowed money from respondent. representing each loan to be for partnership purposes, for which he gave notes signed "King & Co., J. Charles King." Each of such notes was paid by check drawn on the partnership bank account, excepting the last one, which is the subject of this action. During the same period of time Lamb never examined the books nor had them examined. Lamb made no objection at any time to the way King was running the business. After King left, Lamb paid off several notes given by King in the name of the partnership.

The basis of this suit is a promissory note in the sum of $10,000, dated January 22, 1924, payable February 29, 1924, with interest in the sum of $250, signed "King & Co., J. Charles King," which sum so borrowed on such note it is stipulated was deposited in the Bank of California to the account of "King & Company, Copartners." Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, respondent herein, and against the defendants for $10,000, also for attorney's fees—the note provided for attorney's fees—and costs, and from such judgment this appeal is instituted.

Appellant urges the following points on appeal: Respondent dealt with King as an individual and not as an agent of the partnership. Respondent had constructive notice that King had no authority to borrow money and to execute promissory notes therefor. That the partnership was what is known as a nontrading partnership, in which it is presumed that a partner has no authority to execute promissory notes in the firm name. Payment of usurious rates of interest is a circumstance tending to show want of authority. King had no authority under Exhibit 2 (agreement of January 1, 1922) to borrow money and execute promissory notes therefor. Borrowing money and executing promissory notes therefor, except as the act of both parties, was not an incident of the partnership business. The eighth finding must be disregarded. The court erred in its refusal to permit appellant to show that the money loaned by respondent was not used in the partnership business.

The points urged, that the partnership was what is known as a nontrading partnership, in which it is presumed that a partner has no authority to execute promissory notes in the firm name; that King had no authority under the agreement of January 1, 1922, to borrow money and execute promissory notes therefor; that borrowing money and executing promissory notes therefor, except as the act of both parties, was not an incident of the partnership business; and that the court erred in its refusal to permit appellant to show that the money loaned by respondent was not used in the partnership business—are passed upon in Jacobson v. Lamb et al. (No. 6194) 267 P. 114, in which case the facts are similar to the facts here, and wherein the same partnership of King & Co. is involved and the same party is appellant, this day decided by this court, and on the authority of that case the judgment here must be affirmed, unless the other errors assigned call for a reversal.

[2] As to the point urged that respondent dealt with King as an individual and not as an agent of the partnership, it may be said that the record shows that, when King borrowed the money evidenced by the note in this action, he represented to respondent that the money was required to purchase equipment for the partnership, as he had on the previous occasions represented that the money was for partnership purposes when he executed notes in the name of the partnership, and which previous notes were paid by checks signed by the partnership and drawn on the partnership account in the Bank of California, and the note here was signed "King & Co., J. Charles King," and not by King individually. This evidence supports respondent's contention that he dealt with the partnership and not with King individually.

[3] As to appellant's contention that respondent had constructive notice that King had no authority to borrow money and to execute promissory notes therefor, we think the record shows the contrary—that, if respondent had any notice in this respect, it was notice that King had authority. Respondent knew that Lamb and King were and had been partners for a considerable period of time, that King was in charge of the business, and would likely remain in charge for some time to come, as Lamb had told him that he had contracted with King to sell him his interest in the business, but that "it will take a long time for him to pay for the interest."

[4] Appellant's assignment that finding 8 must be disregarded is without merit. The court found in this finding:

> "That in March, 1924, defendant George W. Lamb called plaintiff to his office at the Southern Warehouse Company and advised plaintiff that he had just learned of the said $10,000 loan made by plaintiff on January 22, 1924, and asked to see said note. Thereupon plaintiff showed said note to defendant George W. Lamb, and defendant George W. Lamb then stated to plaintiff that he would see what he could do, and several weeks later defendant George W. Lamb stated to plaintiff that he (Lamb) was going to protect plaintiff in said note."

Appellant asserts that a reading of this finding shows that it is merely a recital of the testimony given by respondent, and is not a finding of any ultimate fact; that the court did not see fit to construe respondent's testimony that Lamb told him that he was going to protect him in the note as a promise to pay the note and make a specific finding of such promise. Appellant, however, concedes that, under the well-settled rule, if the recital establishes a promise on the part of appellant to pay the note, this court may so construe the statement. Appellant further urges that, unless appellant is liable on the note as a partner, the promise to pay—assuming that there was a promise—is not only unenforceable as being an oral promise to pay the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, but is without consideration, and cites us to Comstock v. Breed, 12 Cal. 286, and Marinovich v. Kilburn, 153 Cal. 638, 642, 96 P. 303. The former authority deals with the question of consideration and the promise by one person to pay the debt of another, and the latter with the inability of one bound by contract to shift the burden of his obligation by assigning the contract and the assignee consenting to the assignment without the consent of the party entitled to the benefits. While finding 8 does not find as an ultimate fact that Lamb in direct words promised to pay the note, yet, from the finding that defendant Lamb stated to plaintiff "that he was going to protect plaintiff in said note," the payment of the note is the ultimate fact that necessarily results therefrom, and the promise to pay the note or see that it is paid is the only promise that can be implied from the protection promised, and therefore such finding is sufficient. Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 556; Mott v. Ewing, 90 Cal. 231, 27 P. 194; Alhambra Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 P. 379; Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 18 Cal. App. 349, 123 P. 219.

[5] Even had King no authority to bind Lamb by the note in question, the testimony of respondent, which supports the finding quoted is that Lamb, after the disappearance of King and with full knowledge of the facts in regard to the loan, and after seeing the note, said he would see what he could do, and later stated that he would protect him in the note, is a ratification of the act of King in signing the firm name to the note.

Ratification may be either express or implied. Here we have both. Lamb not only failed to repudiate the note when he knew the facts, but expressly agreed to take care of respondent. "Where an agent is authorized to do an act, and he transcends his authority, it is the duty of the principal to repudiate the act as soon as he is fully informed of what has been thus done in his name, * * * else he will be bound by the act as having ratified it by implication." Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 303, 32 P. 243.

This disposes of the points urged by appellant, with the exception of the one with relation to the payment of usurious interest, which we do not deem it necessary to discuss.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALPETRO PRODUCERS' SYNDICATE et al. v. CHAS. M. WOODS CO. (Civ. 6156.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 2, 1928.

1. Evidence 🔑417(12)—Parol evidence held admissible to show warranty of title under conditional sales contract containing no express warranty (Civ. Code, §§ 1763, 1765).

In action to recover value of personalty for breach of warranty of title under conditional sales contract containing no express warranty or direct statement of ownership, parol evidence as to knowledge and understanding of parties as disclosed by negotiations between parties, resulting in conditional sales contract for purpose of determining existence of warranty of title as prescribed by Civ. Code, §§ 1763, 1765, was properly admitted.

2. Sales 🔑441(2)—Evidence held to support finding that seller of drilling outfit did not expressly or impliedly warrant title under conditional sales contract.

In action to recover value of drilling outfit for breach of warranty of title, finding that seller did not expressly or impliedly warrant title held supported by evidence showing that seller terminated conditional sales contract with third person defaulting in payments, that plaintiff accepted conditional sales contract with knowledge of third person's default, and that seller took possession under agreement with plaintiff, who expressed satisfaction with seller's title.

3. Sales 🔑441(3)—Evidence held not to warrant admission of judgment in bankruptcy proceedings of conditional buyer to show conditional seller's breach of warranty of title, where seller was not sufficiently notified of proceedings.

Where defendant, terminating conditional sales contract to purchase drilling outfit with third party conducting drilling operations for plaintiff, entered into new conditional sales contract with plaintiff for sale of machinery, and defendant had only general information that bankruptcy proceeding against third party voluntarily initiated by plaintiff was pending in federal court, and was not notified by plaintiff that trustee in bankruptcy of third party was asserting title and right to possession of machinery, and plaintiff did not request defendant to defend bankruptcy proceeding, defendant did not have such notice of bankruptcy proceedings or of plaintiff's petition to reclaim property from trustee as would warrant introduction to show a breach of warranty of title by defendant, in plaintiff's action for breach of warranty of title, of judgment in bankruptcy proceeding determining that third party's rights to machinery were not terminated, and that contract was equitable assignment of defendant's claims; such judgment not being conclusive against defendant.

4. Sales 🔑441(3)—Seller held not bound by judgment in bankruptcy proceedings merely because its officer was called as witness as regards breach of warranty of title.

That officer of corporation, entering into conditional sales contract, was called as witness in hearing before referee in bankruptcy of previous conditional buyer, was not sufficient to make judgment obtained in bankruptcy proceedings binding on corporation sued by second conditional buyer for breach of warranty of title, where such officer was not permitted to testify as to steps taken by him on behalf of corporation in retaking possession of property.

5. Sales 🔑441(3)—Judgment in bankruptcy proceeding held not prima facie evidence of paramount title against conditional seller, not party thereto, sued for breach of warranty of title.

In action to recover value of personalty purchased under conditional sales contract for breach of warranty of title, contention that judgment of federal court in bankruptcy proceedings of previous conditional buyer to which defendant seller was not a party is prima facie evidence against defendant as to paramount title, and that burden is on defendant to show that it is incorrect, cannot be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by the Calpetro Producers' Syndicate, a partnership, and others, against the Chas. M. Woods Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, Walter Hoffman, and Philip H. Angell, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Hyams & Himrod, of Los Angeles, and Frank English, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MURPHEY, Justice pro tem. In this action the plaintiff is seeking to recover the value, because of an alleged breach of warranty of title, of certain personal property purchased from the defendant. It asks for approximately $15,000, being the value, as it contends, of the property either at the time of the alleged breach or at the time of the judgment.

A somewhat extended statement of the facts involved in this transaction is necessary in order to arrive at an intelligent understanding and determination of the questions of law involved. The Woods Company, defendant and respondent corporation, was engaged in the business of selling oil-drilling machinery. In January, 1923, it sold to one O'Hea, under a conditional sales contract, the property involved in this action. O'Hea was under contract with the plaintiff and appellant corporation to drill oil wells on two leases designated as well No. 1 on the Fleming lease, and well No. 2 on the Barnes lease; the drilling machinery in dispute being located on the last-named property. O'Hea became involved in difficulties in his drilling operations, and was in default in the payments to the Woods Company on the sales contract. In March, 1923, Smith, secretary and treasurer of the defendant corporation, went to the scene of operations, and, in the presence of representatives of the plaintiff, informed O'Hea that, unless he cleared up the default payments on the contract, he (Smith) would take possession of the drilling machinery, and remove it from the field of operation. In a discussion that ensued, O'Hea stated that he could not continue operations, and the representative of the plaintiff requested Smith not to disturb the machinery. A conference between plaintiff and defendant was arranged for the next day, and several such conferences thereafter were held, at which the entire subject-matter of O'Hea's indebtedness was discussed, and the terms and conditions of the conditional sales contract were also considered and discussed. Pending these negotiations, and on the 20th day of March, O'Hea suspended operations, and on the following morning the plaintiff reemployed the men who had theretofore been working for O'Hea, and resumed operations on the well with the machinery and the equipment connected therewith. This possession then taken by plaintiff has never been disturbed, unless, as contended by respondent, the acts of the trustee in bankruptcy, hereinafter referred to, amount to a dispossession. In any event, it is a stipulated fact that the plaintiff or its representatives has been in the physical possession of all of the machinery at all times since its abandonment by O'Hea.

After lengthy discussions of O'Hea's indebtedness both to plaintiff and defendant in March, 1923, the negotiations resulted in defendant assigning for cash certain contracts with O'Hea and other indebtedness against O'Hea to plaintiff. As to the property in question, a different procedure was agreed upon. Andrews, an attorney and coplaintiff, participated in these negotiations with several of his coplaintiffs. It was agreed that the Woods Company should send written notification to O'Hea terminating his contract for the purchase of the property; that it should place a keeper in charge to prevent the removal of any of the property by O'Hea; that plaintiff should continue in the operation of the property; and that, when these things were done, and they were done on or about the 27th day of March, 1923, Mr. Andrews for himself and his coplaintiff said they would take a conditional sales contract from the defendant, and would be satisfied with the title thereto so obtained. Under such conditions, the conditional sales contract involved in this action was consummated and executed. The defendant selected an employee of the plaintiff as its representative in charge of the property. In April, 1923, O'Hea, represented by Andrews, one of the coplaintiffs, filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, returning in his inventory the property here in question as one of his principal assets. Subsequently a person claiming to represent the trustee in bankruptcy nailed a sign on the derrick, the exact language is not disclosed, claiming the property as belonging to the estate of the bankrupt. No other acts were performed in this connection, and no change of possession or management of the property was attempted. Thereafter the plaintiff, while asserting dominion over the property and operating it, voluntarily brought a proceeding in the bankruptcy court entitled a "Petition for Order of Reclamation from Trustee." The matter was brought to issue, and the referee, after a hearing, decided on the evidence before him that the right of O'Hea had not been terminated; that the conditional sales contract was in effect an equitable assignment of the defendant's claims; and that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the possession of the property, subject, however, to his repayment to the plaintiff within five days, the amount remaining due and unpaid to defendant on account of money advanced by it for the purchase price of the machinery. This determination by the referee was affirmed on appeal by the federal District Court. Subsequently the plaintiff herein purchased at trustee's sale the property involved in this action and all other property of the bankrupt's estate. Judgment in the trial court went for the defendant, and plaintiffs appealed.

On the statement of facts above set out the appellants contend: (1) That the written contract of sale between plaintiff and defendant gave rise to an express warranty of title; (2) that it gave rise to an implied warranty of title; (3) the court admitted in evidence the oral negotiations between the parties prior to the execution of the bill of sale, which action it is claimed is erroneous; (4) that the findings, even admiting parol evidence, failed to show that the warranty of title was waived by appellant; (5) that, in case of breach of warranty of title, a judgment recovered against the would-be buyer by the paramount owner is conclusive upon the warrantor where he was notified of the suit or where he had an opportunity to defend it or where he appeared as a witness in the litigation; (6) that, even where the warrantor had no notice of suit or opportunity to appear as a witness, the judgment is prima facie evidence aganst the warrantor, and he has the burden to show that the judgment was incorrect; (7) that the judgment of the referee as affirmed by the United States District Court was correct, together with other matters set out by appellant which will be considered in the course of the discussion where applicable.

The conditional sales contract between plaintiff and defendant contained the following language with reference to title:

> "(2) This proposal is made upon the following conditions: Title—That the title and ownership of the property herein specified shall remain in this company until final payment therefor has been made in full, * * * the title to said property shall not pass until such notes so given or extensions thereof, or such judgments taken, are fully paid in money and satisfied. This company shall have the right to discount or transfer any of said notes, and the title or right of possession in and to said property shall pass thereby to the legal holder of said notes.
> "(3) You shall at all times take such legal steps as may be required by the laws of the state in which said equipment, or any part thereof, may be situate for the preservation of this company's title as herein provided.
> "(5) It is expressly understood that this proposal made in duplicate contains all agreements pertaining to the property herein specified, there being no verbal understanding whatsoever."

It will be observed that the writing contains no express words of warranty of title and no direct statement of ownership. In support of his contention, appellant quotes from 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1300, p. 1120:

> "It is also everywhere agreed that, in a sale of a specific and ascertained chattel, any affirmation by the seller that the chattel is his is equivalent to an express warranty of title; and that this affirmation may be implied from his conduct as well as from his words, and may also result from the nature and circumstances of the sale."

From the same author, volume 2, § 1236, p. 1070:

> "Direct assertions or positive representations as to title, quality or condition, express stipulations concerning the description of the goods, explicit declarations that the negotiations are conditioned upon the existence of given attributes, capacities or characteristics, and the like, are a few of the many illustrations furnished by the cases of affirmations constituting express warranties within the foregoing rule."

Section 1763, Civil Code of the state of California, is as follows:

> "A warranty is an engagement by which a seller assures to a buyer the existence of some fact affecting the transaction, whether past, present, or future."

Section 1765 of the same Code provides:

> "One who sells or agrees to sell personal property, as his own, thereby warrants that he has a good and unincumbered title thereto."

Counsel quotes from Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573:

> "We think the court erred in instructing the jury that the contract contained no warranty, and in taking from them the question whether there had been a breach of the warranty. It is certain that no particular words are necessary to create a warranty. Any affirmation made at the time of sale as to the quality or condition of the thing sold will be treated as a warranty if it was so intended. * * *
> "'To create an express warranty the word warrant need not be used, nor is any precise form of expression necessary, but every affirmation, at the time of the sale of personal chattels, amounts to a warranty. * * * No expression of an opinion, however strong, would import a warranty. But if the vendor at the time of sale affirms a fact as to the essential qualities of his goods in clear and definite language, and the purchaser buys on the faith of such affirmation, that we think is an express warranty. * * *'"

Other citations are made from Firth v. Richter, 49 Cal. App. 545, 196 P. 277, and Brock v. Newmark Grain Co., Inc., 64 Cal. App. 577, 222 P. 195.

[1, 2] If under the peculiar circumstances of this case parol evidence was not admissible as to the knowledge and understanding of the parties as disclosed by the negotiations between the parties which resulted in the conditional sales contract, the position of the appellant would no doubt be impregnable. However, in view of the absence of any express words of warranty or direct statement of ownership, we are of the opinion that the ruling of the trial court in admitting this testimony over the objection of the plaintiff must be sustained. The court specifically found:

> "That defendant at no time, either expressly or impliedly, warranted the title to said personal property or to any part or portion thereof, but that the plaintiffs, well knowing the facts as above found, agreed to accept, and did accept, whatever title defendant had in and to said personal property, without any express or implied warranty of title, and plaintiffs expressly waived any express or implied warranty of title as to said personal property and the whole thereof."

This finding is amply supported by evidence admitted over appellant's objection on the trial of the action.

With respect to the value of opinions and recitals as constituting warranty, we find in 35 Cyc. 375, the following:

> "The rule is broadly stated in most decisions that a mere affirmation does not constitute a warranty unless shown to be so intended and understood by the parties, and not as a mere matter of opinion; that in the contract of warranty there must be an agreement of the minds of the contracting parties as in all other contracts. * * * The true aim in construing every agreement, that of warranty included, is of course to reach the real intention of the parties to it. * * * It has been said that the decisive test in determining whether the affirmation was intended as a warranty is whether the seller assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the seller has no special knowledge and on which the buyer may also be expected to have an opinion and to exercise his judgment. In the former case there is a warranty, in the latter, not."

24 Ruling Case Law, par. 455, p. 184, reads as follows:

"A warranty of title is annexed by law to a sale of personalty only where there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to rebut that presumption. This implication is rebutted where it is shown that the seller expressly refused to warrant, and that the purchaser agreed to take the risk of the goodness of the title, and oral evidence is admissible, though the contract of sale is in writing, to show that an implied warranty of title was expressly excluded. So where the seller expressly sells only such right as he may have no warranty of title will be implied, and the same has been held true where one sells simply his 'right, title and interest,' and generally where the facts are equally known to both parties, and the sale is made under circumstances indicating that the seller intends only to transfer his interest."

With respect to this last citation in the instant case, there can be no doubt that, at the time of the purchase of the property by the plaintiffs, they, as purchasers, were fully advised as to the exact condition of the defendant's title.

In 62 Am. Dec. 465, is the following language:

"The presumption of warranty of title is annexed by law to a sale of personalty only where there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to rebut that presumption. The warranty is implied only where good faith requires that it should be."

Williston on Sales (2d Ed.) § 219, provides:

"Whether the seller is in or out of possession there can be no doubt that by appropriate words he may sell simply such interest as he may have in the property. The intent to limit the seller's undertaking to a mere quitclaim may be expressed not only by an agreement in terms to sell such interest as the seller has, but otherwise, as by a refusal to warrant title. The nature of the seller's right may also be known to the buyer and may be of such doubtful character that it must be assumed the parties intended to buy and sell, only such title as the seller had."

In Croly v. Pollard, 71 Mich. 612, at page 615, 39 N. W. 853, 854, the court said:

"There is no doubt, I apprehend, but that a sale of personal property implies an affirmation by the vendor that the property is his, and he therefore warrants the title, unless it is shown by the facts and circumstances accompanying the sale that the vendor did not intend to assert ownership, but only to transfer such interest as he might have in the property."

2 Mechem on Sales, p. 1127, § 1309, states:

"The implied warranty of title being one which the law imputes to the seller by reason of the circumstances under which the sale was made, and in furtherance of good faith, it follows necessarily that if those circumstances are absent, or if, though certain of them are present, there are others which show more clearly that the implied warranty was excluded, or that good faith does not require it, it will not arise. If, therefore, the seller expressly refuses to warrant the title, and the buyer agrees to take his chances; or if the seller expressly sells simply such interest as he has; or if the origin and character of the seller's title are fully known to the buyer, and the seller simply parts with whatever title he himself acquired—in these and like cases, for obvious reasons, no warranty will be implied."

In two cases the Supreme Court of this state has expressly upheld the introduction of oral testimony to determine the existence or nonexistence of express or implied warranties. In the case of Miller v. Van Tassel, 24 Cal. 459, which case is cited by appellant, the court says:

"The plaintiff urges that there being a bill of sale of the property, the warranty of title arising by implication attaches itself to the writing, and becomes a part of the written instrument, and thus is subject to the rule of law forbidding an instrument of writing to be contradicted by parol testimony. There is much force in the point, but in our opinion it is untenable. No case is cited by the respondent directly to the point, and it is doubtful if any well adjudged case can be found sustaining that doctrine."

In the case of Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 P. 625, the Supreme Court, in discussing the case of Miller v. Van Tassel, supra, said:

"The vendor of personal property in his possession warrants his title to the same by implication. And whether such sale be by written bill of sale, or oral, the implied warranty of title may be rebutted by parol, that is to say, the vendor may overcome the legal presumption by proof that he did not warrant the title. Miller v. Van Tassel, 24 Cal. 459. In such case the vendor does not add to the terms expressed in the writing, but he only rebuts a legal presumption, not itself expressed in writing, but arising from that which is expressed."

In 22 California Jurisprudence, § 11, p. 916, the two cases last above cited are given as authority in support of the following proposition:

"In defense of the action the seller may show that he refused to warrant title to the property, and that the transfer was made pursuant to an understanding that the buyer took the property at his own risk. Nor is evidence to this effect objectionable by reason of the fact that the seller executed a bill of sale—the case not being within the rule which forbids the introduction of extrinsic evidence to contradict the parties' written contract. The proof of oral agreement is held not to affect the terms of the writing, but only to rebut the legal presumption of warranty which arises from the fact of the sale."

To the same effect is 22 Corpus Juris, p. 1097, § 1454, and 22 Corpus Juris, p. 1261, § 1681. It is said in section 1681:

> "Parol evidence which does not contradict the express terms of a record or instrument in writing is usually held to be admissible to rebut a presumption or implication which would or might otherwise arise therefrom, or to oppose a conclusion of fact which it tends, as circumstantial evidence, to establish."

Counsel for appellant attempts to distinguish the determination of this subject-matter as outlined in the cases of Miller v. Van Tassel and Johnson v. Powers, but in our opinion, in cases of this character, until such time as the Supreme Court shall expressly overrule the doctrine contained in those cases, we see no reason for departing therefrom. This determination is, in the absence of an express warranty, logical, just, and fair. It seems to us that it would be a strange distortion of the law of implied warranty to hold that a purchaser who is fully cognizant of the exact status of the seller's title, fully aware, as a result of a prolonged discussion participated in and dominated by its attorney, of any defects and infirmities in the seller's title, should be permitted, when complications arise with reference to the title to the purchased property, to assert that he was induced to purchase the property by reason of his reliance on such implied warranties. It seems to us that, if there ever was a case in which the trial court would be justified in permitting parol evidence to determine the existence of any kind of a warranty title, this case, in view of all the circumstances, falls clearly within that category.

If this conclusion is correct, the evidence introduced at the trial of the action fully warrants and supports the finding of the trial court that no warranty, either expressed or implied, was given by the defendant to the plaintiff upon the sale of the personal property involved in this controversy. In this connection the court found:

> "That it was understood and agreed by and between plaintiffs and defendant that the defendant should take possession of said personal property and place a man in charge thereof, and that notice should be given to the said O'Hea declaring a termination of the rights of said O'Hea under said contract because of the failure of said O'Hea to comply with the terms of said contract. That, in pursuance of said agreement and understanding, defendant did take possession of said personal property, and did place one Thomas Eckman in charge thereof, and did notify the said O'Hea in writing that defendant had elected, and did elect, to terminate all his rights under said contract because of the failure of said O'Hea to comply therewith.
> "That prior to said 3d day of April, 1923, plaintiffs expressly agreed with the defendant that, if said defendant would take the action above set forth in regard to the termination and foreclosure of the rights of said O'Hea under said contract, that the said plaintiffs would purchase the said personal property and would be satisfied with the title thereto so obtained."

The plaintiffs question sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings and quote elaborately from the record, but in our opinion the most that can be said of this contention is that it is an attempt to resolve a conflict in the evidence against the finding and judgment of the trial court.

The next contention of the appellant is that, where one is liable over to another as in case of warranty of title, a judgment recovered against the would-be buyer of the paramount title owner is conclusive upon the warrantor where he was notified of the suit or where he had an opportunity to defend it or where he appeared as a witness in the litigation. With respect to this issue the trial court specifically found:

> "That the only knowledge which defendant had of said bankruptcy proceedings or of any of the proceedings or actions taken therein was the general information that a bankruptcy proceeding was pending in the federal court and before the referee in bankruptcy, and that a hearing was had before the referee in bankruptcy on or about April 28, 1923, at which hearing J. A. Smith, secretary and treasurer of the Charles M. Woods Company, was called as a witness and was asked questions regarding steps taken by him on behalf of his company in retaking possession of said personal property, but was not allowed to answer questions so propounded.
> "That the plaintiffs did not at any time prior to the commencement of this action notify the defendant that the trustee in bankruptcy was asserting title and right to possession of said property, nor of the nature of the proceedings in bankruptcy court with relation to the title to said property, and did not at any time request or demand that defendant appear in said proceeding, and did not request or demand that the defendant defend said proceeding, and did not at any time give or offer to give the defendant an opportunity to so defend, or notify it that if it did not defend it would be held responsible for any damage or detriment suffered by plaintiffs."

It may be stated further that the record discloses in this contention that defendant Smith was notified of the proceeding or requested to be present as a witness in the bankrupt proceedings not more than three or four days prior to the time he appeared as such witness.

[3] In view of these findings, concerning which, however, there is sharp conflict in the evidence, we think that the law is clear that the defendant had no such notice of the trial or proceeding or hearing of the petition to reclaim or of the issues involved therein before the referee in the bankruptcy (which proceeding was voluntarily instituted and initiated by the plaintiff herein) as would warrant the introduction of the judgment roll in that proceeding in the present case to bind the defendant. The leading case in California, and a case relied upon by appellant, is that of Pezel v. Yerex, 56 Cal. App. 304, 205 P. 475. In that case the record discloses that the party against whom the judgment roll was introduced was informed by letter as follows:

> "You are therefore notified that in the event the said E. S. Faxon is successful in his suit against me, that I shall institute suit against you to recover the amount recovered against me. Of course, these two trials mean additional court costs and attorneys' fees, while I believe that a good settlement could be made at this time. I would advise that you secure the services of an attorney and take such action as seems appropriate in the action against me."

The letter further stated:

> "I would therefore suggest that you consult your attorney with a view of negotiating a settlement and obviate the additional costs as well as to take such action as he deems advisable in the pending suit. Will you kindly advise me of your decision in the matter."

The defendant paid no attention whatever to either of the above-mentioned letters, and the question arose of the admissibility of the judgment roll in the Faxon case. The court said:

> "The decisions upon the question as to the sufficiency of such notices are varied, extending from those which hold that mere notice of the pendency of the action will suffice (of which Drennan v. Bunn [124 Ill. 175, 16 N. E. 100, 7 Am. St. Rep. 354], supra, is an example), to those holding that the defendant in the action must give unequivocal, express, and certain notice to the person who is responsible over, requiring the latter to defend the suit, or giving him an opportunity to do so. Consolidated, etc., Co. v. Bradley, 171 Mass. 127 (68 Am. St. Rep. 409, 50 N. E. 464), a case involving a warranty of title to land, is a fair example of those cases which hold that the warrantor must be requested to come in and defend the action, or be given an opportunity to do so. Our attention has not been called to any decision in this state that is directly in point. We shall assume, however, that in this state the rule is every whit as strict as that announced by the Massachusetts court in Consolidated, etc., Co. v. Bradley, supra. There the court employed the following language in announcing the rule: 'Whatever may be the form of such a notice, we think that, under the circumstances in which it is given, it should call upon the person notified to come in and defend the suit, or should offer him an opportunity of doing so. * * * The decisions of different courts in this country are not uniform upon the requirements of such a notice, but the weight of authority in this commonwealth is that the notice must be such in substance as to give the person notified information that he is called upon to come in and defend the suit, or that he is given an opportunity to do so, and that if he does not defend it he will be held responsible for the result.' * * * We think that the notices given in the instant case meet the most exacting requirements. * * * In one letter he is urged to take such action in the suit brought by Faxon as seems 'appropriate'; in the other he is advised to take such action 'in the pending suit' as his attorney 'deems advisable.' By these letters the defendant was unequivocally invited to take any action in the pending suit that he or his counsel might deem appropriate or advisable. By this broad invitation defendant clearly was given an opportunity to come in and defend. More than that was not necessary. See Boston v. Worthington, 10 Gray [Mass.] 496, [71 Am. Dec. 678]."

The general rule, as gleaned from the textbooks, may fairly be expressed by what is said in 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 449:

> "It seems, however, upon the principle that no one shall be condemned or made answerable without an opportunity to defend, that in order to bind one by a judgment to which he is not a party, he should be allowed all the means of defense open to him had he been made a party; and that a nominal party wishing to bind by a judgment one not a party to the action must not only notify him of its pendency, but give him to understand that he is desired to defend it, and will be allowed such control as may be essential to his defense. A notice which merely indicates that the person liable over is expected 'to assist' in the conduct of the defense, is insufficient since it implies that the indemnitee intends to retain control."

The nearest approach to a definite and specific determination of the rule in this state is found in the case of Pezel v. Yerex, 56 Cal. App. 304, 205 P. 475, above cited. This case, as above stated, is cited by appellant, but, in view of the findings of the court as to the notice the defendant had of the proceedings in the federal court, it would seem that one must indulge in an abundance of optimism to find support for its contention in the reasoning of that case. The court by the strongest implication adopts the rule announced by the Massachusetts case, as between which and the instant case, with respect to the sufficiency of notice, there is no reasonable ground for comparison. The notice in the Massachusetts case, 171 Mass. 127, 50 N. E. 464, 68 Am. St. Rep. 409, which was deemed insufficient by that court, was in the following words:

> "The suit of Tierney v. Consolidated Hand-Method Lasting Machine Company for the death of John Tierney, January 1, 1891, when he was killed, the result of touching or holding the electric light apparatus in the room occupied by the machine company, where the electricity was furnished by you, will come on for trial on Monday next, in the second session of the superior court. We hope and expect to be able to win the case and thus relieve the parties from liability. In case, however, we should be beaten, we shall look to you to recompense the machine company; and we shall expect you to assist in the conduct of the defense of the case."

In holding this notice insufficient, that court stated:

> "Whatever may be the form of such a notice, we think that, under the circumstances, in which it is given, it should call upon the person notified to come in and defend the suit, or should offer him an opportunity of doing so. The party notifying cannot insist upon retaining control of the defense, and yet hold the party notified bound by the result of the suit."

[4] It seems to be the contention of the plaintiffs that the mere fact that an officer of the defendant was called as a witness in the hearing before the referee in bankruptcy is all that is required to make any judgment obtained in that action binding upon the defendant. In this connection 2 Black on Judgments, § 569, states:

> "We have said that the warrantor must have notice of the action against his grantee, in order to be bound by the result. By this is meant a notification proceeding from the latter. Merely that he knew of the action and talked about it, and intimated that he had evidence which would defeat it, is not enough. And the mere fact that a person testifies as a witness on the trial of a suit is not sufficient evidence that he had such legal notice as the law intends him to receive, in order to be bound by the judgment."

Section 449a of Freeman on Judgments is as follows:

> "The necessity of proof of such a notice cannot be avoided by showing that the warrantor sought to be bound, was a witness, or knew and talked of the action, said he had an agreement which would defeat it, and was informed of the time and place of the trial."

[5] It is further contended by the appellant that the judgment of the federal court, if not conclusive, is prima facie evidence against the defendant as to paramount title, and that the burden is placed upon the respondent to show that it is incorrect. In support of this contention the appellant does not cite any California cases. It may be stated that the authorities are not harmonious as to the correctness of their disposition. There are no California cases in point, but we are satisfied that the weight of authority is adverse to the appellants' contentions. In the case of Council Improvement Co. v. Pacific & Idaho Co., 29 Idaho, 113, 157 P. 258, a suit for damages for breach of warranty of title of real estate, the question arose as to whether a judgment in a case in which the defendant was not a party, and of which the defendant had no notice, was prima facie evidence of a paramount title in the party prevailing in such suit. The court decided that such judgment was prima facie evidence, and the Supreme Court of Idaho reversed that judgment. It stated:

> "While considerable diversity of opinion may be found in the adjudicated cases upon this question, the weight of authority supports the rule stated in Devlin on Deeds, vol. 2, § 937, as follows:
> " 'Of course, such a judgment cannot bind the covenantor. The only question that can arise is one of evidence. It has been asserted that, although the defendant might inquire into the merits of the judgment, yet it was prima facie evidence of the existence of a paramount title. But the most reasonable rule, and the one sustained by authorities, is that the judgment, where no notice has been given, and the covenantor is not a party to the suit, is not even prima facie evidence that the eviction was founded upon an adverse and paramount title.' "

The same rule was announced in Black on Judgments in volume 2, § 571.

In Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213, the court said:

> "Of the action the defendant received no legal notice, and the judgment cannot, therefore, be evidence against him of a paramount title in Larkin. Mere cognizance of the existence of the action is not notice in the legal sense. To be available, the notice must apprise the party whose rights are to be affected, of what is required of him and the consequences which may follow if he neglect to defend the action."

This case was cited with approval in the case of Sampson et al. v. Ohleyer, 22 Cal. 200.

Furthermore, in this connection the trial court found:

> "That prior to said April 3, 1923, said defendant took possession of said personal property, and foreclosed all rights of said O'Hea under said contract, and on said April 3, 1923, said J. E. O'Hea had no right, title, or interest in or to said personal property.
> "That plaintiffs were on said April 3, 1923, and for a long time prior thereto had been, the owners of a certain oil lease of certain real property in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and prior to said April 3, 1923, had entered into a contract with the said J. E. O'Hea for the drilling of an oil well on the property covered by said lease. That said personal property described in said contract so attached to the complaint herein was used by said O'Hea prior and up to March 21, 1923, in the drilling of said oil well. That on said March 21, 1923, said plaintiffs took possession of said personal property and evicted said O'Hea from said premises.
> "That * * * plaintiffs knew that the said defendant had retaken possession of said personal property and had foreclosed and terminated all the rights of the said O'Hea thereunder, and in and to the personal property described therein, and at all said times plaintiffs had full and complete knowledge of all the facts concerning and connected with the retaking of possession of said personal property by defendant herein and of the termination and foreclosure of all the rights of the said O'Hea under said contract and in and to the property described therein, and plaintiffs were at all times familiar with, and knew, each and every action and proceeding taken by the defendant in the retaking of the possession of said personal property and in the termination and foreclosure of the rights of said O'Hea under said contract."

And the court further found that with a full knowledge of all these facts the plaintiffs agreed to purchase the said personal property, and that they would be satisfied with the title thereto so obtained.

There is evidence in the record to support all of these findings, contradictory though it may be. It may be further stated in this respect that O'Hea abandoned the property and machinery on the 20th day of March, 1923, which was prior to the time when the defendant took possession by placing an employee of plaintiff in charge; that subsequently thereto O'Hea told the representative of the defendant Smith that he realized that he was in default, and that he was willing to give up the property; this was prior to the petition in the bankruptcy proceedings.

There is an elaborate discussion in the record as to whether the federal court had jurisdiction to try and determine, in the action between the plaintiff herein and the bankrupt estate, the question involving the title to the property described in the complaint. In view of the conclusions hereinbefore reached, however, it would seem to be unnecessary to determine the question.

It follows from the foregoing that the judgment of the trial court was correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAFLINGER. (Cr. 1618.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚷1158(4)—Judge's determination of admissibility of confession on conflicting evidence should not be disturbed on appeal.

Trial judge held under duty to determine admissibility of confession, and conclusion, based on conflicting evidence as to whether confession was free and voluntary, should not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Criminal law ⚷660—Trial during short absence of defendant's counsel held not error without court being notified of necessity for absence or requested to delay or to strike evidence.

Where defendant's attorney was absent for short period during first day of trial, though attorney for other defendants was present, and court directed counsel to show absent attorney portion of testimony read to jury, and counsel did not notify court of any necessity for his absence, nor request delay or present motion to strike out evidence received in his absence, court did not err in proceeding with trial, in absence of defendant's counsel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Wilfred Haflinger was convicted of robbery in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh Dickson, Ben S. Hunter, and James Farraher, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Appellant was found guilty by a jury of the crime of robbery in the second degree. One Guy Sweinhart was walking with a lady along the ocean front between Venice and Ocean Park about 9:15 p. m. on October 12, 1927, when he was robbed at the point of a revolver in the hands of Melton Ball. The appellant, Ball, and one Russell, were jointly accused of the crime. Sweinhart testified that, as he walked along he saw three men ahead of him leaning over the railing by the sidewalk. As he passed them, one of the three, identified as the defendant Ball, drew the weapon, placed it against the witness' stomach, and took his watch and a small amount of cash. The witness could not identify the other two men.

In his brief appellant states:

> "So the issues narrow themselves down to the questions: Whether the confession introduced was free and voluntary, and whether the court erred in proceeding with the trial in the absence of appellant's counsel and without seeking appellant's permission to so do."

[1] Evidence was introduced by the prosecution to prove the confession was free and voluntary, while evidence to the contrary was presented by the defendants. It was the duty of the trial judge to determine the admissibility of the confession, and his conclusion, based upon conflicting evidence, should not be disturbed on appeal. People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 214 P. 657; People v. Grafft, 61 Cal. App. 7, 214 P. 273. Appellant points out that the testimony of Officer Steckel, given at the preliminary examination, was read to the jury, in which Steckel stated that officer Ross had held out certain promises to the defendant, Ball. It was established by Officer Ross, however, that his statement to Ball had been made after the other two defendants had signed the confession. He testified:

> "Did that conversation take place after this statement was made which the defendants Haflinger and Russell signed, or prior to that time? A. Why, as I recall the statement I made, I talked to Ball after the statements were made and signed by the other two boys. He refused to sign it.

"Q. After Ball refused to sign it? A. After he refused to sign it."

[2] Appellant was represented by Attorney Dickson, and the other two defendants were represented by Attorney Clay. The record discloses that during the first day of the trial both lawyers were present. At the opening of the session of the following day Mr. Clay was present, but Mr. Dickson was absent for a short period. The court proceeded with the trial, and, when Mr. Dickson arrived, directed counsel to show him the part of the testimony of Officer Steckel that had been read to the jury. Mr. Dickson remarked that he "had to be in federal court." The record discloses that counsel for appellant did not notify the court of any necessity for his absence during the short period of the session. No request for delay was made, and no motion was presented to strike out the evidence received in his absence. In State v. Newman (S. C.) 80 S. E. 482, the rule is properly stated:

> "It is true appellant's counsel was absent during a part of the charge, upon what he thought was a necessary absence. But the proper practice is for counsel to ask permission to be absent, and request the court to suspend, stating the necessity; because it is for the court and not counsel to determine the necessity."

The judgment is affirmed.

HILLIKER v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OR CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF SEAL BEACH et al. (Civ. 5982.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 28, 1928.

1. Mandamus 🔑154(6), 182—Municipal corporations 🔑159(1)—Recall petitions, petition for writ of mandate, and writ itself, held not insufficient for referring to officers sought to be recalled as "member of board of trustees," "city trustees," and "city councilmen" (St. 1927, p. 1093, § 1; St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 128).

Under St. 1927, p. 1093, § 1, amending section 751 of "an act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations," which provides that government of city shall be vested in "a board of five trustees to be known as the city council," recall petitions, petition for writ of mandate, and writ itself were not insufficient because they referred to officer sought to be recalled as "member of the board of trustees of said city," and as "board of trustees or the city council," and to individuals as "city trustees or city councilmen," in absence of anything in statute requiring petition to contain exact official designation of officer sought to be removed, and since St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 128, does not require such degree of particularity.

2. Officers 🔑70½—Statute providing for recall of elective officials should be liberally construed.

Statute providing for recall of elective officers should receive a liberal construction, so as to promote the purposes for which it was enacted.

3. Appeal and error 🔑440—Trial court had inherent power, after appeal was taken, to set aside and amend judgment on ground it did not state what actually occurred.

Under trial court's inherent power to make its records state what actually occurred, such court had power to set aside and amend judgment on ground that it did not state what actually occurred, even after appeal therefrom had been taken, though by such appeal it lost jurisdiction of the cause.

4. Appeal and error 🔑74—Order made after judgment is not appealable, if appeal presents same questions as would be presented on appeal from judgment.

If appeal from order made after judgment presents same questions as would be presented on appeal from judgment, the order is not appealable.

5. Appeal and error 🔑82(2)—Order denying defendants' motion to set aside and amend judgment as not stating truth held appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2).

Order denying defendants' motion to set aside and amend judgment on ground that recital therein that defendants' counsel stipulated in open court that plaintiff have judgment as prayed for was not true, held appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, providing that appeal may be taken from any special order made after final judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by J. L. Hilliker against the Board of Trustees or the City Council of the City of Seal Beach and others. From a judgment granting writ of mandate directing the calling of a special recall election, and from order denying motion to amend judgment, defendants appeal. Order reversed; judgment affirmed.

Burr A. Brown, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Charles D. Swanner and Roland Thompson, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. The plaintiff filed an action in the superior court against respondents (appellants here), in which they sought a writ of mandate directing the respondents to call a special election responsive to recall petitions seeking the recall of R. E. Dolley, J. R. John, and C. O. Wheat, as members of the board of trustees or city council of the city of Seal Beach. The respondents by way of return to the alternative writ demurred to the petition, and also made a motion to quash the alternative writ of mandate. After argument, the court overruled the demurrer, and denied the motion, and, upon the statement of counsel for respondents that he did not desire to raise any issue of fact, but desired to stand upon his demurrer and motion, judgment was entered that the peremptory writ issue, and from that judgment the respondents appeal. On the same day that respondents filed their notice of appeal from this judgment, they served upon counsel and filed in the court below a notice of motion to set aside and amend the judgment on that ground that the judgment recited that counsel for respondents "on behalf of said defendants, and each of them, stipulated in open court that said plaintiff have judgment as prayed for, and that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue in said matter," whereas in truth he did not so stipulate, but, on the contrary, "announced in open court that said defendants, and each of them, proposed to stand upon said motion and demurrer, and would not plead further in said action; * * * that, in order to shorten the time for appeal and the final determination of said action, judgment might be entered upon the rulings on said demurrer and motion in favor of said plaintiff." When this last motion, pursuant to the notice, was made, it was denied by the court, and respondents also filed notice of appeal from that order.

[1] The question raised by the demurrer and motion and relied upon here relates to the sufficiency of the recall petitions. It is contended that they are insufficient, because in each instance they referred to the officer sought to be recalled "as member of the board of trustees of said city of Seal Beach." Our attention is directed to the fact that at the last legislative session the Legislature adopted an act to amend section 751 of "an act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations" (Stats. 1927, p. 1093), which, so far as material here, reads as follows: "The government of said city shall be vested in: A board of five trustees to be known as the city council." Counsel for appellants annexed to and made a part of their notice of motion to quash the alternative writ what purports to be a copy of an ordinance adopted by the city council of Seal Beach, which, so far as it can possibly be said to affect this proceeding, recites that the ordinance is passed for the purpose of conforming to the amendment which we have just quoted, and provides that "* * * the hereinafter named city officers and officials shall be designated by the following titles and positions: 'A member of the board of trustees shall be officially known as a councilman."

Assuming solely for the purposes of argument, that the court had the right to consider the averment that the city council regularly adopted the ordinance of which this is said to be a copy, we are of the opinion that appellants' argument is wholly without solid foundation. Considering now only the alleged insufficiency in form of the petition, the provisions of "an act to provide for the recall of elective officers of incorporated cities and towns" (Stats. 1911 [Extra Sess.] p. 128) do not require the same degree of particularity in this respect as contended for by appellants. It reads:

> "The procedure to effect such removal or recall shall be as follows: A petition demanding the election of a successor to the person sought to be removed shall be filed with the clerk of the legislative body of such city or town, which petition shall be signed by qualified voters equal in number to at least twenty-five per cent. of the entire vote cast within such city or town for all candidates for the office which the incumbent sought to be removed occupies, at the last preceding regular municipal election at which such officer was voted for * * * and shall contain a statement of the grounds on which the removal or recall is sought, which statement is intended solely for the information of the electors." (There then follows a statement that the insufficiency of the last statement shall not affect the election and a statement of the things to be done and information to be supplied by the individual signers.)

[2] Nowhere do we find a requirement that the petition shall contain the exact official designation of the officer sought to be removed. We may assume that it is necessary to sufficiently designate him so that no ambiguity shall exist concerning the office from which it is sought to recall the person, but that requirement is amply satisfied in the present instance by designating him as a member of the board of trustees. No possible uncertainty could exist in the minds of the legislative body or of the signers of the petition relative to the office or officer intended to be described. The amendment of 1927 upon which appellant relies, and which we have already quoted, uses the expression "a board of five trustees." It is as though it read "a board of five trustees constituting the city council." So far as the statute is concerned, it would be entirely proper to refer to one of the individual members of the council as one of the five trustees composing the council. When we advert to the well-established principle that the statute providing for the recall of elective officials "should receive a liberal construction so as to promote the purposes for which it was enacted" (Magoon v. Heath, 79 Cal. App. 632, 250 P. 583, and cases there cited), we are bound to declare that its provisions have been fully complied with in this instance. The requirement in the Recall Act that "there shall be printed on the recall ballot, as to every officer whose recall is to be voted on thereat, the following question: 'Shall (name of person against whom the recall petition is filed) be recalled from the office of (title of the office)?'" does not alter the situation. It may indicate the necessity of designating the office with sufficient certainty that those whose duty it is to prepare the ballot may designate it officially, but the duty there imposed refers to the preparation of the ballot, and not to the form of the petition.

Appellants also rely upon the same argument with respect to the sufficiency of the petition for the writ and the writ itself. The caption of the petition refers to respondents there (appellants here) as "board of trustees or the city council of the city of Seal Beach," and to the individuals as "city trustees or city councilmen of said city of Seal Beach." The body of the petition refers to them as the "board of trustees or city council" and as "city trustees or city councilmen." The peremptory writ is directed to "board of trustees, known as the city council of the city of Seal Beach," and to individual members (naming them), "trustees and members of the city council." A statement of the situation is a sufficient refutation of the argument. The petition might perhaps have been drawn so as to designate the respondents as the board of trustees, known as the city council, but it is obvious that it was drawn with care to describe them by their proper official title whether as trustees or as councilmen. It would be absurd and unjust to hold that the petition or the writ was insufficient for the reason urged. A court of justice is not the proper place to give serious consideration to a play upon words without substance.

[3] Counsel have argued the question of whether the order made by the trial court denying the motion to set aside and amend the judgment is an appealable order, and also whether the trial court had any jurisdiction to entertain such a motion subsequent to the appeal from the judgment. Considering the last of these questions first, we think counsel for respondents mistake the nature of the motion when they insist that the trial court had no jurisdiction to entertain it. The motion was one in effect to correct the judgment and make it speak the truth. The court always has the inherent power to make its record state what actually occurred. Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 280; Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 75 P. 174; Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892. As said in Fay v. Stubenrauch, supra:

"It is true that the court by the appeal loses jurisdiction of the cause, for the purposes of the appeal, but it does not lose jurisdiction of its records."

[4, 5] The same misconception of the nature of the motion is manifest from counsel's argument that the order is not appealable. Of course, it is the law, for which there is abundant authority, that if the appeal from the order made after judgment would present the same questions as would be presented on an appeal from the judgment, the order is not appealable. That, however, is not the situation here. The proposition advanced on the appeal from the order is that the court had no right to decline to entertain a motion to correct the recitals in its judgment in accordance with the facts, so that appellants would not be foreclosed of the right of appeal from the judgment. Subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken "from any special order made after final judgment." This is such an order. The same persuasive reason exists for holding that the order is appealable as existed in the case of In re Yoder, 199 Cal. 699, 251 P. 205, to wit: The circumstances are such that "'an appeal from the final order would be vain for lack of a record showing the right of the aggrieved party.'" Here the appellants would have been precluded of their right of appeal by the recital in the judgment that it was by stipulation.

We are not unmindful of the intendments which must ordinarily be indulged in favor of the orders or judgments of the trial court. In this instance, however, the court declined to consider, and denied, the motion for lack of jurisdiction. The facts appearing in the affidavits without denial present a situation showing, not only that the court had jurisdiction, but also that the motion, in so far as it attempted to correct the judgment, should have been granted. The order denying the motion must therefore be reversed. In the interests of justice, and to expedite the disposition of the cause, we have considered the appeal from the judgment on its merits, and as though the motion had been granted. From the discussion it is obvious that the reversal of the order does not require a reversal of the judgment.

Order reversed. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PYLER. (Cr. 1623.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 28, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1159(4)—Appellate court may not reverse judgment because testimony of other witnesses differs from testimony of witnesses introduced by prosecution.

That in their testimony other witnesses may have differed from testimony of witnesses introduced by prosecution affords no legal reason to appellate court for reversal of judgment.

2. Criminal law 🔑1142—Record is presumed correct on appeal.

On appeal, record is presumed to speak truth.

3. Criminal law 🔑1119(1)—Record held not to show prejudice from alleged error in refusal to permit defendant to discharge attorney during trial.

Where trial court's refusal to permit defendant to dismiss attorney in course of trial was assigned as error, assuming that defendant ineffectually endeavored to dismiss his attorney during course of trial, nevertheless, since only complaint with reference to matter was that he was not permitted to conduct own defense, and was thereby prevented from introducing evidence, substance of which was not shown by affidavit in record, held that such alleged error did not show defendant's rights had been prejudiced.

4. Criminal law 🔑1163(1)—Error in trial, to be available to appellant, must affirmatively appear to have been substantial, prejudicial, and to have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

On appeal from judgment in order that alleged error committed on trial may be made available to appellant, it must affirmatively appear that such error was substantial, that it prejudicially affected rights of appellant, and that it resulted in miscarriage of justice.

5. Criminal law 🔑992—Defendant could not complain of failure of trial judge to follow jury's recommendation of leniency; imposition of sentence being solely for judge.

Where jury, in rendering verdict of guilty, recommended that defendant be given light sentence, and judge declined to accept verdict in such form, but requested jury to separate its verdict from recommendation of leniency, it being clear that judge was fully aware of substance and effect of recommendation, held that, since final determination of matter rested solely with judge of trial court, if in opposition to such recommendation he chose to follow own judgment, defendant could not complain.

6. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—In prosecution for assault, prosecutor's statement that defendant had been jailed for failure to support child, though prejudicial, held not ground for reversal; no miscarriage of justice resulting (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for assault to do great bodily harm, where prosecutor, in argument to jury, stated that defendant had served in jail for failure to support his child, held that, though statement was manifestly prejudicial, yet, since evidence amounted to practical demonstration of defendant's guilt, and examination of entire case convinced appellate court that error did not result in miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, it was not grounds for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Tom Pyler was convicted of an assault to do great bodily harm, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Tom Pyler, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. The appeal herein is prosecuted by defendant personally from a judgment of conviction of the crime of assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily harm. Many different points for reversal of the judgment are advanced by appellant; but no authorities are cited in support of any or either of his several contentions. Grave charges against nearly every one who in any wise was connected with the trial in the lower court, together with intemperate, disrespectful language, are freely interspersed throughout appellant's brief. Were it not for the consideration which this court is constrained to give to a defendant who, on appeal from a judgment of conviction of the commission of a criminal offense, is without legal counsel, resort to steps which might involve unpleasant consequences to the author of such a "brief" would clearly be indicated. In the circumstances here present, the lack of regularity in arrangement and conformity with established rules in the presentation of a brief will be overlooked, and due consideration will be given to the substance of the appeal.

[1] In effect, appellant's first specification of error is that the verdict of the jury was contrary to and without support of the evidence. An examination of the record on appeal discloses the fact that each of several witnesses clearly and positively testified to facts from which the jury was fully justified in reaching the verdict of which complaint is made. That in their testimony other witnesses may have differed from the testimony of the witnesses introduced by the prosecution affords no legal reason to an appellate court for a reversal of the judgment.

[2-4] It is next urged by appellant that the trial court erred in refusing to permit defendant to dismiss his attorney in the course of the trial. The transcript on appeal fails to show that any such request was made by defendant until after the verdict had been returned by the jury—at which time the request was granted. However, by affidavit, each of two persons deposed to the legal conclusion, only, that on the day on which the trial occurred she "did hear and see Tom Pyler try to dismiss his attorney, and the judge would not give him a hearing." No counter affidavit respecting such alleged incident was filed. But, when it is considered that the record is presumed to speak the truth, and that, on an occasion subsequent to the rendition of the verdict, when the question of the correctness of the reporter's transcript of the proceedings in that connection was raised, the judge of the trial court stated that at the time in question defendant made no audible request that his attorney be dismissed, it must be concluded that, if such request was ever made by defendant, it was done in such a low voice that neither the judge nor the stenographic reporter heard it. Moreover, even if it be assumed that defendant ineffectually endeavored to dismiss his attorney during the course of the trial, his only complaint with reference to the matter is that, because he was not permitted thereafter to conduct his own defense, he was prevented from introducing testimony which would have been given in his behalf by certain witnesses. The record contains no affidavit, even by the defendant, as to what testimony would have been given by any or all of such witnesses had they or any of them testified on the trial of the action. With reference thereto, the most that may be gathered from scattered statements contained in defendant's brief relates to immaterial matters, which, on objection thereto, properly would not have been admitted in evidence. On appeal from a judgment, in order that alleged error committed on the trial of an action may be made available to an appellant, it must affirmatively appear that such error was substantial, that it prejudicially affected the rights of the appellant, and that it resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Nothing contained in the record in this case indicates that the alleged error of which appellant complains brings it within such rule.

[5] Inferentially only, it appears from the transcript of the proceedings that the verdict of guilty as originally returned by the jury contained a recommendation to the judge of the trial court to the effect that defendant be given a light sentence; that the judge declined to accept the verdict in such form, and required the jury to separate its verdict proper from any recommendation of leniency to defendant in the matter of sentence or judgment which might thereafter be pronounced. While appellant criticizes the action of the trial court in the premises, it is impossible to perceive how or in what manner any prejudice to defendant's substantial rights could have resulted therefrom. No claim is made by appellant that any difference in the degree of the offense committed by defendant existed as between the original and the final verdict of the jury. Nor is authority cited by appellant which in a case of the kind before the court authorizes the jury to make a recommendation of any kind; or in case a recommendation be made which enjoins upon the judge of the trial court the duty of even considering the suggestion made by the jury, much less in any way that the judge be bound by it. In other words, it may be said that the action of the jury in the premises was a "pure gratuity," entirely outside its functions, and which, if attempted by a private person, undoubtedly would have been resented by the trial court as an affront to its dignity, and resulted in serious consequences to the individual who had the temerity to attempt to unlawfully interfere with, or to influence, the judgment of the court. But, aside from such considerations, it may be noted that the judge of the trial court in no way prevented, or attempted to prevent, the jury from presenting its suggestion or recommendation with reference to the sentence or judgment thereafter to be pronounced. In fact, it inferentially appears from the record that the verdict as originally returned by the jury, without being officially filed with the clerk of the court, nevertheless was retained by him, and presumably was placed among the records in the action. At any rate, it is clear that the judge was fully aware of the substance and effect of the recommendation which the jury desired to make regarding the sentence which should be imposed upon defendant. The final determination of the matter rested solely with the judge of the trial court. If, in opposition to the recommendation made by the jury, he chose to follow his own judgment, the point is not available to the defendant.

[6] Misconduct on the part of the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution is relied upon by appellant as a sufficient reason for a reversal of the judgment. In the course of the trial, the fact developed that, prior to the time of the commission of the assault of which defendant was convicted, he had been incarcerated in the county jail. In addressing the jury, the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution stated that "the reason Tom Pyler served in jail was because he failed to support his child." On objection being made to such remark by counsel representing defendant, the jury was instructed by the court that:

> "The jury will disregard all remarks by counsel which are not supported by the evidence. As I have heretofore informed you, the statement of counsel is not to be regarded as evidence of any fact."

It is clear that the statement made by the deputy district attorney was entirely uncalled for, and that it had no place in legitimate argument in the action on trial. The deputy district attorney was not a witness on the trial of the action, and in argument had no right to presume to inform the jury as to any matter of fact, especially as to one which had no relevancy to the question of defendant's guilt of the offense of which he was charged. That such a statement ordinarily would have a tendency to prejudice the jury against the defendant is manifest. While presumably the instruction by the court given to the jury in connection therewith may have had some effect in the way of eradicating such statement from the minds of the members of the jury, it is entirely possible that such instruction was of no avail. However, the evidence in the case amounted to a practical demonstration of defendant's guilt; and, "after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence," this court is of the opinion that the error of which complaint is made did not result "in a miscarriage of justice." Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

Various other points are suggested by appellant as affording reasons for a reversal of the judgment—none of which appears to be seriously argued. Consideration of each of such points fails to convince this court of its merit, or that it is of that importance which would justify discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

JAMESON v. WARREN et al. (Civ. 6017.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑108—Order denying motion to amend conclusions of law and for entry of different judgment held appealable.

Order denying motion to amend conclusions of law or findings of fact and for entry of different judgment held appealable.

2. Judgment 🔑276, 388—Notice of entry of judgment filed before entry held ineffectual, and notice of intention to vacate judgment filed 20 days thereafter was timely (Code Civ. Proc. § 663a).

Where notice of entry of judgment was mailed to defendant's attorneys four days before judgment was entered, such notice was premature and ineffectual, and notice of intention to move to vacate judgment, made 20 days after defective notice, was within time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 663a.

3. Corporations 🔑121(1)—Finding requiring return of stock fraudulently procured by defendant, and transferred to secure loan on plaintiff paying amount secured supported personal judgment against defendant for like amount.

In action to rescind exchange of stock, finding that exchange was induced by fraud of defendant, and that stock received by plaintiff was valueless, together with further finding that plaintiff was entitled to return of his stock, which had been pledged to another on payment of amount secured by third party's lien on stock, held sufficient to support personal judgment against defendant for like amount.

4. Usury 🔑41—Interest contingently payable, putting lender's lawful profit in hazard, need not be limited to legal rate (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii).

When payment of full legal interest or any part thereof is subject to contingency, so that lender's lawful profit is wholly or partially put in hazard, interest contingently payable need not be limited to legal rate, providing parties are contracting in good faith, and without intent to avoid statute (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) against usury.

5. Usury 🔑52—Contract adding dividends on stock pledged to interest, thus exceeding lawful rate, held intended to violate usury law, making agreement effective only for amount of loan (Usury Law).

Where large dividends on stock pledged to secure loan were anticipated, and it was contemplated by parties that such dividends, added to stipulated interest for loan agreed to be paid at maturity, in any event would exceed lawful interest, and more than equal amount of loan, it sufficiently appeared that parties intended to violate Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), and effect of agreement was to exact for use of money loaned sum in excess of lawful interest, and hence court did not err in concluding that agreement was not in full force and effect, except as to amount of loan.

6. Corporations 🔑123(11)—Pledgee in good faith of stock procured by defendant by fraud held entitled to possession as security for repayment of loan, though usurious (Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2988).

In action to rescind exchange of stock procured by defendant through fraud, and pledged to third party without notice of fraud, for loan based on usurious interest, third party, as pledgee, was entitled to possession of stock as security for repayment of amount of loan under Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2988.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Henry Jameson against C. C. Warren, doing business under the fictitious name of C. C. Warren & Co., and others. From an order denying motion to amend conclusions of law and to enter different judgment, defendants appeal. Cause remanded, with instructions to modify judgment, and, subject to modification, order affirmed.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for appellants.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal by the defendants from an order denying a motion to amend the conclusions of law upon the findings of fact in the above-entitled action and for the entry therein of a different judgment.

Respondent makes the preliminary objections that the order was not appealable, and that the notice of intention to move to vacate the judgment was not given within the time prescribed by section 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] As held in the following cases, the order was appealable: California Delta Farms v. Chinese, etc., Farms (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 1097; Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 118 P. 113.

[2] This section required that the notice of intention therein provided for should be served and filed within ten days after notice of the entry of judgment. The notice of entry of the judgment and the only notice served was mailed to the attorneys for appellants on November 14, 1924; but, as shown by the record, the judgment in the action was not entered until November 18, 1924. This notice was premature, and therefore ineffectual (North American Dredging Co. v. Outer Harbor, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 406, 173 P. 756; Grimes v. Lamar, 60 Cal. App. 623, 213 P. 270), and the notice of intention, which was served and filed on December 3, 1924, was within time.

The action was one for rescission; the complaint alleging that the plaintiff was induced by the fraudulent representations of defendant Warren to exchange 100 shares of the stock of Guarantee Mortgage Company for certain shares of the common and preferred stock of Morosco Holding Company, Inc., owned by Warren. It was further alleged that defendant Lynip claimed an interest in the stock transferred by the plaintiff to Warren, and that the claim was without right.

The court found the allegations of fraud to be true, and that the plaintiff was entitled to rescind. It was further found that the stock of the Morosco Holding Company was valueless, and, by implication, that the stock of the Guarantee Mortgage Company had been pledged to defendant Lynip by Warren to secure the payment of a promissory note executed by the latter for the sum of $2,000; that no part of the note nor any sums under the contract hereinafter mentioned had been paid to Lynip; and that the latter acquired an interest in the stock in good faith for value and without notice of the fraud or the claim of plaintiff, it being further found, however, with respect to this transaction "that the said loan, promissory note, and contract above set forth are not in full force and effect, except to the extent of $2,000."

The contract referred to as shown by the findings was in the form of a letter signed by Lynip, and addressed to and approved in writing by Warren, and of which the following is a copy:

"October 1, 1923.

"Mr. C. C. Warren, Oakland, Cal.—Dear Sir: I am this day receiving from you a certificate No. 410, dated July 9th, 1923, signed by W. A. Swall, president, and W. H. Lemman, sect., for one hundred (100) shares of capital stock of the Guarantee Mortgage company, San Francisco, U. S. A., incorporated under the laws of the state of California, 1919. And I hand you herewith my check for two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) for which I am receiving your note for two thousand ($2,000.00) dated this 1st day of October, 1923, bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. (8%) per annum. Conformable to the agreement which we had this day I am accepting the above described certificate of stock as security for the loan of two thousand ($2,000.00), and I agree to return to you, provided the loan is not paid within fifteen days (15), one-half of all the amount received on said stock from the Guarantee Mortgage Company as a dividend over and above four thousand dollars ($4,000.00).

"Should the same be paid within fifteen days I will deliver to you three-quarters (¾) of the amount over and above the two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) received from the dividends. It is understood that the first money received from the Guarantee Mortgage Company is to apply on the principal of the note. It is understood and agreed that the note of $2,000.00 received from you for my check for like amount will be paid on October 31, 1923, as specified in said note, and that the amount received from the dividends from said company will be paid to you as above stated together with the two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) which you may pay on October 31, 1923.

"[Signed] B. F. Lynip."

As conclusions of law it was found that the agreement between the plaintiff and Warren was fraudulent and void, and that the stock of the Guarantee Mortgage Company should be delivered to the plaintiff subject to a lien thereon in favor of the defendant Lynip in the sum of $2,000; that the plaintiff should take judgment against Warren for the sum of $2,000, and that the stock of the Morosco Holding Company be delivered to Warren upon the payment of the money judgment against him; and, further, that Lynip had no right, title, or interest in the stock of the Guarantee Mortgage Company, except to the extent of his lien thereon.

The judgment followed the above conclusions; and, as grounds for the motion, it was urged that the conclusions that plaintiff was entitled to a money judgment against Warren, and that the contract between the latter and Lynip was usurious or otherwise illegal, and should not be enforced according to its terms, were not supported by the findings.

Appellants moved for an order vacating the judgment, amending the conclusions of law, and for the entry of a new judgment denying a personal judgment against Warren and adjudging Lynip to be entitled to enforce the contract with Warren according to its terms, with the right to the possession of the stock of the Guarantee Mortgage Company as therein provided.

[3] The findings that the exchange of stock between the plaintiff and Warren was induced by the fraud of the latter, and that the stock received by the plaintiff was valueless, with the further finding that the plaintiff was entitled to the return of the stock of the Guarantee Mortgage Company upon payment of the amount secured by Lynip's lien thereon, were sufficient to support a personal judgment against Warren for a like amount, and the motion to amend the conclusions of law in this respect was properly denied.

Appellants contend that, without a finding of facts showing that the contract between them was usurious or otherwise illegal, the conclusion of the trial court that the same was "not in full force and effect, except to the extent of $2,000," cannot be sustained.

The usury law provides that no person shall directly or indirectly take or receive any money, goods, or things in action, or in any other manner whatsoever, any greater sum or any greater value for the loan or forbearance of money, goods, or things in action than at the rate of $12 upon $100 for one year; and that any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with this provision shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest. St. 1919, p. lxxxiii.

According to the contract, the stock was delivered to Lynip as security for a note dated October 1, 1923, which Warren agreed to pay in any event on October 31, 1923. In addition to such payment, it was agreed that the lender should be entitled to certain sums from any dividends made by the corporation—which, as may be inferred from the pleadings of the defendants, was in course of liquidation; the amounts being dependent upon whether the note be paid before or after fifteen days from its date. As the contract appears to have been construed by the trial court (with which construction we agree), it was agreed that, should the loan with interest be paid within 15 days, the lender, still being entitled to retain the stock, should receive, in addition to such payment, the first $2,000 paid as dividends, and one-quarter of all further dividends. If the note was not paid within 15 days, he was to retain the sum of $4,000 out of such dividends, plus one-half of all further dividends, it being further stipulated, however, that, in case the borrower repaid the loan on October 31, 1923, he would be entitled to the return thereof, but only out of dividends received by the lender over and above the sum of $2,000.

[4] The interest on the note at the rate stipulated, namely, 8 per cent. per annum, would at maturity have amounted to $13.33, and would have amounted to $20 had the parties stipulated for the maximum amount of interest that could be legally exacted. When the payment of the full legal interest or any part thereof is subject to a contingency so that the lender's lawful profit is wholly or partially put in hazard, the interest so contingently payable need not be limited to the legal rate, providing the parties are contracting in good faith, and without intent to avoid the statute against usury. 39 Cyc., Usury, p. 952.

[5] In the present case, however, while the evidence respecting the condition of the corporation is not before us, it sufficiently appears from the record that large dividends upon the stock pledged were anticipated, and that it was contemplated by the parties that such dividends, added to the stipulated interest on the loan—which with the principal Warren agreed to pay at maturity in any event—would not only exceed the lawful rate of interest but would more than equal the amount of the loan. We think it is sufficiently shown by the terms of the contract that it was the intention of the parties to violate the usury law; and that the effect of their agreement, in view of what fairly appears to have been the condition of the corporation within their knowledge, was to exact for the use of the amount loaned sums in excess of a lawful rate of interest.

[6] While we agree with the conclusions of the trial court as to the effect of the transaction, and that the stipulation for the payment of interest is unenforceable, we are nevertheless of the opinion that Lynip, as a pledgee, was entitled to the possession of the stock as security for the repayment of the amount loaned (Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2988; Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 P. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844), and that the motion to that extent should have been granted.

The judgment for the above reason should be modified by providing therein that certificate No. 410 for 100 shares of the capital stock of Guarantee Mortgage Company now in possession of the clerk of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda be delivered to B. F. Lynip, as pledgee thereof, and that the same is subject to a lien thereon in favor of said pledgee as security for the payment of the sum of $2,000.

It is therefore ordered that the cause be remanded, with instructions to the court to modify its judgment in accordance with the above, and, subject to such modification of the judgment, the order appealed from is affirmed, appellant Lynip to recover his costs of appeal.

THOMPSON et al. v. THOMPSON et al.★
(Civ. 6124.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1928.

As Modified May 29, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1928.

1. Wills 🔑88(2)—Under deed delivered to third person to hold until grantee's death, vital question is whether grantor intended to vest present title or title was conditional on grantor's prior death.

In construing deed handed to third person, with instructions to hold same until death of grantor and then to deliver to grantee, vital question to be determined is whether grantor intended to vest a present title in grantee on delivery to holder, or whether delivery by holder to grantee was conditional upon prior death of grantor.

2. Wills 🔑88(4)—Deed delivered to third person to give to grantee on grantor's prior death is testamentary and subject to rules of wills.

Deed delivered to third person to give to grantee on condition of grantor's prior death is testamentary and subject to all rules required by law of wills.

3. Wills 🔑88(4)—Deed delivered to third person for delivery to grantee on grantor's dying before grantee did not then vest title.

Deed delivered to third person for delivery to grantee, conditional on grantor's dying before grantee, held not then to vest title in grantee; being testamentary in character.

4. Trusts 🔑103(5)—Decedent's former partner and business associate held required to deal with decedent's executor as if fiduciary of decedent, making void, as against heirs, obtention of property by misrepresentations.

Decedent's former partner and corporation business associate held required to deal with decedent's executor, in the acquisition of decedent's property, as if he were a fiduciary of decedent, where either the partnership existed at time of decedent's death, or, if corporation then existed, it was merely a thinly disguised partnership, making fraudulent and void, as against decedent's heirs, such surviving partner's obtention of property by misrepresentations as to decedent's interests therein.

5. Equity 🔑56—Equity will look through form and see real partnership disguised in corporation.

Equity will look through the form of a corporation and see the real partnership thinly disguised behind the corporate dress.

6. Fraud 🔑7—Fiduciary relations are not found solely in legal relationships, but are found where relation of trust and confidence exists between friends.

Fiduciary relations are not found solely in those legal relationships, such as guardian and ward, husband and wife, trustee and beneficiary, but are also found where, in effect, the relation of trust and confidence exists between trusting friends.

7. Trusts 🔑110—Evidence held to support finding that between defendant and deceased former partner such confidential relationship existed as to require defendant to deal with deceased's executor, in acquiring property, as fiduciary (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Evidence held to support finding that there existed between defendant and his deceased former partner and corporation associate such confidential relationship as to require the defendant in dealing with deceased's executor in acquiring property from the estate, to negotiate, because of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, as fiduciary.

8. Partnership 🔑259—Presumption that thing once proved to exist continues as long as usual with such things would support finding partnership between defendant and decedent existed to time of decedent's death (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Presumption, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature would support finding that partnership relation between defendant, accused of fraudulently obtaining property of partner after partner's death, and decedent, existed to time of decedent's death.

9. Trusts 🔑103(5)—Surviving partner, procuring decedent's corporation stock by misrepresentation, held involuntary trustee for heirs (Civ. Code, § 2224).

Surviving partner's misrepresentations to decedent's executor, inducing sale of decedent's corporation stock by causing executor to believe statements as to its value, held to make such survivor, because of Civ. Code, § 2224, involuntary trustee of the property for the heirs.

10. Executors and administrators 🔑453(4)—Decree for disposition of decedent's property held fraudulent and not binding on heirs, where purchaser was decedent's fiduciary.

Decree relative to disposition of decedent's property in executor's hands held fraudulent and not binding on decedent's heirs because of purchaser's fraud, where purchaser was decedent's fiduciary due to previous partnership relation.

11. Trusts 🔑103(5)—Decedent's fiduciary, who, on purchase from executor, of corporation stock, became involuntary trustee thereof, became trustee of corporation's physical properties (Civ. Code, § 2243).

Decedent's fiduciary, who, on purchase from executor of corporation stock, became involuntary trustee thereof, also became, under Civ. Code, § 2243, involuntary trustee of corporation's physical properties, precluding his being able to convey to himself a good title to such corporate properties.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Edith Thompson and others against Omer C. Thompson and others. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed with instructions.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Gordon Gray and Walter Ames, both of San Diego, and Hewitt, Ford, Crump & Penn of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Carl Alex Johnson, Sloane & Sloane, and Tomkins & Clark, all of San Diego, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued as legatees of specific bequests under the will of George G. MacKay, deceased, charging the defendant Thompson with fraud, deceit, and concealment through which he obtained the bulk of the MacKay estate. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in findings and judgment favorable to the defendants, from which the plaintiffs have appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

MacKay died testate on the 18th day of October, 1921, and by the terms of his will, executed May 20, 1921, he made specific bequests aggregating $150,000 to the plaintiffs herein—two sisters, a brother, and two nieces, all of whom resided in Canada at all stages of this proceeding. In due course of administration of the estate a final decree of distribution was entered February 14, 1923, reciting that all the money on hand for the payment of such bequests was the sum of $20,808.81, and awarding to each of said legatees a proportionate amount of the sum named in the will, leaving an unpaid balance to plaintiff Edith Thompson of over $43,000 and an unpaid balance to each of the four other legatees of over $21,000. Charging that the defendant Thompson immediately upon the death of the deceased entered into a scheme to defraud the estate of valuable assets, and that, as a part of such conspiracy, he deceived the executor and his attorney by misrepresenting to them material facts and by withholding and concealing valuable information from them, the plaintiffs by this action seek to have certain deeds and transfers annulled and set aside certain court proceedings declared void, and ask that the shares of stock of the two corporations organized by the deceased and defendant Thompson be declared property of the MacKay estate or that in lieu thereof the defendants be adjudged to hold the properties of said corporations in trust for the plaintiffs or be required to pay from the proceeds thereof the unpaid balance which plaintiffs claim to be due under the terms of the will.

The business association of MacKay and Thompson began some time in 1905 for the purpose of acquiring real property in the city of San Diego. MacKay was a resident of the city of Los Angeles, where he was employed as a silk buyer and was reputed to be a man of means, and Thompson was an employee in the shoe department of a dry goods concern located in the city of San Diego. The two were warm friends, who trusted each other implicitly, and entered into their real estate venture without any formal articles of partnership. In this manner they acquired a number of properties in that city, title always being taken in the name of Thompson, but in February, 1910, they executed a partnership agreement reciting the fact that they had acquired the properties in the manner stated, and that the purpose of the agreement was to declare that each owned an undivided one-half interest in all the properties acquired; that is to say, the properties which they at the time held and which were expressly described in the partnership agreement. Thereafter, and on September 21, 1910, MacKay signed a grant deed conveying to Thompson an undivided one-half interest in all the real property described in this partnership agreement, and handed the deed to a notary public, who took the acknowledgment, with instructions to deliver it to Thompson on the death of the grantor. The parties continued under their partnership arrangement to buy and sell other properties in the city, and some time in the year 1913 they erected the Knickerbocker Hotel on lots A and B of block 63; lot A being one of the lots which was included in the partnership agreement as well as in the MacKay deed of 1910 and lot B having been acquired by the parties at a time subsequent thereto, which is not disclosed by the evidence. In 1915 defendant Thompson left the shoe department and became the manager of the Knickerbocker Hotel, which position he occupied at the time of the death of MacKay.

In the latter part of this year and in January, 1916, Thompson was sued by a creditor named Daugherty and actions were threatened by other creditors. To avoid these creditors, Thompson organized two corporations, one the Thompson-MacKay Company, incorporated for 1,000 shares, and the other the Omer C. Thompson Company, incorporated for 150 shares. One share of stock of each of these corporations was issued to Thompson and two dummies who were named as incorporators, and who became, with Thompson, the directors of each corporation. Thompson was elected president, treasurer, and general manager, and in fact became the sole directing head of both corporations. At the time of incorporation Thompson procured the passage of a resolution by the board of directors of the Thompson-MacKay Company, reciting that an offer had been received from MacKay to sell to the company all the real properties described in the partnership agreement (except two lots which are not involved here) and also lot B of block 63, one of the lots upon which the Knickerbocker Hotel had been built. This offer was formally accepted by the directors, and in consideration of this transfer 997 shares of its stock were issued to MacKay. At the time of this resolution, and for the purpose of carrying it into effect, the defendant Thompson filed a sworn statement with the commissioner of corporations seeking permission to issue 997 shares of the stock of this corporation to MacKay for the purpose of enabling the corporation to take over and operate "real estate holdings of George G. MacKay, now under record ownership of Omer C. Thompson, holding such as trustee for said George G. MacKay." On the same day defendant Thompson and his two associate directors of the Omer C. Thompson Company passed a resolution reciting an offer by Thompson to sell and convey to the company other real estate located in San Diego, and, for the purpose of carrying out this transaction, defendant filed another sworn application with the commissioner of corporations to take over and operate real estate holdings of the said defendant. In support of these applications, the defendant Thompson filed with the commissioner of corporations appraisals, sworn to by Nat R. Titus and one other, reciting that the properties conveyed to the Thompson-MacKay Company were of the value of $315,000, and that the properties conveyed to the other corporation were of the value of $55,000, and the defendant Thompson filed with the commissioner a sworn statement to the effect that mortgages outstanding against the former company amounted to $199,500 and that mortgages against the property conveyed to the latter company amounted to $33,500. Upon these representations the commissioner of corporations authorized the issue of the stock as requested, and certificates were accordingly drawn and delivered to MacKay covering 997 shares of the Thompson-MacKay Company and 147 shares of the Omer C. Thompson Company. MacKay took complete possession and control of these certificates of stock, continued to vote the shares, either in person or by proxy, and pledged them to one S. M. Wilson for a personal loan of $50,000. From the date of issue of these certificates—March 27, 1916—until March 28, 1922, some five months after the death of MacKay, all this stock stood of record in his name upon the books of both corporations. During the year 1916 Thompson testified in supplemental proceedings in a suit brought by one of his creditors against him that MacKay was the absolute and full owner of the stock of both companies and that he (Thompson) had no interest of any nature in any of this stock. On numerous occasions prior to the death of MacKay, Thompson asserted that the ownership of the entire stock was in MacKay, and as president of both corporations he participated in meetings and signed minutes reciting the fact of this ownership.

On the day following the death of MacKay, Thompson and his agent, Nat R. Titus, moved quickly to perfect their plan to acquire possession of all the property and interest which MacKay had in these corporations. First Titus went to the executor named in MacKay's will and advised him that the hotel property in San Diego was mortgaged for all it was worth. A few days later he produced the deed executed by MacKay in 1910 and had it recorded, and, at about the same time, recorded the partnership agreement executed in the same year. He was then elected director and vice president of the Thompson-MacKay Company and participated in a resolution of the board of directors of that company voting to Thompson back salary at the rate of $500 per month from March 1, 1916, to November 1, 1921, totaling the sum of $34,000. At the same time the directors of this corporation, without any pretense of consideration, authorized a conveyance of all its properties to the defendant Thompson and Titus, and Steinmetz, the other of the three directors, who was also an agent of Thompson, joined in the execution of such a deed. In order to effect this transfer, Thompson signed what he termed a "consent to sale," in which he recited that he was the owner of 998 shares of the stock of the corporation. Similar proceedings were had by the same directors in the Omer C. Thompson Company, and there Thompson signed a consent to sale reciting that he was the owner of 148 shares of the stock of that company, whereas the owner of record of this stock in both corporations was George MacKay. Both deeds of conveyance were executed by Titus and Thompson's agent, and were recorded with Thompson's "consent to sale" attached to them.

Thereafter, and on November 16, 1921, less than 30 days from the death of the decedent, Thompson served upon the executor written notice that he owned all the stock in both companies. On the same day Thompson, Nat R. Titus, and Thompson's attorney, Johnson, went to Los Angeles and conferred with the executor and his attorney, one W. W. Butler. The testimony of no one of the five parties present at this conference agrees as to what occurred. But it stands out unmistakably from the record that Thompson, his agent, and his attorney did everything possible to deceive the executor and his attorney as to the facts relating to the ownership of the properties in San Diego, and that they concealed from them practically all the facts and circumstances relating to the various transfers and other transactions which we have heretofore recited. The executor who had been a warm friend of the deceased, and who now became a partisan of the defendant Thompson, was apparently satisfied by what occurred at this conference to sit idly by and let Thompson have his own way as to the disposition of the properties which might otherwise have been claimed by him on behalf of the heirs of the estate. He immediately petitioned the probate court for a reduction of his bond as executor from $100,000 to $25,000, and this was granted upon his representation that he had discovered within this short period of time that the estate did not own the properties in San Diego claimed by the decedent. No investigation was made by the executor or his attorney as to the merits of the claims presented by the defendant Thompson and his agent, but, acting upon these representations alone, the executor permitted this defendant and his attorney to conduct a sale of all the stock which had been issued to the decedent to satisfy the claim of Wilson, who held the stock as pledgee to a purported loan to the decedent, which loan was not evidenced by any writing other than a canceled check. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that this sale was all a part of a scheme planned by this defendant and his attorney to lead the executor to believe that the estate had no claim which it could assert against the defendant Thompson, that as a part of this scheme these parties, well knowing that the value of this stock was approximately $105,000, arranged to have a dummy bid it in at the sale for the sum of $5,000, which sum was supplied by Thompson, and that, for the purpose of preventing others from bidding at the sale, they represented that the entire physical properties of the corporations were mortgaged for all they were worth, and for the same purpose they instituted suit in the superior court of San Diego county against the MacKay estate and Wilson to quiet title to the pledged stock, claiming Thompson to be the owner. Concealment on the part of this defendant is charged in his failure to disclose at this time that the corporations had on deposit in the name of the Knickerbocker Hotel $8,369 in cash. In any event, the plans of this defendant were successful because neither the executor nor his attorney attended the sale and no bid was offered excepting one in the name of the defendant A. B. Titus in the sum of $5,000, and the stock was accordingly sold to him for that amount. Immediately thereafter the action to quiet title to the stock commenced in San Diego county on February 21st was dismissed, and on March 1, 1922, Thompson filed suit to quiet title against the executor and A. B. Titus, the purchaser at the pledgee sale. Process was served upon both defendants, but the executor failed to appear, and his default was accordingly entered. The defendant Titus, however, did appear by one of Thompson's attorneys, and these parties entered into a stipulation which gave to Thompson all that he could possibly have asked for, and upon which a decree was entered quieting title in Thompson of all the stock of these corporations. Soon thereafter Thompson procured an order of court dissolving both corporations.

As pointed out by the trial court in summing up the evidence at the close of the trial, there was so much false testimony and concealment on the part of Thompson that it is difficult to analyze the evidence as to what has been proved and what has been left to conjecture. The facts which we have heretofore stated, independent of the contentions of the respective parties, were all found to be true by the trial court, but upon these facts the trial court drew the conclusion that the plaintiffs had failed to prove a case of fraud which would justify the court in setting aside the pledgee's sale of the stock, decree quieting title thereto or the final settlement and decree of distribution in the probate proceedings. On this appeal it is the theory of the appellants that the pledgee's sale was so tainted with fraud that the court should have no hesitation in declaring it void and of no effect; that the decree quieting title to the stock, which was based upon this sale and the collusion of the parties to that suit, was procured wholly through extrinsic fraud on the part of the respondents, and that equity should declare that decree void and of no effect; that the final settlement and decree of distribution in the probate proceedings are not necessarily attacked in this action, but that the court could, if it supported appellants' charge of fraud, declare what portion of the property involved rightly belonged to the MacKay estate and that that property could then be administered on in the probate proceedings as property discovered after the final decree of distribution. The trial court, in ruling upon appellants' contentions, took the position that, though the facts proved unquestionably showed unfair and reprehensible conduct on the part of Thompson and inexcusable stupidity and incompetence on the part of the executor and his attorney in their failure to protect the interest of the heirs in the probate proceedings, there was no duty upon Thompson or his agent to play fairly with the executor or his attorney, and hence his conduct was not actionable. It is the theory of the appellants that a partnership relation existed beween Thompson and MacKay from 1910 to October, 1921, the date of MacKay's death, or that, if this partnership was dissolved by the formation of the corporations in 1916, nevertheless the evidence amply supported the trial court's finding that "at the time of MacKay's death there existed between said Omer C. Thompson and George Grant MacKay the most friendly and confidential relationship." Upon these premises the appellants argue that, when the respondent Thompson, immediately after the death of MacKay, approached the executor and his attorney, he at least gave the latter the impression that Thompson and MacKay were in partnership at the time of the latter's death and that whatever information Thompson gave could be treated as coming from a partner and a confidential friend of the deceased. From this it is argued that, because of the confidence which this respondent invited from the executor and his attorney, these representatives of the heirs of the estate were led to rely upon the representations of this respondent to the injury of the heirs. It is then argued that, because Thompson and MacKay were partners at the time the corporations were formed, and because these corporations were formed solely for the purpose of helping Thompson defraud his creditors, the business being conducted in practically the same way as during the partnership, the confidential relation which existed between the two as partners continued down to the death of MacKay and made Thompson an involuntary trustee of the partnership property for the benefit of MacKay's heirs, and that, because of this fiduciary relation between Thompson and the heirs, Thompson was required to use the utmost candor and strictness of accountability in his dealing with the executor while the latter acted in the capacity of an agent or representative of the heirs.

In defending the judgment, respondents emphasize three defenses which they insist are conclusive against any cause of action urged by the appellant. These are, first, the transfer by the decedent, in his lifetime, to Thompson of all his interest in the physical properties of the partnership; second, the subsequent purchase at the pledgee's sale by Thompson of all the stock in the two corporations; and, third, the decree of the superior court quieting title in Thompson to this stock and to the physical properties held by the corporations.

As to the deed executed by the decedent in 1910, conveying to Thompson an undivided one-half interest in the real property owned by the partnership, the trial court found that it was delivered to Nat R. Titus by the decedent, with instructions to hold the same until the death of decedent and thereupon to deliver the same to Thompson. From these facts the trial court concluded that the decedent thereupon surrendered the possession and control over the deed to Titus, and reserved no right to recall it or to change its provisions. This finding is attacked by the appellants upon the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. The evidence of the actual transmission of the deed is found in the testimony of Nat R. Titus alone. When asked to state the circumstances of the execution and delivery to him he answered, "Well, I told you I didn't remember so much about the execution of it, but I remember his giving it to me and telling me to hold it, and, if he died before Thompson, to give it to Thompson." On further examination of this witness by respondents' counsel he repeated that nothing had been said to him by the decedent excepting what has just been quoted. But later in his examination, in answer to the question, "Precisely just what were his instructions to you?" the reply was, "To give it to Thompson when he died." As bearing upon the intention of the grantor in making and delivering this deed, we find the testimony of respondent Thompson that "MacKay and I had this understanding, when he died his property—all his property—should come to me; and I had this understanding with MacKay, when I died all my property should go to MacKay." There is also the testimony of the witness Campbell, executor of the MacKay estate, to the effect that MacKay said there was such an understanding between himself and Thompson, and the testimony of the same witness that MacKay informed him "that several years ago a deed had been prepared, executed and prepared and placed in trust, of all the property in San Diego, and was to be delivered upon—to Mr. Thompson, upon his death, whenever it might be." Then there is the testimony of Dr. Cook, an intimate friend of the two partners, that the decedent said to him, "I have deeded the San Diego property to Thompson in case of my death." And the testimony of the witness Campbell that the decedent informed him that he and Thompson had so arranged their affairs that in the event of his death everything went to Thompson, and in the event of Thompson's death everything went to him, an arrangement which was conceded by Thompson but which apparently was not carried out on his part. This is all the testimony bearing upon the matter of the execution and delivery of the deed upon which the trial court was required to find whether the grantor intended to pass a present title, except the undisputed evidence that from the time of the execution and delivery of the deed down to the death of the decedent the grantor continued to claim and assert title in himself, and the grantee, fully aware of all the circumstances, continued to recognize the grantor as the equitable owner of all the interest purported to have been conveyed by the grantor, and except, also, the inferences to be drawn from the conveyance to the corporation and the general conduct of the parties.

[1-3] The vital question to be determined in a case of this kind is whether the grantor intended to vest a present title in the grantee upon delivery to the holder of the deed or whether delivery by the holder to the grantee was conditional upon the prior death of the grantor. If the latter, the purpose of the grant is deemed to be testamentary and subject to all the rules required by the law of wills, and, if these rules have not been complied with, the deed cannot be given effect as vesting any title in the grantee. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 637, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. The best evidence of the intention of the grantor is the evidence of the instructions given by him to Titus at the time of the delivery of the deed. This evidence is that the grantor told Titus to hold the deed and to deliver it to Thompson if he (the grantor) died before Thompson. This clearly implies that the delivery of the deed was conditional upon the prior death of the grantor, and demands a holding that it was ineffectual for the purpose of vesting a present title in Thompson. Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 575, 185 P. 665. These facts, taken with the undisputed evidence of the conduct of the parties with full knowledge of the transaction, would require a finding that the deed was testamentary in character and was not intended to vest a present title in the grantee.

But aside from this the trial court found upon undisputed evidence that for a period of six years after the execution of this deed the parties continued to deal in the properties covered by the deed as partners or joint owners, each owning an undivided one-half thereof. During all this time the record title of all the properties involved stood in the name of Thompson, and the interest of MacKay therein was fixed so far as any writing is concerned by the articles of copartnership wherein the interests of the two parties were declared to be an undivided one-half of the whole. This condition continued until the formation of the two corporations in 1916, when Thompson, holding the record title of all the property, and with full knowledge of the MacKay deed, voluntarily conveyed all to the Thompson-MacKay Company and added to the deed a lot which was not included in the MacKay deed. At this time Thompson took oath that all the property belonged to MacKay, and thus denied any claim which could have been made at that time that the MacKay deed vested complete title in him. This arrangement, it is true, was made by Thompson for the purpose of defrauding his own creditors, but it nevertheless served the purpose of transferring to the corporation all the title which Thompson had or might claim either legal or equitable in all the properties mentioned in the MacKay deed. Thus if the MacKay deed had transferred to Thompson the equitable title to one-half of the property, the deed of Thompson to the corporation made six years thereafter transferred to the corporation all the title which Thompson then had both legal and equitable, and the subsequent testimony of Thompson, given to the commissioner of corporations and in the superior court on supplementary proceedings, to the effect that MacKay was the sole owner of the stock of the corporation to which this property had been transferred, and that he (Thompson) had no interest or claim to any portion of the stock or assets of the corporation, disposes of any claim which he may make at this time that he was in fact an equitable owner of a one-half interest in the physical property of the corporation by reason of the MacKay deed.

The second and third defenses urged by the respondents are sufficient only in the event that it should be held that the conceded transactions of the respondent Thompson immediately following the death of MacKay, consisting of misrepresentation, concealment, and deceit, all intended to mislead the executor and to prevent him from taking any steps to protect the interest of the heirs of the estate, do not constitute actionable fraud. In determining this question it is necessary to first look to the relationship existing between Thompson and MacKay and between Thompson and the executor of the MacKay estate.

[4] We are satisfied from our review of the undisputed evidence that the court erred in concluding from the evidence and its findings that the deceit and misrepresentations of Thompson were made between parties acting at arm's length and did not constitute actionable fraud. The evidence and the findings show that Thompson upon more than one theory was bound to act toward the executor and the legatees, whom the latter represented, with the honesty and fidelity exacted by law of a trustee. This is the pivotal point in the case, for, once granting that Thompson could not deal with the executor as one at arm's length, it then follows: First, that his misrepresentation to the executor of facts concerning the property of the estate was actionable fraud; second, his misrepresentation forestalling a defense to the action quieting title to the stock was extrinsic fraud preventing the appellants herein from having their day in court; third, his misrepresentation forestalling the executor from reclaiming the pledged stock to the estate was also actionable fraud which entitled those who were defrauded thereby either to sue in damages for the deceit or to follow in equity the said stock so fraudulently obtained by Thompson and to claim the property into which the said stock was transmuted by Thompson's subsequent machinations.

[5, 6] Thompson was bound to this degree of fidelity to the representative of the deceased because: (1) He was the surviving partner of a partnership which owned the property which stood in the name of the corporation(s), equity looking through the form of the corporation and seeing the real partnership thinly disguised behind the corporate dress; (2) or because he was a surviving partner of a partnership which may have been temporarily dissolved at the time of the formation of the corporation(s) but which sprung into existence again immediately thereafter and then owning as its partnership property not the property which had been conveyed to the corporation entity, but the stock in that corporation; (3) because, even if the partnership was so ragged that it could not be said in law to be a real partnership, nevertheless the relations between Thompson and the deceased at the latter's death were one of trust and confidence in fact. Fiduciary relations are not found solely in those legal relationships, such as guardian and ward, husband and wife, trustee and beneficiary, but are also found where in fact the relation of trust and confidence exists between trusting friends. Palladine v. Imp. Valley F. L. Co., 65 Cal. App. 727, 745, 225 P. 291.

Whether Thompson comes within one or the other of the three categories just enumerated is immaterial in this case. His duty was the same in each. There might have been some difference as to the form of accounting and remedy available to appellants if the partnership owned stock in a corporation and not the very property of the corporation, but that difference can now no longer exist, because Thompson has again transmuted the corporate stock back into tangible property.

[7, 8] The trial court found that at the time of MacKay's death "there existed between said Omer C. Thompson and George Grant MacKay the most friendly and confidential relationship." And, in an opinion filed by the trial judge immediately following the submission of the case, his views upon this issue were expressed as follows:

> "It is my opinion that from the date of the written partnership or property agreement, in February, 1910, down to the death of Mr. MacKay, in October, 1921, the Thompson and MacKay San Diego property, including the stock of Thompson-MacKay Company (after its incorporation), was owned jointly by Thompson and MacKay, an undivided one-half interest in each, and that both Thompson and MacKay so understood it, regardless of what either of them said about the ownership of the property for the purpose of evading or defrauding creditors, or for any other purpose, and regardless of who had possession of the stock or other property or in whose name it appeared on the records."

These views of the trial judge are fully supported in the evidence, and this evidence supports the finding of fact just referred to. But we are convinced from our examination of the record that the conduct of the parties throughout this entire period showed unmistakably that they intended that the partnership arrangement should still continue irrespective of who held the legal title to the real property or as to who appeared as the record holder of the certificates of stock of the corporation, there being no evidence of any character showing an intention to dissolve the partnership. The presumption that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature (section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.) would have supported a finding that the partnership relation between these parties continued to exist down to the death of MacKay.

But the question of the existence of the partnership at the time of MacKay's death is important only in so far as it goes to the matter of the degree of good faith required on Thompson's part. The theory upon which the appellants proceeded is that Thompson occupied a position of trust and confidence with MacKay, and that he dealt with the executor of the estate on the basis of this fiduciary relation; that, immediately upon the death of MacKay, Thompson and his agent Titus made every effort to gain the confidence and trust of the executor and his attorney, and that they trusted these parties implicitly and dealt with Thompson as the confidential representative of the deceased. In Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal. App. 450, 463, 97 P. 190, 195, it is said that this fiduciary relation "exists and relief is granted in all cases in which influence has been acquired and abused, in which confidence has been reposed and betrayed. The origin of the confidence and the source of the influence are immaterial. The rule embraces both technical fiduciary relations, and those informal relations which exist wherever one man trusts in and relies on another." The facts here are similar to those in Morgan v. Asher, 49 Cal. App. 172, 193 P. 288, where the court required of an executrix a greater degree of good faith because of her confidential relation with the decedent who was her husband. Here Thompson was the trusted agent and business associate of the decedent for a period of eleven years or more, during a portion of which time he acquired real property, had taken the legal title in his own name, and managed all the business affairs of the two after the corporations were formed as well as before. In the Morgan Case the court said:

> "She is averred to have occupied toward her said husband during the latter days of his lifetime and up to the date of his death the position of his agent, intrusted by him with the exclusive custody and control of the whole of his real and personal property, and particularly of that most important portion thereof which consisted of bonds and other securities of the value of at least one hundred thousand dollars. As to these latter properties she was his trustee, as such agent, at the time of his death, and immediately upon his death she became the trustee of all those persons, who, either as heirs or legatees, were entitled to share in his said estate by virtue of this relationship or under the provisions of his will."

[9] It cannot be disputed that Thompson not only failed to state truly what he told the executor, but that he also suppressed and concealed material facts in his plan to acquire the property of the estate. On the day following MacKay's death, his associate, Nat R. Titus, informed the executor that the San Diego properties were mortgaged for all they were worth, Titus and Thompson then arranged for the recording of the articles of copartnership and the MacKay deed both executed in 1910; they arranged for a meeting of the directors of the corporation controlled entirely by them, and fraudulently voted to pay Thompson back salary in the sum of $34,000; they fraudulently authorized the corporations to convey all their physical properties to Thompson and deeds of conveyance were executed by Thompson's agents for this purpose. Within 30 days after the death of MacKay they called upon the executor in company with Thompson's attorney, Johnson, and informed the executor that Thompson owned all the stock and all the physical properties of the corporation, that neither the stock nor the properties were of any value over the indebtedness, but failed to inform him or his attorney of the circumstances under which the deed of 1910 was executed and delivered, or that subsequent to the execution and delivery of that deed Thompson voluntarily deeded all interest in the properties to one of the corporations. By these acts of misrepresentation and concealment and by the institution of an action to quiet title on behalf of Thompson to all the stock immediately preceding the pledgee's sale, and by the failure to disclose to the executor that the corporations had money in bank under the name of the Knickerbocker Hotel amounting to over $8,000, Thompson prevailed upon the executor to absent himself from the pledgee's sale and to allow Thompson's dummy to purchase all the stock upon the single bid of $5,000. The trial court did not find as to the source of the funds used by Thompson for this purpose, but the inference may be fairly drawn that he used these corporate funds directly for the stock purchase or reimbursed himself from this deposit. In any event, he obtained possession of the entire deposit, in addition to the stock of an estimated value of over $100,000, without a fair disclosure. The estate was injured to the extent of being compelled to pay $20,000, the balance of the pledge, whereas, if the executor had been the successful bidder at the sale, the amount paid would have lessened the liability of the estate to the pledgee. It cannot be disputed that, if the estate had purchased the stock, Thompson could not have successfully asserted any claim to it because of his fraud in permitting MacKay to become apparent owner. Thus, as the purchaser at this sale would have become the valid owner of the stock, notwithstanding the false claims of ownership of the physical properties of the corporations, he would have had clear title to the money on deposit. All this Thompson obtained by his influence upon the executor; thus making him an involuntary trustee for the heirs under section 2224, Civil Code.

[10] While holding this stock as a trustee for the heirs, Thompson commenced an action against the estate and A. B. Titus, purchaser, to quiet title. Relying upon the representations theretofore made to him by Thompson, the executor permitted his default to be entered and made no appearance at any stage of the proceedings. The dummy who had been procured by Thompson to purchase the stock at the pledgee's sale was represented in court by counsel employed by this respondent. The two respondents herein, then having control of both sides of the litigation, stipulated to everything which Thompson desired in order to procure a judgment quieting title to all the stock in him. This entire transaction was a fraud upon the court and a fraud upon the executor and upon the MacKay heirs. The case comes squarely within the rule of Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 143, 231 P. 987, and cases cited. This decree was therefore fraudulent and of no binding effect upon the MacKay heirs.

[11] Having obtained possession of all the stock of the corporation belonging to the MacKay estate through fraud and breach of his fiduciary relation, Thompson went through the form of conveying all the physical properties of the corporation to himself by representing himself to be the legal owner of the stock, but as trustee for the heirs in the stock he also became trustee of the physical properties of the corporation, because, not being the legal or equitable owner of the stock, he was not able to convey to himself a good title to the corporate properties This follows because of section 2243, Civil Code, which provides:

> "Every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust, holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith, and for a valuable consideration."

Upon the undisputed facts in the record, the appellants were entitled to a decree canceling the deed from MacKay to Thompson made in 1910, adjudging and declaring void as to them the decree quieting title to the corporate stock entered on March 24, 1922, and adjudging and decreeing that the respondents hold as trustees for the appellant an undivided one-half interest in all the properties and assets owned by the Thompson-MacKay Company at the time of MacKay's death and the rents, issues, and profits accruing thereafter, to the extent that such portion of the properties, rents, issues, and profits of this corporation come within the unpaid balance of the individual legacies to each of the appellants, and that, if said legacies cannot be paid in full then each of the appellants is entitled to judgment proportionate to the amount of the unpaid balance of each.

In explanation of the foregoing, it should be said that the appellants have throughout this litigation insisted that, because all the stock of both corporations was issued and held by MacKay as a part of a scheme to defraud Thompson's creditors, Thompson is thereby estopped and foreclosed from making any claim to any of the stock of either corporation upon the well-settled rule found in Moore v. Schneider, 196 Cal. 380, 385, 238 P. 81. The respondents concede the rule, but insist that it is not applicable here because they were not the moving parties in this litigation, and because MacKay, having knowledge of the fraudulent purpose of the transfer, is also estopped through his heirs from claiming any benefits out of Thompson's fraud. No authority has been cited holding that a party who has thus been estopped from becoming an actor in a court of equity because of his own fraud may obtain all that he could seek in a court of equity by committing another fraud which puts his adversary on the offensive. We are not disposed to examine the point further, because we are convinced that the evidence fully supports the conclusion of the trial court that from the time of the organization of the corporations down to the death of MacKay the latter held all the stock of the Omer C. Thompson Company in trust for Thompson, and that he held all the stock of the Thompson-MacKay Company in trust for Thompson and himself according to their proportionate share. We are also convinced that the undisputed evidence compels a finding that the interest of Thompson and MacKay in the stock of the Thompson-MacKay Company was an undivided one-half interest in each. It will, however, be necessary to take further evidence to determine the values of these properties and assets and to take an accounting as prayed for in the complaint.

The judgment is therefore reversed, with instructions to the trial court to take evidence upon these issues alone and to enter judgment in accordance with the views expressed herein, awarding to each appellant his proportionate share, and to grant to the appellants such further relief as may be necessary to finally dispose of the controversy.

PEOPLE v. GIBBONS. (Cr. 1637.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 9, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 5, 1928.

1. Burglary ⟹4—Defendant could not be convicted of burglary where structure from which property was alleged to have been stolen was bin open on one side.

Defendant could not be convicted of crime of burglary where structure from which property was alleged to have been stolen consisted of bin having three sides and a roof, since breaking into some kind of a structure is essential element of burglary.

2. Criminal law ⟹1114(1)—Appellate court must apply law to record before it.

It is duty of appellate court to apply law to record before it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Venice Gibbons was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

M. H. Broyles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant, Venice Gibbons, and two codefendants, Tippen and Simpson, were charged jointly by an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with burglary, with receiving stolen property, and conspiracy to commit a felony. During the trial counts 2 and 3, charging receiving stolen goods and conspiracy to commit a felony, respectively, were dismissed. Appellant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and from the judgment pronounced by the court thereon he appeals.

[1, 2] It is first contended that the verdict is contrary to the evidence because, it is said, the structure from which the evidence tended to show the stolen property to have been taken was not of such a nature as to permit of the crime of burglary being committed therein. In this regard the record discloses that certain aluminum was taken from a bin having three sides and a roof. However, the roof consisted of the floor of a building called by the witnesses a "bag house," which it was testified was completely inclosed. The side of the bin which was open faced on a yard which was entirely fenced, but there was no roof over the yard. In response to questions by the trial court, the witness Snyder, an officer of the corporation owning the premises from which the aluminum was taken, stated that the bin is not a cellar or basement; that it is on a level with the lot; that over this bin is "a bag house for the reception of all smokes"; that the floor of the bag house is up from the ground some six or eight feet, and forms the roof of the bin, "and it is walled in except one side."

It is true, as stated in People v. Coffee, 52 Cal. App. 118, 198 P. 213, that in this state the statutory definition of burglary is much more comprehensive than the definition of the same offense at common law. In that case a chicken house was held to be a structure which might be burglarized. The same was the ruling in People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 242, and in People v. Franco, 79 Cal. App. 682, 250 P. 698, a showcase was broken open. It was held that the taking of shoes therefrom was burglary, because, it was pointed out, the showcase was a part of, and was under the roof of, the store building to which it was attached, and the court concluded that such a showcase was a "house" within the meaning of section 459 of our Penal Code.

However, in each of these cases, and others cited in People v. Franco, supra, the structure had four sides and a roof. The showcase was completely inclosed, and so were the chicken houses. We are cited to no case, and know of none, where the element of the definition of burglary which requires a breaking into some kind of structure has been held to be nonessential. The common law, of course, required that the building be a human habitation. This is not necessary under our statutes, but as said in People v. Coffee, supra, the structure need only be one having four sides and a roof. The bin in question being open on one side does not measure up to that definition. This case may be another example of a guilty man escaping punishment because the prosecuting officer has persisted in pressing a charge which is not justified under the evidence when apparently there was ample evidence to sustain a verdict of guilty of grand theft. It is the duty of this court, of course, to apply the law to the record before us, and since the testimony is uncontradicted in establishing the facts as above related, the defendant's contention is fully sustained.

It is not necessary to pass upon other points presented by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

91 Cal. App. 640

SIMPSON et al. v. SCHURRA et al.
(Civ. 5816.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⚿267(1)—Contract for sale of community realty signed only by husband held not binding on wife (Civ. Code, §§ 172a, 1624).

The relation of husband and wife does not of itself confer on husband any authority to act for wife, and, under Civ. Code, §§ 172a, 1624, wife was not liable on contract for sale of community property signed only by husband, in absence of proof of his authority to sign for her.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚿345—Purchasers not complying with land contract held not entitled to damages for vendor's breach (Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1440).

Where purchasers tendered one mortgage instead of two provided for by escrow instructions and their tender of performance was in other respects defective, they were not entitled to damages for vendor's breach of contract, under Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1440.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚿22—Provision of land contract excepting one-half acre with 72-foot frontage out of frontage of 464 feet held unenforceable for indefiniteness.

In contract for sale of land having about 464-foot frontage, provision reserving to vendor the right to move house on property to give vendor a frontage of 72 feet and including area of one-half acre held unenforceable for want of definite description of land excepted in reservation; parol evidence being inadmissible to furnish description.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚿22—Uncertainty of description of property reserved to vendor by land contract held not to render entire contract void but exception only fell.

Where exception in land contract reserving portion of land to vendor was unenforceable because of uncertainty of description, held, that uncertainty did not render entire contract void, but exception only failed, leaving contract to stand without the exception.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by J. B. Simpson and others against Celestine Schurra and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is an action by the purchasers to recover from the vendors damages for breach of a contract for the sale of real property. The court found that the defendants Schurra refused in bad faith to perform the contract; that the plaintiffs had performed all of the conditions thereof on their part to be performed and suffered certain damages by reason of defendants' nonperformance; and that defendants Meiling did not refuse to perform, but were ready and willing to do so. Judgment was rendered against both defendants Schurra for the amount of the damages so found, and from this judgment they appeal.

From the evidence the following facts appear: The real property involved in this controversy is a rectangular tract of land described as lots 132, 133, 134, 135, 164, 165, 166, and 167 of the East Ocean park tract (which tract is a subdivision of a portion of the Rancho La Ballona District Court Case 965), and a vacated railway right of way 50 feet wide running between lots 133 and 166 on one side and lots 134 and 165 on the other. On October 20, 1923, the defendant J. A. W. Meiling owned in severalty the northerly part of this tract of land, and the defendant Celestine Schurra owned the remainder of said tract as the community property of himself and his wife, the defendant Nellie Schurra. On the date last mentioned, the plaintiffs and the defendants Celestine Schurra and J. A. W. Meiling entered into a written agreement as follows:

"Oct. 20/23.

"A temporary agreement between F. B. Simpson, J. G. Guerin, Walt Keeshen, the buyers, and Celestin Schurra, J. A. W. Meiling's concerning the sale of a piece of property known as Rancho La Ballona District Court Case 965, lots 132, 167, 133, 166, 134, 135, 165, and 164.

tion of $28,000.00 net to us on the following terms of $1,000.00 cash which receipt is hereby acknowledged by the party of the second part and the balance of $9,000.00 cash to be paid at close of escrow (the escrow to be put through the Title Guarantee Trust, Fifth and Broadway, Los Angeles), together with $18,000.00/100 as a first mortgage to run for three years bearing 7 per cent. interest. The parties of the second part agrees to give a mortgage with release clauses and will permit the property to be subdivided as the buyers think fit.

"The release clause will contain the following conditions the parties of the second party will release the lots when 50 per cent. of the selling value is paid up in full.

"The parties of the second party agree to permit the parties of the first to move the house now on the property at the expense of the parties of the first part. The house to be moved so as to give the party of the second part 72-foot frontage, the total ground space including one-half acre. The frontage to be on Burkshire avenue. The parties of the second part are released from paying any commission on this deal. F. B. Simpson.
"J. G. Guerin.
"Walt Keeshen.
"C. Schurra.
"J. A. W. Meiling."

On October 22, 1923, these parties went to the office of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, and certain escrow instructions were then signed and delivered to said company. In behalf of the purchasers these instructions were signed only by plaintiff Keeshen, although the instructions called for a deed conveying the property to all of the plaintiffs. The instructions were also signed by the defendant J. A. W. Meiling and Celestine Schurra. These instructions were in the usual form of such documents and they differed from the agreement above quoted by excepting from the property to be conveyed the east one-half of lot 165, and by including therein "that portion described as parcel 2 in T. I. & T. Co. Guar. 619426." We assume, although we have found no evidence to that effect, that the last-mentioned parcel was the right of way above mentioned. Different provisions were also made regarding the mortgage which the purchasers were to execute, and the form of the release clause to be contained therein, the escrow instructions calling for one mortgage securing a note for $7,500 in favor of J. A. W. Meiling on the land owned by him and another mortgage securing a note for $10,500 in favor of defendants Schurra, as joint tenants, on the land owned by Schurra. They also provided that the buyers would take the property subject to certain incumbrances not mentioned in the agreement.

After these escrow instructions were drawn, and while the parties were still in the escrow office, the plaintiff Keeshen wrote, and the defendant Celestine Schurra signed, the following paper:

"Memorandum of Agreement.

"On this 22d day of October, I, Celestine Schurra, do hereby agree to transfer my right and title to the ½ acre of block 165 excepted from escrow, in exchange for a tract of land out of original acreage sold to Walt Keeshen, John Guerin, and F. B. Simpson, which must total ½ acre with not less than 72-foot frontage on Burkshire boulevard. It being understood that Mr. Schurra's house is to be moved, if necessary, to permit surveyors to subdivide property in such manner as to give largest number of lots without waste of land. This transfer to be executed at close of escrow.

"It will be further understood that acreage accepted by Mr. Schurra must also front new boulevard, to be laid out, as well as Burkshire boulevard.

"Signed this 22d day of October, 1923.
"By C. Schurra."

After considerable negotiation the plaintiffs were unable to agree with defendant C. Schurra as to the location of the land to be retained by him. Schurra refused to perform the agreement as demanded by the plaintiffs, and they refused to accept performance on Schurra's terms, and this suit followed.

The appellants made and deposited in escrow with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company a deed conveying to the plaintiffs the whole of the land above described, except a strip fronting 72 feet on Burkshire avenue and extending back 302 feet along the northerly side of the proposed new boulevard.

The plaintiffs deposited in the same escrow a mortgage and notes. This mortgage itself was present at the trial, but for some reason it was not introduced in evidence and is not in the record. The only definite showing as to its terms was while plaintiff Simpson was on the stand. The mortgage was shown to him by Mr. Odell, counsel for appellants, on cross-examination, and thereupon the following occurred:

"Mr. Odell: Counsel stipulated this morning —I thought he stipulated that this did cover the whole property without any exception. Is that the stipulation that you are willing to enter in?

"Mr. Law: I stipulated that it covered all the property that I understood they were given.

"Mr. Odell: In fact, it covers the whole property. I have checked it over. I think it covers the whole property, including everything Schurra should have excepted, which is all the lots. That describes the railroad right of way by metes and bounds.

"Mr. Law: Really, I don't know. I can't tell what it does cover. * * *

"Mr. Odell: I would like counsel to check it because I say it does cover the whole property without any exception whatever. * * *

"Q. You never did sign any other mortgage, did you, than this one? A. Nothing more than I—

"Mr. Law: We will stipulate, if it will do you any good, that this mortgage will cover all the property.

"Mr. Odell: Then it is so stipulated."

From this we understand that there was only one mortgage and that it covered all the property above described, including the railway right of way which was not included in the first contract, and the half of lot 165, which was excepted by the escrow instructions.

[1] From the foregoing review of the evidence it appears that none of the writings connected with the transaction were signed by the defendant Nellie Schurra; nor was there any proof of an authority, written or otherwise, empowering C. Schurra to act for her. She was the wife of C. Schurra, and the property was their community property. The first point made by appellants is that these two facts alone do not warrant a judgment against her for breach of the contract. Respondents concede that this point is well taken and consent to a reversal of the judgment against Nellie Schurra. We fully agree with appellants and respondents that the judgment against her cannot be supported. The relation of husband and wife does not of itself confer upon the husband any authority to act for his wife. Section 172a of the Civil Code provides that no contract of sale of the community real property is valid against the wife unless she joins with her husband in executing it. A holding that she is liable on such a contract which she did not execute at all would directly contravene this section and also section 1624 of the Civil Code, which requires such a contract to be in writing subscribed by the party to be charged.

Appellants contend that the plaintiffs are not entitled to sue for a breach of the contract, because the plaintiffs did not perform the contract on their part, and that the finding in plaintiffs' favor on this issue is not supported by the evidence. One who sues another for breach of a contract must show that he has performed all conditions of the contract on his part which are precedent to performance by the defendant and that he is able and has offered to perform all concurrent conditions on his part, except when he is excused from such performance. Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1440; 6 Cal. Jur. 480. Before applying this rule it is necessary to ascertain what obligations are imposed on the plaintiffs by the contract, and this leads us to the inquiry: What is the contract between the parties in this case? The evidence discloses that three written instruments were signed by some or all of the parties, and the plaintiffs' claim is that these are not two or three separate agreements but one agreement, and that from them all a definite written agreement appears for the sale of the property described in the complaint on the terms set forth therein. The rule is well established that:

> "When several papers concerning one subject-matter are separately executed by the same parties, all are to be construed together as one contract. The intention of the parties is to be gathered from all the instruments, taken together, and the recitals in each may be explained or corrected by reference to any other." 6 Cal. Jur. 298; Civ. Code, § 1642.

Here, however, no two of the papers were signed by the same parties, and hence the application of this rule to them may be doubted.

[2] On examining the instruments in question we see that the second, the escrow instructions, if effective, must have superseded the first, which was, in its own words, "a temporary agreement"; for the escrow instructions covered the same ground and made different provisions for nearly all parts of the agreement except the parties and the price. It further appears, however, that, while the same three purchasers were named in the escrow instructions as in the first agreement, only one of them signed the instructions. The question at once arises whether the want of the signatures of the other two purchasers prevented the instructions from becoming effective. This question we need not decide, because the papers tendered by plaintiffs as performance did not satisfy either of the instruments in question. Under either of them the execution of the mortgage or mortgages by the plaintiffs must be regarded as a condition concurrent with the conveyance of the land by the defendants, and the plaintiffs must therefore have performed or offered to perform it in order to recover in this action. They make no contention that they were excused from doing so, and hence we give no consideration to that as a possibility. As we have already seen, the mortgage which they tendered in performance covered the vacated railway right of way, which was not described in the first agreement, and hence their tender was not insufficient under that agreement. They tendered only one mortgage instead of two as provided in the escrow instructions, and it covered the east half of lot 165 which was excepted from those instructions, and the tender therefore failed as a compliance with the instructions.

The third writing relates and refers only to the escrow instructions. It does not purport to be a modification of the agreement set forth in the instructions, but is merely an attempt to confer on the plaintiffs, who did not sign it, and hence cannot be bound by it, an option to require an exchange of the properties therein referred to. It appears to be fatally uncertain in its description of the property to be received by Schurra, under the rule hereinafter stated on that point. However it is regarded, it does not help plaintiffs' tender as an offer of performance under the escrow instructions. Since the plaintiffs made no other tender than that which we have already considered and found insufficient, the finding in their favor on the issue of performance is without support in the evidence. The error in this finding necessitates a reversal of the judgment as to both appellants.

[3] Appellants in their answer set up a

counterclaim against the plaintiffs for damages for breach of the same contract on which plaintiffs sued and contend on this appeal that they should have had judgment on the counterclaim. In view of the possibility of a new trial this contention should be disposed of. In order to recover damages for such a breach appellants also must show that they performed or offered to perform their obligations under the agreement. This they did not do. The deed tendered by them in performance excepted a considerable parcel of land which was covered by the first agreement and by the escrow instructions. They claim that this exception was authorized by the concluding paragraph of the first agreement, which provides for the moving of a house on the land. The intent to except a part of the land described in the agreement from the conveyance to be made is not clearly expressed in the language used; but, if such an intent can be found therein, the provision is uncertain and incapable of enforcement for want of a definite description of the land excepted. The only matters of description stated in connection with the supposed exception are that the land excepted shall have a total ground space of one-half acre, and a frontage of 72 feet on Burkshire avenue. There is a map in evidence which shows that Burkshire avenue was an existing street when this agreement was made, and that the land described had a frontage thereon of about 464 feet. The 72-foot frontage mentioned in the supposed exception could, so far as the agreement provides, be located anywhere on this 464 feet. The fact that there was a house on the property does not identify the land excepted because of the provision that the house is to be moved. This is an uncertainty which cannot be removed by parol evidence.

"The contract or memorandum in writing must so describe the property which is contracted for that it can be identified with reasonable certainty. It is insufficient to describe it by quantity alone, or by a quantity to be taken out of a larger tract without indicating out of what part it is to be taken, or giving to one party the right to select such tract, or by giving only the starting point and one side." 39 Cyc. 1223, 1224.

"Parol evidence cannot be heard to furnish a description. The only purpose for which such evidence can be heard is to apply the description given to the subject-matter. * * * It is not sufficient to allege that, by the imperfect description given in the contract, the parties intended to convey certain property." Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202-208, 20 P. 386, 389.

"An agreement for the sale of real property must not only be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, but the writing must also contain such a description of the property agreed to be sold, either in terms or by reference, that it can be ascertained without resort to parol evidence. Parol evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of identifying the description contained in the writing with its location upon the ground, but not for the purpose of ascertaining and locating the land about which the parties negotiated and supplying a description thereof which they have omitted from the writing. * * * The statute of frauds was originally enacted 'for the prevention of frauds and perjuries,' and an agreement for the sale of land is required to be in writing in order that this purpose may be accomplished. The whole object of the statute would be frustrated if any substantive portion of the agreement could be established by parol evidence. A description of the land intended to be conveyed is one of the most essential parts of the agreement, and must be contained in the writing." Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 105, 69 P. 853.

[4] This uncertainty in the exception does not void the contract as a whole. The exception only fails, leaving the contract to stand without the exception. Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

W. D. Smith was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar B. Hervey, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Elmer W. Heald, Dist. Atty., and Edward B. Patterson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of El Centro, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was convicted by a jury in the superior court of Imperial county of the crime of embezzlement. The indictment charged that on or about November 9, 1926, the said W. D. Smith was the duly elected, qualified, and acting city treasurer of the city of Imperial, a city of the sixth class; that, by virtue of his trust as such city officer, there came into his possession and under his control the sum of $218.46 of the personal property of said city, and that, while said money was so in his possession and under his control as such officer, appellant feloniously and fraudulently appropriated it to his own use, not in the due and lawful execution of his official trust.

It appears that on the date mentioned the city recorder of the city of Imperial had on deposit with the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank the sum of $342, which had been collected in fines from various defendants who had been brought before him; that he delivered to the city clerk a check for that amount, which check the clerk in turn delivered to appellant, and was given a receipt therefor by the latter as city treasurer; that Smith deposited the same in said bank to the account of "Imperial Street Improvement Bond." Thereafter, and on November 9, 1926, appellant withdrew from the account last mentioned $218.46, by a check which he made payable to the Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, and which he signed, "Imperial Street Improvement Bonds, by W. D. Smith, City Treasurer," and deposited with the latter by deposit slip dated "11—9—1926," to the account of "Depositor: W. D. Smith, Trustee." It appears by documentary evidence and the testimony of witnesses for the people that the fines collected were deposited in an account other than that legally provided therefor; that, on the same day on which he drew the check for $218.46, he withdrew from this account and paid to the said Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, by a check which was introduced in evidence, the sum of $176.99, on account of his personal note to said bank, and during the succeeding six days appellant paid other personal obligations by checks drawn upon the amount so deposited of the funds withdrawn from the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank.

[1] This appeal from the judgment, founded upon the jury's verdict of guilty and from an order denying a new trial, is based principally upon the contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain such judgment. The facts herein stated are set forth in appellant's brief, and it is there admitted that they were "undisputed, and constituted the evidence relied upon by the prosecution for the conviction." It is argued, however, that Smith could not legally be guilty of embezzlement, since he was permitted to show, over objections of the prosecution, and it is also undisputed, that on November 15, 1926, or about two weeks after having received the check for $342, he deposited another check for that identical amount of money in the Imperial city treasury account, and that an official audit thereafter showed that there was no deficiency. No authorities are attempted to be cited in support of appellant's theory, but it is insisted that, had he at the outset deposited to the credit of the city treasury account $342 of his own funds, and used the moneys represented by the check of the city clerk, no offense would have been committed; that the street bond account was at no time short; that at the time of the audit, and at the conclusion of his term of office, all of the various accounts were properly balanced; and that the prosecution therefore failed to prove a shortage. Assuming, but not deciding, that such would have been the result were appellant's theory borne out by the facts, it remains that there was a shortage of $342 in the city treasury account for a period of several days, and that appellant used funds belonging to the city of Imperial by manipulating them through other accounts, including his own. Public moneys are jealously safeguarded by the statutes of this state, and we know of no authority which exempts or affords immunity from punishment to those who unlawfully expend public funds or who misappropriate them with the intention of subsequently reimbursing the municipality, even though such intention be fulfilled. The evidence was obviously sufficient, regardless of succeeding events, to support the verdict and judgment convicting the defendant of the offense with which he was charged, since the fact that he appropriated personal property of the city to his own use is not denied, but is in fact frankly admitted.

[2] It is next complained that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury, in that they were told that restoration of embezzled property "authorizes the court to mitigate the punishment." It is argued that this left for the jury to decide as to whether or not there had been a restoration, coupled with an inducement to convict, with the expectation that the punishment would be minimized, whereas the court had no power to mitigate the term of imprisonment of one convicted of the offense under consideration. Authorities are cited by appellant which condemn instructions tending to hold out some promise, or to lead the jury to believe, that, if a verdict of guilty be returned, the sentence will be light. The trial court had no authority to mitigate the punishment of a public official convicted of embezzlement, but it has been held that, where the court stated to a jury, in response to a question by the foreman asking if the jury might recommend leniency, that they might make any recommendation they saw fit, it was not prejudicial, since their province was solely to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused, and that such instruction did not contain any intimation of the effect of such recommendation, nor lead them to suppose that the court would in the event of a conviction reduce the punishment. People v. Caiazza, 61 Cal. App. 505, 510, 215 P. 80. The situation here presented is the same in principle. Furthermore, in the instant case the jury were expressly instructed as follows:

> "It is the duty of the jury to decide whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty of the offense charged, considering all the evidence submitted to you in the case. It is not for you to consider the penalty prescribed for the punishment of the offense, and, if you are aware of the penalty prescribed by law, it is your duty to disregard that knowledge. In other words, your sole duty is to decide whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty of what he is charged with. The prosecution of punishment is left wholly to the court, except as the law circumscribes its power."

[3] It appears that the jury appended to their verdict a recommendation that the defendant be placed on probation. Appellant also obtained from four of the jurors, and incorporated in the record upon appeal, affidavits wherein they asserted that they were influenced to arrive at such verdict by the belief that leniency would be extended by the trial court. It is the law of this state that public officials who embezzle the funds of their offices must be denied probation, and juries have no authority to accompany verdicts with recommendations. People v. Caiazza, supra. Hence it seems clear that the argument that such recommendation and the affidavits of the jurors adds weight to the contention that an inadvertent and improvidently worded instruction, though nonprejudicial, constitutes reversible error, is without merit.

[4, 5] It is next seriously insisted that certain instructions which related the facts of the case as heretofore stated, and charged that, if they should be believed from all of the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, in that event the defendant would as a matter of law be guilty of embezzlement, were prejudicial, because they omitted the element of fraudulent and criminal intent. It appears that the charge to the jury embraced the provisions of section 20 of the Penal Code, that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent," and other admonitions of like import, by which the jurors were told that they should not return a verdict of guilty in the case before them, unless convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant intended to convert to his own use and to embezzle moneys of the city of Imperial, of which he was the duly constituted and acting treasurer. From the charge as a whole, which must be read together, it cannot be said that there is ground for complaint that this element of the offense was withheld from the jury's consideration. People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928.

[6] The only other instruction given which requires consideration is one to the effect that a defendant in a criminal case cannot be compelled to take the stand as a witness against himself, but that, if he offers himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined by counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief; that his neglect to testify cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him. It is contended that this instruction singled out the defendant, centering the attention of the jury upon the fact that he did not testify, and may have led them to believe that he refrained from doing so through fear of cross-examination. We agree with appellant that, in view of the fact that the defendant did not take the stand, the giving of this instruction was clearly error. However, in the instant case we are satisfied from a careful reading of the entire record that, upon the admitted facts, the defendant's guilt was established beyond question; and that no substantial right of his was prejudiced by this wrongful instruction; that no miscarriage of justice can result from affirming the judgment, and, on the authority of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution, it will not be made a basis for reversal.

The only remaining points attempted to be made by appellant consist of assignments of alleged error in refusing certain instructions that were offered. Those tendered, and to which exceptions are taken, were either not justified by the evidence or were fully covered by instructions given.

No error appearing, the judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

4. Witnesses ⟹40(2)—Matter of determining whether child was qualified to testify was within trial judge's discretionary power.

Matter of determining whether child was or was not qualified to testify as witness in prosecution for violation of Pen. Code, § 288, was within discretionary power of trial judge.

Appeal from Superior Court of Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

James McKelvey was convicted of violation of Penal Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 397.

Thomas P. White, A. P. G. Steffes, and Vincent C. Hickson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Appellant was charged, by an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, with the crime of violation of section 288 of the Penal Code of the state of California. This section is commonly referred to as the "lewd and lascivious section," and denounces as a felony, lewd and lascivious conduct when displayed, in the manner provided in the section, upon the body of a child under the age of 14 years.

From a verdict of guilty, and the judgment pronounced by the court thereon, the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

Two grounds are presented upon which a reversal is urged. First. That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. Second. That the trial court erred in refusing to permit one Alice Loomis, a six year old child, offered as a witness by the defendant, to testify. In view of our conclusions upon the points raised by appellant, we do not deem it necessary to give an extended recital of the evidence presented in the trial.

The complaining witness was a young girl seven years of age at the time of the trial. The offense charged is alleged to have occurred about six months prior thereto. The defendant admitted, as testified to by the complaining witness, that she was a stranger to him; that he met her on her way home from school; and that upon his invitation she accompanied him to his home, where he gave her some moving picture films. The child's story of misconduct of the defendant in a street tunnel, shortly after the defendant first accosted her, and of continued acts of misconduct when she was with him in his home was denied by the defendant. She further testified that no one else was present at the time they were in the tunnel together, and that she saw no one other than the defendant when she was in his house.

[1] Appellant, in urging his first point, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, contends at length in his brief that the testimony of the complaining witness, by reason of her immature years, is entitled to but little, if any, weight, and further points out that there is some difference between her story as told on the witness stand and statements previously made by her in connection with the occurrences prior to and at the time the alleged offense was committed. It appears from the record that before the complaining witness was allowed to testify, she was carefully examined on voir dire both by the district attorney and by the court. When counsel for the defendant was invited to further examine the witness for the purpose of determining whether or not she was qualified to testify, he declined to do so, nor did he make any objection to the witness testifying on the ground of her incapacity. We are therefore justified in assuming that the defendant was satisfied that the complaining witness was not disqualified to testify as a witness by reason of her immature years.

[2] The voluminous record discloses a marked conflict in the testimony as to matters having a material bearing upon the question of guilt or innocence of the defendant. Offenses of the character here charged, as a rule, are not committed under circumstances that furnish direct corroboration to the story of the complaining witness as to the acts of mistreatment. Hence the character, intelligence, and demeanor of the witnesses who testified before the jury may be of controlling importance in determining where the truth lies, and this becomes especially true in weighing the testimony of an immature witness who may be lacking in that direct and intelligent response to questions which is expected from mature witnesses. While the uncorroborated story of the complaining witness, if believed by the jury, is sufficient to support a verdict of guilty, here, in addition to the child's recital, is the admission of the defendant that he met her on her way home from school, and, although a stranger to him, he took her to his home and there gave her the picture films, the offer of which, according to the child's testimony, was what induced her to accompany him to his home. In addition, there is testimony of the officers as to certain statements made by the defendant when he was arrested and, also, their testimony describing his conduct and demeanor when he was being questioned by the officers concerning the child's story. This testimony was of such a character that, if believed by the jury, it might well have formed the basis from which the jury would have been justified in drawing inferences that would corroborate the child's story.

To the jury, as the sole judges of the credibility of a witness, is assigned the duty of determining the weight to be given to the testimony of a witness, and, when the jury has performed this function and entered its decision, neither the trial court nor this court on review will interfere with that decision unless it appears that the verdict was without substantial foundation. We are frank to say that, so far as the cold transcript would disclose, the continuity of the story as told by the child, the concise answers given to questions propounded to her, her adherence under cross-examination to the same incidents in substantially the same way, all would do credit to a child twice as old as the complaining witness. While there is some conflict, as pointed out by appellant, in the different recitals given by the child of the incidents leading up to and occurring during the alleged misconduct, it does not appear that these discrepancies differ in character or extent from those which not infrequently appear in the several stories of an incident given by matured men and women. Furthermore, the fact that the trial judge denied the defendant's motion for a new trial has an important bearing in our consideration of this question. It cannot be denied that evidence was presented in the trial which tended to prove the charge, and the learned judge of the court below, in refusing to grant a new trial, has indicated that he is satisfied with the sufficiency of the evidence. He had the opportunity, which is not presented to us, to observe the witnesses and form a better conclusion upon the weight and effect of their testimony than we have by reading the cold recital as it appears in the record. We are justified in assuming that if the complaining witness' testimony was accompanied by the indications of weakness that are urged by appellant, the learned trial judge would have observed such deficiency and granted a new trial. People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 P. 1002; People v. Ellis, 188 Cal. 682, 206 P. 753.

[3] A careful review of the evidence as shown by the record convinces us that the instant case is one that comes well within the rule that, where the evidence is in conflict, this court, on appeal, will not disturb the jury's verdict. People v. Nowak, 76 Cal. App. 216, 244 P. 634.

[4] The second point urged by appellant arises from a ruling by the court refusing to permit one Alice Loomis, a six year old girl, to testify as a witness on behalf of the defendant. The record discloses that a somewhat extended examination on voir dire was had to determine the qualifications of the child. Without detailing this examination, it suffices to say that the child disclosed a marked inability to remember things which most children of that age would recall. In any event, we are satisfied that the matter of determining whether the child was or was not qualified to testify as a witness was well within the discretionary power of the trial judge, and, in our opinion, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit the child to testify. People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 460, 150 P. 389; People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 P. 186; People v. Gregory, 8 Cal. App. 738, 97 P. 912.

This disposes of the only points raised by appellant. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

HOGAN v. PADDON et al. (COLEY et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3501.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. May 5, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1236—Proceeding to obtain, on motion in original suit, judgment against sureties on appeal bond is permitted only on statutory undertaking (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

Proceeding to obtain on motion in an original suit judgment against sureties on undertaking on appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, is permitted only on statutory undertaking.

2. Divorce 🔑283—Where husband appeals from alimony order, court may consider monthly allowance and probable duration of appeal in fixing amount of supersedeas bond (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

Where husband appeals from order in divorce action that he pay wife certain sum a month as alimony, court is authorized, in determining amount of supersedeas bond required by Code Civ. Proc. § 942, to take into consideration amount of monthly allowance and probable duration of appeal.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1236—Sureties to undertaking on appeal in effect voluntarily made themselves parties to action and submitted themselves to court's jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

When sureties to undertaking on appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, agreed that in case of affirmance of judgment by appellate court and of its nonpayment by judgment debtor judgment might be entered against them in court from whose judgment appeal was taken, they in effect voluntarily made themselves parties to action and submitted themselves to jurisdiction of court.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1236—By signing appeal bond, sureties consented judgment should be entered against them on motion for amount as to which judgment appealed from was affirmed.

Where court estimated duration of appeal from alimony order at 17 months, which would have placed amount of judgment at $5,100, and fixed amount of undertaking on appeal from order at $10,200, but length of time that elapsed from date of order to date of affirmance by Supreme Court was 19 months, making amount husband was directed to pay wife by virtue of order and affirmance $5,700, exclusive of interest and costs, sureties were liable for $5,700, plus interest and costs, since by signing undertaking sureties consented that judgment should be entered against them on motion for amount as to which judgment appealed from was affirmed.

5. Judgment 🔑887—Where execution was issued for full amount of judgment, but sheriff erroneously levied for smaller amount, plaintiff did not release part of judgment.

Where execution was issued for $6,595.38, full amount of judgment against sureties on appeal bond, but sheriff, through error, neglected to fill in copies of execution with sum of judgment, filling in blank for costs to amount of $73 only, and sheriff levied execution on real estate and sold same for $40, making sale and giving and recording notices of levy and sale in accordance with erroneous amount of judgment, but made return upon original execution showing full amount of judgment, judgment creditor did not release all of judgment in excess of $73.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1227—Where husband paid money to wife after affirmance of judgment for alimony without directions, wife could apply payments on alimony accruing after affirmance (Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 2).

Under Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 2, where husband, after affirmance of order to pay alimony to wife, made payments to her without directing application of money, wife could apply such payments to monthly alimony accruing after affirmance of judgment, and was not bound to credit such payments on judgment against sureties on husband's appeal bond.

7. Principal and surety 🔑113—Generally, where principal makes payment from his funds free from equity in favor of surety, surety cannot direct application of payment.

Generally, where principal makes payment from funds which are his own and which are free from any equity in favor of surety to have money applied to debt for which surety is liable, surety has no power to direct that payment shall be applied to any particular debt.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1236—Bond given on appeal from alimony order held to be "statutory bond," and court could render judgment thereon without notice to sureties (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

Bond given on appeal by husband from order to pay wife alimony, for sum of $10,200, being double amount named in court's order for period of 17 months, stating that if order appealed from should be affirmed appellant would pay plaintiff amount directed and damages and costs, and if he did not make payment within 30 days after filing remittitur judgment might be entered on motion against sureties, held to be statutory bond under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, and court was authorized to render judgment thereon without notice to sureties.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action to vacate judgments and to restrain enforcement thereof by Walter L. Hogan against Una Margaret Locke Paddon and others, in which J. A. Coley and another intervened. From the judgment, plaintiff and interveners appeal. Affirmed.

Harold C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for appellant Hogan.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for intervening appellants.

Preston & Duncan and C. A. Linn, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This was an action brought by appellant Walter L. Hogan, in which interveners joined, to vacate a certain judgment theretofore rendered against plaintiff and Charles L. Paddon and to restrain respondents from the enforcement of said judgment and to vacate a certain judgment rendered against interveners and to restrain the enforcement of said last-named judgment.

The facts leading up to the bringing of this action are as follows:

On November 3, 1922, in a certain action then pending, wherein Una Margaret Locke Paddon was plaintiff and William Locke Paddon was defendant, the court made an order requiring said defendant to pay to said plaintiff, pendente lite, alimony in the sum of $300 per month and the further sums of $200 on account of attorney fees and costs amounting to $100.

From this order said defendant appealed, and, to stay execution, executed an appeal bond in the sum of $10,200 with W. L. Hogan and Charles L. Paddon as sureties. The said order appealed from was affirmed, and thereafter, on motion of Una Margaret Locke Paddon, judgment was rendered in her favor against the said sureties on said appeal bond, namely, W. L. Hogan and Charles L. Paddon, for the sum of $6,595.38.

From this judgment appellant Hogan and his cosurety Charles L. Paddon appealed, and upon this appeal gave a supersedeas bond in the sum of $13,200 to stay execution, with the interveners herein as sureties. The appeal of said Hogan and said Charles L. Locke Paddon was dismissed, and thereafter, on motion, judgment was rendered against said interveners, as sureties on said last-named appeal bond for $6,773.55. On January 27, 1926, respondent Una Margaret Locke Paddon had an execution issued against appellant Hogan and his cosurety, Charles L. Locke Paddon, on said judgment rendered against them as aforesaid, for the amount of said judgment, to wit, $6,595.38, directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and thereafter said sheriff returned said execution satisfied to the extent of $38.40.

On April 2, 1926, said Una Margaret Locke Paddon had another execution issued on said last-named judgment for the sum of $6,788.37 against said appellant Hogan and his cosurety, Charles L. Paddon, which was levied upon the lands of appellant Hogan, and the same were advertised for sale by said sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Thereupon appellant Hogan began this action, and upon the trial thereof judgment was rendered in favor of respondent Una Margaret Locke Paddon, and from which judgment appellant Hogan and said interveners have appealed.

Appellants have specified five reasons why this last-named judgment should be reversed, the first of which is that the supersedeas bond given by William Locke Paddon to stay execution upon appeal from the order for the payment of the $300 per month alimony to said Una Margaret Locke Paddon, in her action against William Locke Paddon, and which appeal bond was signed and executed by appellant Hogan and his cosurety, Charles L. Paddon, was not a statutory bond; that is to say, it was not the kind of a bond upon which the court was authorized to enter a judgment on motion after an affirmance by the Supreme Court.

[1] It is well settled by the decisions of the higher courts that a proceeding to obtain, on motion, in an original suit, a judgment against sureties, under section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is permitted only on a statutory undertaking. McCallion v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 98 Cal. 442, 33 P. 329; Loudon v. Loudon, 63 Cal. App. 204, 218 P. 442.

The first bond filed by William Locke Paddon on his appeal from the order of the court that he pay alimony to Una Margaret Locke Paddon in the sum of $300 per month was for the sum of $7,500. On December 28, 1923, by stipulation of the attorneys representing Una Margaret Locke Paddon and William Locke Paddon, the court ordered this bond to be withdrawn and one for $10,200 filed in its place and stead; said last-named bond being as follows:

(Title of court and cause.)

"Whereas, the defendant, William Locke Paddon, in the above-entitled action, has appealed to the Supreme Court from an order made and entered against the defendant in said action, in the said superior court, in favor of the plaintiff in said action, on the 3d day of November, 1922, for the sum of $300.00 per month and the sum of $200.00 counsel fees and $100.00 costs of suit and from the whole thereof.

"The sum of $300.00 having been paid on account of said order.

"And, whereas, the appellant is desirous of staying the execution of said order so appealed from, we, the undersigned, in consideration thereof, and of the premises, jointly and severally, undertake and promise, and do acknowledge ourselves further jointly and severally bound in the further sum of ten thousand two hundred dollars, being double the amount named in the said order for a period 17 months from the date of said order, that if the said order appealed from, or any part thereof be affirmed, or the appeal be dismissed, the appellant will pay the plaintiff herein the amount directed to be paid by the said William Locke Paddon, or the part of such amount as to which the same shall be affirmed, if affirmed only in part, and all damages and costs which may be awarded against the appellant upon the appeal, that if the appellant does not make such payment within thirty (30) days after the filing of the remittitur from the Supreme Court in the Court from which the appeal is taken, judgment may be entered on motion of the respondent, in plaintiff's favor against the undersigned sureties for said sum of $10,200.00, or the amount of the judgment affirmed together with the interest that may be due thereon, and the damages and costs which may be awarded against the appellant on the appeal.

"Witness our hands this 21st day of December, A. D. 1923.

"Chas. L. Paddon."

This appeal bond appears to follow in all respects the requirements of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that if the appeal is from a judgment or order directing the payment of money, the execution thereon is not stayed unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant, with two or more sureties, in double the amount named in the judgment or order. Said section further provides that if the judgment or order be affirmed the appellant will pay the amount directed to be paid by the judgment or order affirmed, together with damages and costs awarded against the appellant on the appeal, and that if he does not make such payment within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur from the Supreme Court in the court from which the appeal is taken, judgment may be entered on motion of the respondent in his favor against the sureties for such amount.

Appellant asserts that this bond is not a statutory bond, because the amount of the bond was fixed by stipulation and not by the statute. As a matter of fact, the amount of the bond was designated by order of the court upon the stipulation of the parties. In the case of Hammond v. United States F. & G. Co., 29 Cal. App. 464, 155 P. 1023, the court said:

"It would seem hardly open to question that in lieu of having the amount of the undertaking fixed by the court, the parties may be permitted to stipulate as to what that amount shall be."

[2] In a case of this kind, that is to say, in an action for divorce, brought by a wife against the husband, in which the court has made an order for the payment by the husband to the wife of a certain sum per month as alimony and the husband appeals from the order, the court is authorized in determining the amount of the supersedeas bond required by said section 942 to take into consideration the amount of the monthly allowance and the probable duration of the appeal in fixing the amount of the bond, which, under the provisions of said section 942, the appellants must give to stay execution upon said order. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 199, 7 P. 456, 635, 8 P. 709; Schallman v. Haas, 33 Cal. App. 28, 164 P. 336; Smith v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 256 P. 419.

In the instant case the court estimated the duration of the appeal at 17 months, which would have placed the amount of the judgment at $5,100, after deducting the $300 that was paid by appellants, and fixed the amount of the bond at $10,200.

[3, 4] Appellant claims that if he and his cosurety were liable on this bond at all, that upon the affirmance of the judgment their liability would be for the sum of $5,100 with interest and costs, which would be $600 less than the amount of the judgment rendered against them. The appeal bond which appellant and his cosurety executed sets forth that the order appealed from was an order entered against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $300 per month, and it further recited that if said order was affirmed that appellant and his cosurety would pay to the plaintiff the amount directed to be paid by the said William Locke Paddon. The length of time that elapsed from the date of the making of said order to the date of the affirmance of the order by the Supreme Court was 19 months, making the amount which William Locke Paddon was directed to pay to his said wife by virtue of said order and affirmance thereof on appeal the sum of $5,700, exclusive of interest and costs.

In the case of Hammond v. United States F. & G. Co., supra, the court said: "The sureties are bound by the statements in their contract, and cannot question the truth of such recitals." While sureties in an instrument may stand on the letter of their bond or undertaking, still, like all other obligations an appeal bond is subject to be so construed as to carry out the obvious intention of the parties. Gerrior v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 186, 230 P. 967.

When the sureties to the undertaking on appeal agreed that in case of the affirmance of the judgment by the appellate court, and of its nonpayment by the judgment debtor, judgment might be entered against them in the court from whose judgment the appeal was taken, they, in effect, voluntarily made themselves parties to the action and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court. Meredith v. S. C. M. A. of Baltimore, 60 Cal. 617.

The position of a surety on an undertaking on appeal is therefore similar to that of an ordinary surety on an obligation who has been regularly joined as a party defendant. La Fleur v. M. A. Burns Lumber Co., 188 Cal. 321, 205 P. 102. It is apparent that by the terms of this appeal bond appellant and his cosurety bound themselves to pay the amount, upon the affirmance of said order, that William Locke Paddon could legally be directed to pay, which was the sum of $5,700 with interest and costs. By signing the undertaking on appeal the surety consented that judgment should be entered against him on motion for the amount as to which the judgment appealed from was affirmed. Gray v. Cotton et al., 174 Cal. 256, 162 P. 1019.

[5] Another claim for reversal of the judgment is that after the entry of the summary judgment against him and his cosurety for said sum of $6,595.38, respondent caused an execution to be issued for the sum of $73 and placed in the hands of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, under which the said sheriff levied upon certain lands belonging to appellant, and that by causing said execution to be issued for the sum of $73, respondent released all of the judgment in excess of that sum. It appears from the evidence that the execution was issued for the full amount of the judgment and that respondent caused the same to be placed in the hands of the sheriff with copies of said execution having blank spaces thereon for amount of judgment and costs. The sheriff, through error or mistake, neglected to fill in on said copies the sum of the judgment, filling in the blank for costs to the amount of $73 only. He levied said execution upon certain real estate owned by appellant and sold the same for $40, making said sale, giving and recording notices of levy and sale in accordance with said erroneous amount of the judgment, as set forth in said copies of the execution. However, in making his motion upon said execution, he made the return upon the original execution, which showed the full amount of the judgment, his return thereon showing satisfaction of said execution in the amount of some $38.

There is authority to the effect that if the judgment creditor issues an execution and directs a levy for an amount less than that to which he was entitled under the judgment he cannot subsequently issue another execution for the balance. Ransom v. Onondaga C. P., 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 331. No evidence was offered in this case that the judgment creditor directed the sheriff to levy for any sum less than the full amount of the judgment. We think that the finding of the court that the execution was issued for the full amount of the judgment and not for the sum of $73 is fully supported by the evidence.

The order of November 3, 1922, requiring William Locke Paddon to pay to his wife alimony in the sum of $300 per month, continued in force up to the time appellant brought this action and was in force at the trial thereof.

[6, 7] After the affirmance by the Supreme Court of this order, and on September 5, 1924, respondent Una Margaret Locke Paddon filed two affidavits for an order to show cause why said William Locke Paddon should not be adjudged in contempt of court for failure to comply with said order of November 3, 1922, and on said last-named date the court made an order citing the said William Locke Paddon to appear before it on September 12, 1924, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. On September 12th the hearing of said last-named order was continued for one week, and thereafter the hearing of said last-named order was continued many times up to about April, 1926.

It appears that on a number of occasions, commencing in September, 1924, and continuing until the fore part of 1926, the injunction issued against William Locke Paddon and the corporations therein named, which injunction had been granted upon the application of Una Margaret Locke Paddon in her action for divorce against William Locke Paddon, was by order of the court modified, and through said modification certain lands against which said injunction was operative were released from said injunction, and by reason thereof sums of money were realized, a portion of which by stipulation of the attorneys representing all the parties named in said injunction were placed to the credit of William Locke Paddon and by him paid over to his said wife to apply on said monthly alimony. The exact amount that was so paid over to said Una Margaret Locke Paddon by William Locke Paddon, accruing from said releases, is not shown, but it was stipulated that it was over $1,500.

It further appears that the total amount paid over to respondent Una Margaret Locke Paddon by William Locke Paddon from September 12, 1924, to the last of March, 1926, was $4,624.82. Appellant claims that this amount should have been credited on the judgment against him and his cosurety. This money was paid to Una Margaret Locke Paddon, or her attorney, by William Locke Paddon, or upon his order, to apply on the monthly alimony ordered by the court. The evidence shows that it was applied on the alimony accruing after the affirmance of the order by the Supreme Court on the appeal of appellant and his cosurety, and that it was paid after Una Margaret Locke Paddon had assigned to John W. Preston all moneys due her by virtue of said judgment against the appellant and his cosurety on the appeal bond.

Appellant cites section 1479 of the Civil Code as authority for his claim that the said sum of $4,624.82 should have been credited on the judgment aforesaid, but subdivision 2 of that section authorizes the creditor to place it upon any obligation due him from the debtor, unless the debtor had specified the particular obligation upon which he desired it applied. No direct specification was made by the debtor in this case, and upon receipt of the money Una Margaret Locke Paddon applied it on the monthly alimony accruing after the said affirmance of the order, and this way of applying said sum of money appears to the court to have been the application intended by the debtor, William Locke Paddon.

As a general proposition, where a principal makes payment from funds which are his own, and which are free from any equity in favor of the surety to have the money applied to the debt for which the surety is liable, the surety has no power to direct that the payment shall be applied to any particular debt. Bross v. McNicholas, 66 Or. 42, 133 P. 782, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1272; Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Herber, 68 Minn. 420, 71 N. W. 624; Crane Co. v. Pac. Heat & Power Co., 36 Wash. 95, 78 P. 460; vol. 21, R. C. L. p. 1128. And in this connection appellant contends that he was released as said surety by reason of said releases upon the theory that the release of the property of the judgment debtor, without the consent of the surety, released the surety to the extent that the judgment creditor was thereby benefited. This contention has nothing to support it. There is no evidence that at the date said releases were made that William Locke Paddon was the owner of any of the property described in said releases. On the contrary, the evidence tends to show that at the date of said releases he did not own any of the property included in them. The moneys secured through some of the releases were paid to him or placed to his account. Just why this was done is not disclosed. Regardless of how that came about, he paid it or caused it to be paid to his said wife or to her attorney, to apply on said monthly alimony.

It does not appear that appellant had, as surety as foresaid, any equity in the funds realized by the aforesaid releases or any right to have them applied on the debt for which he is surety.

[8] The court is of the opinion that the bond on appeal executed by appellant and his cosurety is a statutory bond, and that the court was authorized to render judgment thereon without notice to said sureties, although the judgment recites that appellant was personally present in court at the hearing of said motion.

We deem it unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether or not the issues in this case are moot.

The judgment is affirmed.

WUTCHUMNA WATER CO. v. STEVENSON.

(Sac. 3994).

Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1928.

Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑60(2)—Filing cross-complaint held not to excuse prompt prosecution of action which was properly dismissed, where not prosecuted for over four years (Code Civ. Proc. § 583).

Where plaintiff failed to prosecute action for four years and ten months after defendant's answer had been filed, fact that defendant had also appeared, seeking affirmative relief by way of cross-complaint and counterclaim, did not relieve plaintiff of duty to promptly prosecute its action or of duty of offering, on hearing of defendant's motion to dismiss for want of prosecution under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, some adequate reason or excuse for delay, and, in absence of any showing excusing delay, trial court did not abuse discretion in dismissing action.

Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox, and Power & McFadzean, all of Visalia, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of dismissal of this action given and made under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure for want of prosecution. The action was commenced on August 5, 1921, and was an action for the specific performance of an agreement in writing entered into between the parties on September 6, 1913, by the terms of which the defendant herein agreed to build and construct a levee about and around a certain artificial lake in the county of Tulare known as Woodlake or Bravo lake, such work to be commenced immediately, and to be completed within five years; or, if specific performance was not available, then for damages for the breach of said contract. The defendant, on September 2, 1921, filed his demurrer and answer, and also filed and served a cross-complaint and counterclaim, to which the plaintiff demurred. Nothing further was done in the action until July 20, 1926, when plaintiff, in the meantime having procured a new set of attorneys, gave notice of motion that on July 26, 1926, it would call up said demurrers for hearing and determination. Thereupon the defendant moved for an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution. The plaintiff thereupon filed an answer to defendant's cross-complaint, and the whole matter came on for hearing on August 2, 1926, when the defendant's motion to dismiss was argued and submitted. The trial court, on August 9, 1926, granted said motion, and from the judgment or order dismissing the action this appeal has been taken.

The sole contention of the appellant is that the fact that the defendant had filed in connection with his answer a cross-complaint and counterclaim took this case out of the operation of the provisions of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the court therefore abused its discretion in granting the defendant's motion made under said section for a dismissal of this action. We can see no merit in this contention. This cause had been allowed to slumber for four years and ten months or over, after the defendant's answer had been filed, without any apparent effort on the part of the plaintiff to bring the matter on for hearing. The fact that the defendant had also appeared, seeking affirmative relief by way of cross-complaint and counterclaim, did not serve to relieve the plaintiff of the duty cast upon it to promptly prosecute its action, and certainly did not relieve it of the duty of offering upon the hearing of the defendant's motion to dismiss some adequate reason or excuse for the delay. The case of Hickman v. Lynch, 27 Cal. App. 354, 149 P. 997, upon which the appellant chiefly relies, was decided on the authority of Jacot v. Marks, 26 Misc. Rep. 670, 57 N. Y. S. 904, which latter case was reversed on appeal, and has been otherwise disapproved in other jurisdictions, and the case of Hickman v. Lynch, supra, if not actually disapproved, has been substantially so in the cases of Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670, and Miller & Lux, Inc., v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 332, 219 P. 1006. The trial court in the instant case evidently considered that the defendant by his motion to dismiss the action had waived or abandoned any affirmative relief which he might have sought under his cross-complaint and counterclaim. In the absence of any showing on the part of the plaintiff other than that above stated, excusing its delay, we are unable to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in its order dismissing this action.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINNIS v. EQUITABLE LIFE ASSUR. SOC. OF UNITED STATES. (L. A. 8384.)

Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑713(2)—Judgment held conclusive in subsequent action on matters belonging to controversy and within issues which might have been raised.

Judgment is conclusive in all subsequent actions involving same questions, not only as to matters actually decided in former controversy, but as to all matters belonging to subject of controversy property within scope of issues which also might have been raised and decided.

2. Death 🔑2(2)—Presumption of death from seven years' absence does not arise until expiration of seven years, unless circumstances quicken time.

Presumption of death arising after seven years' absence does not arise until end of seven-year period, unless circumstances quicken time.

3. Judgment 🔑725(2)—Circumstances fixing insured's death held not to quicken time of presumption of death from seven years' absence, where previous judgment adjudicated insured was then alive.

Where insured disappeared November 2, 1915, circumstances fixing such date as date of insured's death held of no avail to plaintiff suing on policy in quickening time of presumption of death arising from absence for seven years, where former judgment adjudicated that insured was alive on that date.

4. Judgment 🔑725(2)—Judgment that insured did not die on certain date held res judicata, in subsequent action based on seven years' disappearance.

Judgment, in action on life policy, adjudicating that insured did not die on November 2, 1915, as alleged, or any time prior to commencement of action, held res judicata in subsequent action on policy, based on presumption of death by seven years' disappearance from November 2, 1915, and was bar to legal determination that insured died at any time prior to commencement of prior action.

5. Insurance 🔑179½—Cause of action on policy, based on seven years' absence, afforded no ground for recovery, where seven-year period terminated subsequent to foreclosure of lien on policy.

Where life policy lapsed for nonpayment of premiums, and insurer foreclosed lien on policy for loan after judicial determination that insured was not dead, cause of action under complaint on policy, based on seven-years' disappearance, if considered as new cause of action, could not have arisen prior to termination of seven-year period, which was subsequent to foreclosure of policy, and hence did not afford ground for recovery of insurance, since policy was not then in force.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action upon a policy of life insurance by Hannah Minnis, administratrix of the estate of Emil Lesser, deceased, against the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, a corporation. From a judgment of the superior court for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 253 P. 341.

Newlin & Ashburn, W. C. Mathes, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This action was brought to recover on a life insurance policy issued by defendant to Emil Lesser, plaintiff's intestate. From a judgment entered on a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,950.40, defendant has appealed.

Defendant issued the life insurance policy on February 12, 1894, upon the life of Emil Lesser in the sum of $3,000. Lesser paid the annual premium up to and including the premium due on February 9, 1915, and no payments of premiums were made since that date. On January 30, 1914, Lesser borrowed from the defendant the sum of $987, to be repaid on February 9, 1915, with interest at 5 per cent., and assigned the policy as collateral security for the loan. On February 9, 1916, defendant declared the policy lapsed for nonpayment of premium, and, pursuant to its terms, converted it into a paid-up policy of $1,764. On April 5, 1919, defendant foreclosed the policy for nonpayment of the principal and interest of the loan; the amount of the principal sum of the loan and accrued interest totaling at that time a sum slightly in excess of the paid-up value of the policy.

In 1915, Emil Lesser disappeared, having been seen last at Venice, Cal., on November 2, 1915. On that day he went down to the ocean with the expressed intention of going in bathing. He was seen last dressed in his street clothes, within a few feet of the bathing house, talking and laughing with another man. On that evening his clothing and jewelry were found in the bathhouse. The body was never recovered, and inquiries made in this and other states revealed no trace of him.

On April 10, 1916, defendant was notified that Emil Lesser was dead, and was offered proofs of death in the form of affidavits as to the facts surrounding the disappearance of insured.

On August 31, 1916, the defendant having refused to pay the claim, an action was brought in the superior court of Los Angeles county by Alice Lesser, the surviving wife, as administratrix of the estate of Emil Lesser, deceased, against defendant to recover the sum of $3,000 upon the policy. The complaint alleged that Emil Lesser had been drowned while bathing in the ocean at Venice, Cal., on November 2, 1915, and the answer denied that Lesser was dead. After a trial lasting for five days, in which proof of death was sought to be made by circumstantial evidence, the trial court made a finding:

> "That it is not true that on the 2d day of November, 1915, or at all, the said Emil Lesser was accidentally, or at all, drowned; * * * that the plaintiff has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that said Emil Lesser is dead, and the court therefore finds that the said Emil Lesser is not dead. * * *"

Judgment was entered in accordance with this finding, and no appeal therefrom was taken.

On April 12, 1923, after the expiration of seven years from the date of Lesser's disappearance, the present action was commenced by Hannah Minnis, who succeeded Alice Lesser as administratrix, against defendant for the face value of the policy. The complaint alleged the facts with reference to the disappearance, and then stated, on information and belief, that Lesser died upon the 2d day of November, 1915. The answer denied these allegations, and pleaded the former judgment as a bar to a recovery in this action. The trial court ruled against the defendant upon its plea of res judicata, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the face value of the policy, less the amount of the loan thereon with accrued interest.

The important contentions made upon appeal are: That the former judgment was a bar to any future legal determination that Lesser died on November 2, 1915, or at any other date prior to the commencement of that action, and that a finding that Lesser died some time between the date of the first judgment—February, 1919—and the date of the second judgment would be unavailing, because the policy had lapsed for nonpayment of premiums on February 9, 1916, and thereafter became a paid-up policy for $1,764, subject to a lien for the amount of the loan made upon it by the company, and that even this small balance could not be recovered, unless it could be specifically found that the death occurred between February, 1919, and April, 1919, when the lien upon the policy was foreclosed by the company. At the time of the foreclosure of said lien, the surrender value of the policy was slightly less than the amount of the lien, leaving no equity in the plaintiff.

We are of the opinion that these contentions are well founded, and that the judgment is conclusive upon the parties with reference to the period of time upon which it speaks. That judgment decided that Lesser did not die on November 2, 1915, nor at any time prior to the filing of the complaint therein, which was in August, 1916.

[1] The rule is well established that a former final judgment between the same parties to an action is conclusive in all subsequent actions involving the same questions, not only as to matters actually decided in the former controversy, but as to all matters belonging to the subject of the controversy and properly within the scope of the issues, which also might have been raised and decided. Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 68 P. 597; Rucker v. Langford, 138 Cal. 611, 71 P. 1123; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 P. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66; Southern Pacific Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 415, 143 P. 597; Erving v. James H. Goodman & Co. Bank, 171 Cal. 559, 153 P. 945; Whittier v. Visscher, 189 Cal. 454, 209 P. 23; Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 360, 212 P. 622.

[2-5] Conceding that plaintiff was not barred from establishing, if she could, that Lesser died at any date between August, 1919, and April, 1923, when the second action was brought, we are met with two difficulties: The presumption of death arising after seven years' absence does not arise until the end of the seven-year period. Ashbury v. Sanders, 8 Cal. 62, 68 Am. Dec. 300; Solomon v. Redona, 52 Cal. App. 300, 198 P. 643; Rogers v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 285, 71 P. 348; Benjamin v. District Grand Lodge, 171 Cal. 260, 152 P. 731; Western Grain Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 135, 159 P. 423; Lesser v. New York Life Ins. Co., 53 Cal. App. 236, 200 P. 22; McCormick v. Woodmen of the World, 57 Cal. App. 568, 207 P. 943. The rule would be otherwise, if there were circumstances in evidence to "quicken" the time; but the only circumstances in evidence in the case at bar that might be said to "quicken" the time are those with reference to the date of November 2, 1915, but such circumstances are of no avail to plaintiff in this action, for, as we have seen, the former judgment adjudicates that Emil Lesser was alive on that date. The presumption of law arising from the seven years' absence, therefore, can have no other effect than as evidence that Lesser was not dead at the expiration of the seven years, to wit, November 2, 1922. Therefore, if the complaint in the present action be considered as stating a new cause of action, arising since the commencement of the former action, such new cause of action could not have arisen prior to November 2, 1922, and on that date the said policy of insurance was not in force. The policy had lapsed on February 9, 1916, because of nonpayment of premiums; was never thereafter revived by payment of any premium whatever, and was foreclosed by defendant on April 5, 1919, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the principal and interest due upon the loan made to Emil Lesser.

MITCHELL v. SMITH et al. (S. F. 12355.)

Supreme Court of California. May 17, 1928.

Brokers ⚷4—Surety on bond required by securities act held not liable for principal's conversion of stock, which was not violation of act, but of general laws (Corporate Securities Act [St. 1917, p. 673], and amendment of 1923 [St. 1923, p. 87]).

In action on surety bond given by dealers in stock, under provisions of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) with amendment of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 87), prior to amendment of 1925 (St. 1925, p. 962) for conversion of stock, held, that surety was liable only for failure to comply with act, and not for failure to comply with general laws; hence there was no liability on bond for conversion of stock.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. T. Mitchell against Earl Lysle Smith and others on a surety bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Maryland Casualty Company appeals. Reversed.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. Raymond Hall, of Oakland (George M. Naus, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Maryland Casualty Company from a judgment for $5,434 against it upon a surety bond. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone and the contentions made are that the complaint does not state a cause of action and the findings do not support the judgment.

The facts, as disclosed by the findings, are briefly: That prior to December 17, 1924, defendant E. L. Smith was the owner of the stock of the Foss-Smith Company and was an officer thereof, and also the general manager and in direct control of the entire business of said corporation; that during all the times mentioned in the findings the defendants John C. Platt and E. L. Smith were agents of the Foss-Smith Company, a corporation, acting in the full scope of their employment and the regular course of business of said corporation. The appellant was authorized to engage in doing a general surety business in the state of California and did, on or about the 30th day of October, 1924, execute and deliver to the commissioner of corporations of the state of California a bond in the form prescribed by him and as required by the Corporate Securities Act of the state of California (St. 1917, p. 673), and amendments thereto (St. 1923, p. 87; St. 1925, p. 962); that said bond was for the sum of $5,000, defendant E. L. Smith being the principal therein and the Maryland Casualty Company being the surety therein; that said bond and the said surety guaranteed the faithful compliance with, and observance of, all the provisions of law on the part of the said E. L. Smith and his agents, and provided that, upon failure to comply with the provisions of law in so far as the same may apply to any and all transactions carried on by said principal as such broker, the said principal and surety should be liable to any and all persons who may suffer loss by reason thereof; that said bond was canceled on November 18, 1924, being wholly superseded for all purposes for which it had been executed and delivered by a bond executed and delivered on said 18th day of November, 1924, to the commissioner of corporations of the state of California, which said bond was for the sum of $5,000, which latter bond contained substantially the same provisions as the prior one. Said bond, executed and delivered on the 18th day of November, 1924, remained in full force and effect during all of the month of December, 1924, and was thereafter continued in full force and effect by a continuation certificate executed by said Maryland Casualty Company and filed with the commissioner of corporations of the state of California.

During the year 1924 the defendants Foss-Smith Company, E. L. Smith, and John C. Platt entered into a conspiracy to obtain possession of and convert to their own use certain personal property then in the possession of and belonging to plaintiff; that said personal property consisted of 1,400 shares of preferred stock in the Union Mortgage Company of California and 1,200 shares of common stock in said company, for which stock plaintiff had paid, on or about the 27th day of May, 1924, the sum of $20,000; that pursuant to said conspiracy the defendants E. L. Smith and John C. Platt went to the home of plaintiff in Oakland, Alameda county, Cal., on or about the 24th day of December, 1924, and then and there represented to plaintiff that his stock hereinabove described had greatly depreciated in value, and that, if he were to sell it in the open market, he would loss $11,000 on it, but that, if he would allow them and the said Foss-Smith Company to sell the said stock for him, they could and would, and they promise to get back for him all the money which he had paid for said stock, to wit, $20,000, and that he would not be out even a commission for their services in making such sale; that none of said defendants had any intention of fulfilling said promises or of ever returning to plaintiff any of his said stock or anything of value received by said defendants, or any of them, from the sale or transfer thereof; that plaintiff, who is an old and infirm man past 70, and with practically no experience in such matters, fully believed all of said representations, and that said Foss-Smith Company was a reliable and responsible firm engaged in the stock and bond business, and that the defendants E. L. Smith and John C. Platt were reputable, honest, and responsible men, and placing full trust and confidence in said defendants and the Foss-Smith Company, and solely by reason thereof, and of their representations aforesaid, and their agreement to sell the said stock for him and get him all his money back out of the stock, he deposited with said defendant Foss-Smith Company, at its office in the First National Bank building, Oakland, Cal., on or about December 24, 1924, all of his said stock and the certificates therefor; that all of the representations and acts of the defendants Foss-Smith Company, E. L. Smith and John C. Platt as aforesaid, were made and performed pursuant to and as a part of the conspiracy entered into between said defendants as aforesaid, and were all done with the full knowledge and consent of said defendants and with the sole intention on the part of said defendants of deceiving and defrauding said plaintiff and of depriving him of his said stocks and of embezzling and converting the same and the proceeds thereof to their own use; that the said defendants Foss-Smith Company, E. L. Smith and John C. Platt, after obtaining possession of said personal property as aforesaid, did then and there, at said city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, on or about the 24th day of December, 1924, willfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently embezzle, convert, and appropriate the same to their own use contrary to their trust as such agents of said plaintiff, to plaintiff's great damage; that prior to the 1st day of January, 1925, the said defendants Foss-Smith Company, E. L. Smith and John C. Platt, pretending to be the owners of said stock, fraudulently and with intent to embezzle and convert the proceeds thereof, sold and transferred said stock, which had been intrusted to them by plaintiff, and converted and embezzled the proceeds thereof; that shortly thereafter the defendants John C. Platt and E. L. Smith disappeared and their whereabouts is still unknown; that concurrently with their disappearance the office of Foss-Smith Company closed; that thereafter, and on or about the 19th day of January, 1925, and also prior to the commencement of this action, said plaintiff demanded of the defendants Foss-Smith Company, E. L. Smith and John C. Platt, the return of the personal property hereinbefore described, but that the said defendants, and each of them, failed and refused to return same or any part thereof; that no part of said stock, or the proceeds thereof, or anything of value, has been paid or turned over to plaintiff by the defendants herein, or any of them, and that said defendants have failed and refused to make any accounting to plaintiff of said stocks or the proceeds of the sale or transfer thereof.

The conversion of the stock occurred while the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) with the amendments of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 87) was in force and effect. Therefore the provision of said law applicable here is:

> "Said bond shall be conditioned upon the faithful compliance with the provisions of law by said applicant and by all agents representing the said applicant and shall provide that upon failure to so comply the applicant shall be liable to any and all persons who may suffer loss by reason thereof."

That provision has been construed in the recent case of Blumenthal v. Larson (Cal. App.) 251 P. 241, to mean that a surety is liable for a failure on the part of the broker to comply with the provisions of law set out in the Corporate Securities Act of 1923, and not upon his failure to comply with all the general laws.

The case presented by the record is certainly one to appeal to the sympathies; and the need for protection to one in plaintiff's situation was evidently brought to the attention of the Legislature which enacted, in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 962), an amendment to the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) which added to the liabilities of the surety, upon a bond given thereunder, that of guaranteeing the honest and faithful application of all funds received and the faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase or sale of securities by said broker, etc. Unfortunately, for plaintiff, this provision of the Corporate Securities Act was not in force and effect at the time the wrong was committed against him.

The decision of Blumenthal v. Larson, supra, is conclusive against plaintiff's right to recover under the facts pleaded and found, and the judgment must be reversed.

It is so ordered.

We concur: SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.

NEWTON v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(S. F. No. 12864.)

Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑372—Compensation is not allowable for injury resulting from inherent bodily defect or not superinduced by extraordinary movement or action.

Where physical injury results from inherent bodily defect, and not an outside cause, or is not superinduced by some extraordinary movement or action, compensation is not allowable.

2. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Review of Industrial Accident Commission's decision extends only to ascertainment of whether there is testimony supporting findings.

Appellate court, on review of decision by Industrial Accident Commission, cannot draw its own inferences from testimony set forth in record and conclude therefrom whether or not petitioner is entitled to compensation, since jurisdiction extends only to ascertainment of whether there is testimony supporting the findings of the commission.

3. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Finding that knee injury, while running to catch truck, did not arise in course of employment, held sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding of Industrial Accident Commission that injury to knee of employee, while running to catch truck on highway, was not caused by injury arising out of or occurring in course of his employment.

In Bank.

Application by Dudley Newton, Jr., a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Mrs. Dudley Newton, against the State Industrial Accident Commission and others, for a writ of certiorari to review and annul a decision of the Commission denying compensation for injuries. Affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeals, see 262 P. 805.

Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for respondent Eagle Indemnity Co.

WASTE, C. J. On further consideration, we are of the view that, notwithstanding the rather persuasive arguments of the petitioner, the decision of the District Court of Appeal, affirming the action of the respondent commission denying an award, should stand. Although we might disagree with the commission as to the weight of the evidence before it, as an appellate tribunal we may not overturn a finding of fact it has made if there is some evidence to support it. The opinion of Mr. Justice Plummer, concurred in by Mr. Justice Hart and Mr. Presiding Justice Finch, is adopted as the opinion of this court:

This cause is before us upon the application of the petitioner for a writ of certiorari to review and annul the decision of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation to the above-named petitioner. The facts in this matter are uncontradicted. The record shows the following: Dudley Newton, a boy 20 years of age, was in the employ as a general roustabout of H. Brown, a highway contractor, on or about October 6, 1926, and had been in such employment for some months. On the 6th day of October, 1926, while working in the county of Yolo, on a public highway, he was sent by his employer to a point about one mile distant on the highway to get a truck. He went to a point on the highway where he knew the truck would pass, and waited for it. As he was waiting, the truck came along, but at about the same instant of time another automobile passed between the truck and the boy, so, being afraid, as the boy testified, that the truck driver did not see him, he halloed to the truck driver, and ran down the highway after the truck. The truck slowed down, and, as the boy was running along the dirt portion of the highway, he heard or felt his knee snap. He did not fall, although he felt his leg crumple under him. He recovered without falling, and continued to the truck, got on the truck, and rode on the truck for about one hour. His knee started to ache and swell, and his employer sent him to Dr. Harris. Hospitalization and treatment thereafter followed. On December 19, 1926, a refracture occurred when the boy stepped into a hole or depression while walking. The testimony shows that the boy did not stumble, trip over anything, or step into any depression while running after the truck. The only inference that can be drawn from the testimony is that the ground on which the boy was running did not have anything to do with the injury, and that the troubles of the kneecap simply occurred as the boy was running after the truck. The opinion testimony of the attending physician and surgeon, Dr. Harris, is as follows:

> "From this man's history, and from the fact that there was no bruise, excoriation, or contusion at or about the knee joint, I would be led to believe that the fracture of the patella was caused spontaneously while the boy was running to catch a truck. I do not believe there was any extraordinary strain or trauma or exaggerated movement, but that the fracture occurred as a result of the normal motion of the leg in running. The recurrence, in my opinion, was not caused by an extraordinary movement, but simply by a misstep. Operative findings at the second setting showed the fracture to have recurred through previous fracture lines. I do not believe there was any period of partial disability following either fracture."

The testimony of Dr. Harbagh is as follows:

> "A fracture of the patella could occur in the manner described in the record, without any particular accidental feature."

Upon these facts the commission found as follows: (1) Dudley Newton, Jr., aged 20, was employed as a roustabout on October 5, 1926, at Sacramento, Cal., by H. Brown, whose insurance carrier was Eagle Indemnity Company, a corporation; (2) on said date, while running, the employee sustained spontaneous fracture of the patella of the left knee; (3) the evidence does not establish that said fracture was caused by injury or strain arising out of or occurring in the course of his employment.

[1] Compensation was accordingly denied. A petition for a rehearing being denied, application was made to [the District Court of Appeal] for a writ of certiorari. By finding that the injury to petitioner's patella was spontaneous, the commission found, in effect, that the injury was the result of some internal impulse, energy, or natural law without external force, that being one of the definitions of the term used by witnesses. In other words, the finding of the commission is that the injury to the minor resulted from an inherent defect in the patella, although the record does not show any previous diseased condition of the patella, or that the petitioner had experienced any previous trouble therewith. The finding can only be interpreted in the light that the injury resulted from an inherent defect, and not through any extraneous, accidental, or inducing cause, and therefore did not arise out of the course of the minor's employment, or by reason of his employment, but simply occurred during the course of, or time of, employment. It would appear that the theory of the commission was and is that the injury complained of is a matter which would come, probably, under health insurance, and not under the provisions of "the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws." That the injury occurred during the time of employment or during the course of employment is unquestioned. The testimony of the petitioner shows that the injury to the patella of his left leg occurred while he was on a mission to obtain a truck for his employer. The testimony of the petitioner likewise shows that there was no extraneous or outside force or accidental means present to induce or produce injury to the patella. While the layman would naturally infer that the running of the petitioner caused the patella to snap, there is no testimony to that effect. The testimony only is that it occurred while the petitioner was running. The medical or expert testimony is to the effect that there was no extra strain upon the kneecap, but "that the fracture occurred as a result of the normal motion of the leg in running." While the word "accident" has been eliminated from section 6 of "The Workmen's Compensation Act" (St. 1917, p. 834) the phrase "arising out of, and in the course of the employment" has been interpreted to mean that the injury must result by reason of the employment in which the employee is engaged, and not by reason of some inherent natural defect which simply culminates during the time of employment. In other words, if the agency which culminates in a physical injury is an inherent defect, and not an outside cause, or if the injury is not superinduced by some extraordinary movement or action, compensation is not allowable. Again, as stated in William Simpson Construction Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 74 Cal. App. 239, 240 P. 58:

> "In the first place, the burden of proof is upon the applicant to prove that the injury received was one which would sustain an award. 'It must be conceded that the burden is upon the applicant for compensation to show that the injury arose out of as well as in the course of the employment; and there is no presumption, as contended by respondents, that because an injury occurs in the course of the employment it arises out of or because of that employment.'" Eastman Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 587, 200 P. 17.

[2, 3] Likewise, in the Simpson Case, it is also held:

> "Whenever the subject under consideration is one within the knowledge of experts only, and is not within the common knowledge of laymen, the expert evidence is conclusive upon the question in issue."

Again [the District Court of Appeal], is not in a position to draw its own inferences from the testimony set forth in the record and conclude therefrom that the petitioner is or is not entitled to compensation. Our jurisdiction extends only to the ascertainment of whether there is testimony in the record, and was testimony before the commission supporting its findings. As said in Dearborn v. Industrial Accident Commission, 187 Cal. 591, 203 P. 112, quoting from the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822:

> "This court, in reviewing awards of the commission, is not acting as the court of appeal. It has no power to waive the effect of positive evidence. It must assume that the commission believed all the evidence given which tends to sustain the award made. * * * The findings are not subject to review except in so far as they may have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof."

The opinion of the medical experts in this case is of the same binding force and effect after the commission has acted thereon as any other portion of the testimony set forth in the record. Neither layman nor expert has testified that the injury was not "spontaneous." The opinion of the experts that it was such is admissible testimony, and, when the commission has acted thereon and so found, the law seems to be well settled that appellate courts are bound thereby. This statement of the rule appears in the case of Tartar v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 703, 218 P. 39, to wit:

> "It is well settled that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon questions of fact are conclusive, and are not subject to review where there is any substantial evidence to support them"—citing a number of California cases.

Further, to the same effect, and also as to the definition of the term "arising out of and in the course of the employment," we may cite the case of Storm v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 4, 214 P. 874, where it is said:

> "An injury, in order to be compensable under the terms of the Compensation Act, * * * must have been sustained by the employee 'arising out of and in the course of the employment,' and must have been 'proximately caused by the employment.'"

The opinion in the Storm Case then cites the following, which is supported by a number of authorities:

> "The accidents arising out of the employment of the person injured are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employer's work, or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employee. The accident must be one resulting from a risk reasonably incident to the employment." "But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause."

If the expert testimony in this case had been to the effect that the injury to the petitioner's left patella resulted from some extraordinary strain or accidental stumbling or striking against some protruding object on the highway, then and in that case a finding that compensation was allowable could readily have been upheld under the ruling of [the District Court of Appeal] in the case of Elk Grove District v. Industrial Accident Commission, 34 Cal. App. 589, 168 P. 392, where the petitioner suffered an injury by reason of an extraordinary strain in the course of her employment in endeavoring to remove heavy benches or seats from in front of a bookcase in order to obtain a desired book to be used in connection with her duties as a teacher. The finding in this case is based upon testimony of medical experts exactly contrary to that in the case just cited, and whether correct or incorrect, supports the finding of the commission, and by that finding we are bound. It being a question of fact as to whether the injury to the petitioner arose out of or in the course of his employment, or was simply spontaneous, and occurred during the time of his employment, and that fact, being found adversely to the petitioner's contention, and being based upon the expert testimony to which we have referred, supports the findings of the commission, and, being a question of fact determined by the commission, cannot be disturbed upon appeal. The only question of law involved herein is as to whether there is any testimony supporting the finding of the commission, and, having found such testimony, our inquiry there stops.

The decision of the commission is affirmed.

order of nonsuit granted at close of plaintiff's case, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.
James W. Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in defendant's favor upon an order of the court granting a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case. The action was one to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff from a fall which occurred as he was about to enter the defendant's branch bank in the city of Marysville between the hours of 10 and 11 o'clock a. m. on March 10, 1925, and while the said bank was open for business, and while the plaintiff, who was a depositor and customer of said bank, was about to enter the same on business. The building in which the business of said bank was being conducted at the time stands flush with the sidewalk, with the exception that at the point where the main doorway constituting the entrance to the bank is located there is a recession about two and one-half feet in depth and about ten feet in width, and within which the doors of the bank are placed. This recess, while within the property line of the bank, is in reality but an extension of the sidewalk to the point therein where the doors are placed, and, while employed by those who are entering or leaving the bank on business is also open to access by the general public passing or repassing along the sidewalk in front of the bank. The plaintiff just prior to his accident had approached the bank, and was in the act of entering the same on business, but, while still within said recess, and before opening the bank doors, he slipped upon some substance, supposed to be a piece of banana or orange peel, which was lying unobserved upon the floor of said recess, and fell heavily, suffering injuries which rendered him unconscious, and sustaining a fracture of the right femur bone, from the effects of which he was confined to a hospital and to his home for many weeks, with the probability that his injuries will be permanent.

Upon the trial of the cause, plaintiff proved that he was a depositor and customer of said bank, and that hence, as an invitee thereof, he was about to enter it upon business, and that, without any fault or negligence on his part he had slipped upon whatever substance was lying at the indicated place, and had thereby sustained his aforesaid injuries. He also introduced evidence tending to show that, while the defendant bank employed a janitor to clean and care for its premises before or after business hours, the duties of such caretaker ended at about 6 o'clock in the morning of each business day, and that during the regular business hours of the bank no one was specially charged with the duty of seeing that its floors or premises were kept in condition. At the close of plaintiff's case, the defendant moved the court for a nonsuit upon the ground that there was no sufficient showing of negligence on the part of the defendant. The court granted the motion, and, having done so, rendered and entered its judgment in the defendant's favor, and it is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken. We are unable to say that the trial court was in error in granting a motion for nonsuit under the circumstances of this particular case. Had the plaintiff at the time he sustained his said injuries been within the actual precincts of the defendant's bank wherein its business was being conducted, into which only that portion of the public which had business to transact with said institution was supposed to enter, a different question might be presented; but in the case at bar the plaintiff, while doubtless intending to open the doors of said bank and enter within its inner precincts as a customer and invitee thereof, had not in fact actually done so, but, on the contrary, at the moment of his injuries was outside the doors of the bank, and, while within the line of the bank property, was standing or walking upon that portion thereof which, while forming the said recess, also constituted a space used and usable by the general public for sidewalk purposes. To hold that the rule requiring of such an institution the exercise of reasonable care for the protection and safety of its customers or invitees should be so far extended as to be applicable to those portions of its premises which lie outside of the precincts wherein its actual business with its customers and invitees is being conducted, and which form in fact a portion of the public sidewalk, would, we think, amount to an undue extension of said rule, and one which should not be given application, in the absence of any showing of either actual or inferable knowledge on the part of those in charge of the affairs of said institution that said outer portion of its premises, accessible to the general public, was in such a condition as to render possible the accident and injuries of which the plaintiff in the instant case complains.

McMAHON v. HAMILTON. (S. F. 12354.)

Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹1067—Failure to instruct on measure of damages in personal injury action held harmless error.

In personal injury action, court's failure to instruct the jury as to the measure of damages held harmless error, where there was no occasion, under the facts, for application of the statutory rule.

2. Automobiles ⟹213—Boy injured by collision with automobile while riding with another on motorcycle, and having nothing to hold onto, held contributorily negligent.

Fourteen year old boy injured in collision with defendant's automobile while plaintiff was riding, on city street, on the seat of motorcycle, having nothing to hold onto and driver thereof was sitting on the small gas tank, held contributorily negligent, and to have assumed responsibility for injury, precluding recovery.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Joseph T. McMahon, by Rose Surryhne, guardian ad litem, against Fred Hamilton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Tracy, William Steers, and Charles Reagh, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis V. Crowley, and Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This appeal is from a judgment for defendant in an action for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff, Joseph T. McMahon, was at the time of the accident about fourteen years of age. On the evening of September 3, 1925, on Mission street, in San Francisco, he hailed Charles Raleigh, who was at the time passing on a motorcycle, and asked him for a ride. When the two had proceeded for about six or eight blocks along Mission street they collided with a Ford automobile which the defendant was driving. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment appealed from was entered. After plaintiff had filed his notice of appeal, he submitted to the trial court his proposed bill of exceptions. Defendant submitted proposed amendments thereto. After some delay, and through inadvertence, the trial judge signed the plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions, although he had allowed the defendant's proposed amendments. On October 24, 1927, this court denied appellant's motion to vacate its prior order of July 11, 1927, made on motion of respondent, to require the plaintiff to file with his transcript the proposed amendments which had been allowed. McMahon v. Hamilton, 260 P. 793. The proposed amendments have not been filed. We must therefore decide the merits of this appeal on the record and briefs before us.

[1] The plaintiff assigns as error numerous instructions given by the trial court and the refusal to give certain instructions requested by the plaintiff. The charge to the jury has been examined. As a whole, it may be said that it fairly presented to the jury the law applicable to the facts in the case, and no substantial right of the plaintiff was invaded by the refusal to give any instruction requested by him. It would serve no useful purpose to comment on each assignment of error. They are sufficiently met by the defendant in his brief. It may be said, however, that the court should have instructed the jury as to the measure of damages. But, as there was no occasion under the facts for the application of the statutory rule, the omission to charge thereon was not prejudicial.

[2] The record would support a finding of the jury absolving the defendant from any negligence, and at all events the plaintiff was clearly guilty of contributory negligence. He himself testified that the "motorcycle had but one seat, and the driver moved forward near the handle bars, sitting on the small gas tank, and I got onto the seat; I had nothing to hold onto except to put my hands underneath me and try to hold onto the seat; I had no other hold, and did not hold onto the driver or the driver's seat; the place where I got onto the motorcycle would be about six or eight city blocks from the place where the accident happened; we were going pretty fast; we were going a good deal faster than the Ford automobile; we had no light on the motorcycle, and the driver of the motorcycle did not sound any horn or warning of any kind; the motorcycle struck and collided with the Ford automobile; the Ford automobile was going very slowly; it was facing toward San Francisco and was about two feet from the east curb of Mission street when it was struck." By thus voluntarily assuming a position on the one-seated motorcycle, which was hazardous to himself even in the ordinary operations of the vehicle, he must be deemed likewise to have assumed the responsibility for any injury to which, as here, his dangerous position would presumably contribute. It was undisputed that the motorcycle did not fall from the force of the impact. The driver, Raleigh, did not lose his seat, but righted his vehicle and brought it to a stop. We find no prejudicial error in the record.

WITHERS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 6030.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1928.

Marriage 🔑67—Judgment annulling marriage held to terminate court's authority to enforce payment of alimony under divorce decree previously entered.

Judgment annulling marriage held to terminate court's authority to enforce payment of alimony under previously entered divorce decree, since judgment annulling marriage rendered the divorce decree null and void.

Application by Granville G. Withers for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hon. Daniel Beecher, Judge, to restrain the enforcement of an order to show cause in a divorce proceeding. Writ granted.

William DeF. Mann, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CRAIG, J. On June 18, 1925, Granville Withers and Inez Withers intermarried. On August 13, 1925, Inez Withers brought suit for divorce. An order pendente lite was made awarding the plaintiff alimony, counsel fees, and court costs. On August 17th following, Nona Withers, the mother of Granville Withers, filed suit against Inez Withers to annul the marriage, and a judgment of annulment was entered on September 22, 1925. The judgment required Granville Withers to pay to Inez $60 per month for alimony and support of their minor child, whose custody was also awarded to her.

Thereafter, in the divorce action, Inez Withers filed an affidavit alleging that Granville became delinquent in the payment of alimony as required by the order pendente lite above mentioned, which delinquency began on April 15, 1927. An order was made, based upon this affidavit, requiring Granville Withers to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for having failed to comply with the terms of said order pendente lite. At the time fixed for the hearing of the order to show cause, petitioner herein appeared and urged that, since the marriage of the parties had been annulled, the court had lost jurisdiction to enforce the order made in the divorce action.

However, it is averred in the petition that the superior court disregarded this objection, and announced that petitioner was in contempt, but continued the hearing until March 13, 1928, to take further testimony as to the ability of petitioner to make the required payments, and to "determine the punishment to be inflicted" on the petitioner.

Thereupon Granville Withers sought a writ of prohibition against the superior court proceeding further in the divorce action, and particularly from taking further steps in the hearing on the order to show cause.

The judgment of annulment terminated the court's authority to enforce payment of alimony accruing thereafter. Having decided that the marriage was a nullity, the status of the parties after the entry of that judgment was not such that they could be divorced any more than as though they had never been married. This view is supported by Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 P. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184. Both actions were in the same court, and it was only necessary upon the hearing of the order to show cause for the defendant in the divorce action to call attention to the judgment of annulment, which terminated the subject-matter of the divorce action from the date of the entry of such judgment.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

ARTEL v. RIBOLI. (Civ. 5114.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1928.

Mechanics' liens 🔑281(1)—Evidence that plaintiff furnished materials to subcontractor without proof of contract with defendant owner or use on premises held insufficient to warrant foreclosure of lien.

In action by materialman against owner of property to foreclose lien under contract, not accompanied by bond as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, evidence which merely showed that plaintiff furnished subcontractor building materials for use in building six houses, and which failed to show that materials were ever actually used on defendant's premises or that defendant had any agreement with the contractor, was insufficient to warrant foreclosure of lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by John G. Artel against Maddalena Riboli and others. From an adverse judgment, defendant named appeals. Reversed.

Alfred W. Allen and Fred W. Heatherly, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Garner White and Clyde Woodworth, both of Inglewood, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action was commenced by complaint against appellant and several other defendants, but at the trial was dismissed as to all defendants except appellant Riboli. Plaintiff alleged that one Cambianico, as owner, entered into a contract with one Randolph, subcontractor, and Frank Pece, general contractor, for the construction of "a building" upon certain described real property of Cambianico; that the contract was in writing, but was not filed with the county recorder, and was not accompanied by any bond as provided under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure; that thereafter the plaintiff, at the request of Randolph acting for himself and as agent for the owner, and upon their promise to pay the reasonable value thereof, furnished certain plumbing materials to be used and which were used in said building; that plaintiff duly filed his claim of lien, etc. Plaintiff demanded judgment for the balance alleged to be due, together with the usual remedy for the enforcement of his lien.

Answer having been made by appellant and other defendants denying the principal allegations of the complaint, the case went to trial. There was no evidence offered to show that Cambianico owned the property or made any contract in relation thereto. On the contrary, it was stipulated that appellant Riboli "is the owner of the property and was at all times." The only reference to any contract with the owner is found in the testimony of Frank Pece that he was the general contractor on the job. It further appears from his testimony that the contract was for the building of six houses on said premises and not merely one house; that Pece signed a contract with Randolph under which Randolph was to furnish the plumbing; that Randolph brought plumbing materials to the premises and did the plumbing work. "He roughed in the plumbing work for six houses. He brought the materials just little by little every morning and took out the material pretty near every night. He supplied his own materials that went on the job. He had the contract on the six houses."

From the plaintiff's own testimony it appears that he did not deliver any of said plumbing materials on appellant's premises, but delivered them to Randolph personally without ever knowing anything about their actual delivery or use. Randolph gave to plaintiff a wrong description of the premises where he was to do the work, and plaintiff never found or saw appellant's premises until long afterwards. For aught that appears, the materials furnished by Randolph at defendant's premises may never have come from the plaintiff. It is true that, as testified by plaintiff, Randolph paid to plaintiff the sum of $200 on account by delivering to plaintiff a check for that amount, and the witness Frank Pece testified that he gave Randolph a check for $200 payable to the plaintiff. This proves only that the contractor Frank Pece relied upon Randolph's declaration that the materials were coming from Artel, the plaintiff. The amount of materials furnished by the plaintiff to Randolph, measured by their reasonable value as testified to by plaintiff, amounted to a sum substantially greater than the entire contract price which Randolph was to receive under his contract with Frank Pece. Apparently Randolph disappeared before this case was tried, for he was not a witness at the trial.

It is unnecessary to discuss other grounds of appeal urged by appellant. The evidence is clearly not sufficient to justify any finding that the materials furnished by plaintiff to Randolph were used on the premises of appellant, or that the appellant entered into any agreement with Randolph. So far as the record shows, the provisions of the Mechanic's Lien Law may have been fully complied with in any contract between appellant and the contractor. Nevertheless the court, without having before it any party other than the owner of the premises, has rendered personal judgment against the owner and in favor of the subcontractor, and has by its decree attempted to establish and to foreclose a lien against appellant's property for the amount of that judgment.

productive areas held not to constitute termination of entire lease in suit by one of lessors for declaratory relief, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, where lease expressly provided that benefits were to be apportioned, notwithstanding surrender of parts of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action for declaratory relief by the First National Bank of Redondo against the Standard Oil Company of California, J. Atherton, and others, in which defendant last named and others, excepting first named defendant, appeal, and in which some of defendants intervened as respondents. Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank L. Perry, of Redondo Beach, for respondent First Nat. Bank of Redondo.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for respondent Standard Oil Co. of California.

M. D. Andrews, of Los Angeles, for intervening respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is a suit in equity for declaratory relief, under the provisions of section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A decree was entered declaring the rights of the parties under the provisions of a certain lease between them. Certain parties to said lease now prosecute this appeal from the judgment.

The appeal is taken by the so-called "alternative method," and there is no controversy as to the facts, which are all agreed upon in a stipulation filed in the cause.

It appears from the briefs of respondents that on October 26, 1921, a number of landowners in the vicinity of Redondo, Cal., entered into a certain lease with Standard Oil Company of California, hereinafter referred to as the "oil company." The lands were separately owned, but they formed a compact area of some 75 acres. Certain rents and royalties, accruing under this lease, were to be paid by the oil company to the First National Bank of Redondo, as depositary. Only two paragraphs of said lease contain matter which give rise to this controversy, and they are:

"12. After the completion of the first or any subsequent well herein provided for, whether oil is found therein in such paying quantities or not, the lessee may, at its election, at any time cease further drilling, and if said full number of wells shall not have been drilled, the lessee shall thereupon surrender the lease and this lease shall thereupon terminate as to all said premises except ten (10) acres surrounding each producing or drilling well, which the lessee may hold free of further drilling obligations as long as oil or gas is produced therefrom, with rights of way for pipe lines upon all of the herein demised premises, and for passage over and upon and across, and ingress and egress to and from said premises. Such ten (10) acres shall in each instance be in the form of a square or rectangle, the longer sides of which shall not exceed twice the length of the shorter sides. At the expiration of the period of twenty years from the date hereof, no further wells shall be drilled on said premises by said lessee except with the written consent of the lessor owning the parcel of land upon which said well is desired to be drilled."

"37. Said lessors agree to, and they do hereby pool their interest in this lease, and agree that during the continuance of this lease each owner of land subject thereto shall share in all benefits accruing to the whole lease in the ratio which the acreage owned by said lessors bears to the entire acreage hereby leased. This provision as to apportionment of benefits to be operative, notwithstanding the surrender by the lessee of any land described herein."

Pursuant to the provisions of said paragraph 12, the oil company duly gave written notice to all the lessors that it elected to cease drilling upon, and to surrender, all the leased premises except ten acres surrounding each producing well. The area surrendered was owned by respondents. The ten-acre tracts thus retained (surrounding the producing wells) included all the acreage owned by appellants.

Upon the giving of this notice of surrender, appellants servéd notice upon the depositary bank that no more payments should be made to the respondents, and that they (respondents) should be denied thereafter any participation in the rents and royalties paid by the oil company under said lease.

The trial court held that the surrender of a portion of the land covered by said lease, as hereinbefore detailed, had no effect upon the method of distribution of royalties by the bank, or upon the proportions into which said royalties should be divided, and did not and could not operate to divest any of the lessors of their interests in royalties, and could not and did not change the interests of the parties as lessors under said lease. Judgment was entered accordingly.

We cannot definitely define appellant's position. In one breath they contend that the whole lease was canceled by the oil company, while in another they contend apparently that the lease is in full force and effect, but that they are entitled to all royalties accruing after the surrender of the acreage mentioned.

[1] By the portion of the lease quoted supra, the lessors (appellants and respondents) agree to "pool their interest in this lease." The term "pool" means a surrender of certain individual rights and powers for the benefit of all, on the theory that the accruing benefits gained by the joint venture outweigh the individual rights surrendered. Burley Tobacco Soc. v. Monroe, 148 Ky. 289, 146 S. W. 725. In the instant case, the parties surrendered their individual rights. If all the revenue was produced by wells entirely upon the lands of any one of them, all would participate, nevertheless, in the proceeds from said wells. It was simply a case of collective bargaining for the common good.

[2] It is contended by appellants that the notice of surrender was a termination of the whole lease. We see no merit in this position. The lease expressly provided that the benefits were to be apportioned as therein stated, notwithstanding the surrender by the lessee of any land described therein. The act of the oil company in surrendering certain acreage was strictly in accordance with the provisions of the lease, and permission to take this step was not required of appellants, nor did said notice terminate the entire lease. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the language of the lease.

Appellants' only authorities are upon rescission and specific performance, but the application of these cases to the questions raised is not clearly explained.

After agreeing in writing to "pool" their interest, appellants, when they find that all the oil is coming from their own lands, now want to exclude their colessors from any of the benefits of the lease. Their contentions border upon the frivolous, in their obvious lack of any real or substantial merit.

The appeal is without any real or substantial merit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

DEMPSEY-KEARNS THEATRICAL & MOTION PICTURE ENTERPRISES, Inc., v. PANTAGES. (Civ. 5807.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 9, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1928.

1. Partnership 🔑20—Contract to furnish services of artists for certain period, in consideration of named sum and commissions, did not create copartnership.

Contract to furnish and secure services of artists for a specified period, in consideration of agreed sum and commissions on all sums in excess of certain amount specified therein without right of party furnishing services of artists to fix price of admission or employ other players or fix their compensation, held not to constitute a copartnership as bearing on right to recover commission on sums stolen from box office.

2. Partnership 🔑3, 5—"Copartnership" requires joint ownership of property, with proportionate sharing in profits and losses.

An essential element in a copartnership is the joint ownership of the property, a proportionate sharing in the profits, and a like proportionate sharing in the losses.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Copartnership.]

3. Partnership 🔑9(1)—That compensation of parties to contract for furnishing artists in theatrical enterprise was dependent on profit did not constitute arrangement a copartnership.

Mere fact that compensation to one or all of parties to contract for furnishing services of artists in theatrical enterprise was dependent on enterprise producing a profit, and that such profit was shared in proportions, did not in itself constitute the arrangement a copartnership.

4. Joint adventures 🔑1—Partnership 🔑1—"Joint enterprise" characterizes a single joint venture, while "copartnership" characterizes a general and continuing joint venture.

The term "joint enterprise" is commonly used to characterize a single joint venture, while the term "copartnership" generally characterizes a general and continuing joint venture, but, to bring a contract within legal designation of copartnership or joint enterprise, it must appear that parties thereto are associated together for joint benefit of all, that they are joint owners of property belonging to association, and share jointly in profits as well as in the same proportion bear the losses that might result from the enterprise.

5. Joint adventures 🔑1—Contract to furnish artists for theatrical enterprise in consideration of salary and commissions did not constitute "joint enterprise."

Contract to furnish services of artists in theatrical enterprise in consideration of named sum, with commissions on amount taken in over certain specified sum, held not to constitute a joint enterprise as bearing on right to recover percentage of box office receipts that were stolen, since contract did not provide for joint ownership of box office receipts nor joint division of profits or joint sharing of losses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Dempsey-Kearns Theatrical & Motion Picture Enterprises, Inc., against Alexander Pantages, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and in part affirmed.

Mott & Vallee and Kenneth E. Grant, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert and W. H. Sheldon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant in an action seeking to recover $2,356.76, claimed due and owing from defendant, arising out of a contract entered into between the parties. The evidence was presented to the court either by stipulation or by testimony which was not disputed.

In October, 1921, a written contract was entered into wherein the defendant herein was the party of the first part, and designated as "manager"; the plaintiff herein was the party of the second part, and designated as "producer"; and Jack Dempsey and Jack Kearns were the parties of the third part and designated as "artists." The contract in question is an extended one, and we will quote only such paragraphs as we deem material for our consideration. They will be referred to as numbered in the written agreement:

"First. The manager agrees to engage and employ, and the producer engages to furnish and secure the services of the said artists during the period of this contract.

"The producer agrees that said artists will render their exclusive services to the manager, as herein provided, during the term of this agreement.

"Second. The said manager agrees to organize, assemble and put together the vaudeville show around Jack Dempsey as champion heavyweight pugilist of the world, in which show the said Dempsey and Kearns shall render their services as herein provided.

"Fourth. The said manager guarantees to the said producer twenty (20) weeks' employment, and the term of this contract shall be for twenty (20) or more weeks.

"Fifth. * * * Whenever a week is lost by travel, as hereinbefore provided, the producer shall receive no pay for said week, nor shall the said week be considered as one of the weeks of the term of this contract or of the guarantee of employment given to the said producer.

"Sixth. The artists shall not be required to appear in more than three (3) shows a day, except on Saturdays and Sundays, when four (4) shows may be given.

"Seventh. Out of the gross receipts at the box office of the theatre or theatres in which the artists appear, there shall first be paid to the producer by the manager the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000) per week, after which there shall be paid from such receipts the cost of the show in which said artists are appearing, said cost to include transportation, salaries of artists and expenses of an advance man, but the aggregate cost of said show, aside and apart from the four thousand dollars ($4,000) paid to the producer as herein provided, shall not in any event exceed the sum of twenty-three hundred and seventy-five dollars ($2,375).

"After the aforesaid payment of four thousand dollars ($4,000) shall have been made to the producer and the cost of the show, as provided in the preceding paragraph, then there shall be paid to the manager the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000) or as much thereof as the gross receipts will permit. Thereafter any surplus remaining, after the payment of the war tax, shall be divided fifty per cent. (50%) to the producer and fifty per cent. (50%) to the manager.

"The payment of the four thousand dollars ($4,000) to the producer shall be as follows:

"Two thousand dollars ($2,000) in American currency and two thousand dollars ($2,000) in Canadian currency in the cities of Winnipeg and Vancouver;

"The payment of the producer in all other Canadian cities shall be in American currency;

"Any moneys due to the producer under the splitting arrangement shall be paid in Canadian currency;

"Otherwise, all other payments shall be in American currency.

"Ninth. The manager guarantees to the producer that the minimum receipts of the producer for each week that the services may be rendered by the artists as herein provided shall be not less than the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000)."

Attached to and made a part of the contract is what is termed therein as a "printed form of contract." This printed form contains extended provisions specifying the authority of respondent "as manager" to determine the place, time, and manner of giving the vaudeville shows, and also establishes with considerable detail the duties and obligations of the players who are therein designated as "artists." The form contract makes use of the terms "salaries" and "employment," as also other terms commonly used in declaring the relation of employer and employee.

The controversy here involved arose out of the fact that the box office receipts for a Sunday night performance given in Kansas City were stolen from respondent's safe in the office of the theater, where the money had been placed by respondent's agent for safe-keeping. It was stipulated in open court that the loss of the money was in nowise due to any negligence or carelessness on the part of respondent or his agent.

Subsequent to the theft, respondent refused to make settlement with appellant on the basis of the box office receipts taken in at the Sunday night performance, contending that this money was partnership funds, and that, inasmuch as the loss was not due to any negligence on his part, he was not accountable to appellant for any of the proceeds from that performance. It seems to have been conceded by respondent at the trial that, had the money not been stolen, plaintiff would have been entitled to payment, by reason of the Sunday night performance at Kansas City, in substantially the amount set forth in the complaint.

The case was tried by both sides upon the theory that the determination of any liability on the part of the respondent to the plaintiff would depend upon whether or not the contract in question constituted a copartnership. Plaintiff contended vigorously that there was no copartnership, but rather an agreement between independent parties. Defendant resisted plaintiff's claim on the ground that the contract did constitute a copartnership. Briefs filed by both parties on the appeal are largely occupied with a discussion of the question as to whether or not there was a copartnership.

[1] It appears from the contract and the evidence presented at the trial, that appellant had no part in fixing the price of admission to be charged for the shows, nor any authority in employing the help or players, or in fixing their compensation. The box office receipts were in the possession and charge of respondent's agents, and were by them deposited in the separate accounts of the respondent carried in the name of the different theaters. Respondent and his agents alone had the right to check on these funds, and all payments were made during the life of the contract to appellant by checks drawn upon respondent's bank accounts and signed by him or his agents.

Looking to the provisions of the contract for the distribution of the funds derived from the shows, it appears that the first $4,000 was paid to appellant, and, if the box office receipts in any week did not amount to $4,000, respondent was obligated to make up the deficit out of his own pocket. After the first payment of $4,000 to respondent, the salaries of the artists and traveling expenses were to be paid not exceeding the sum of $2,375. These salaries and all expenses were a liability assumed by respondent, and, if in any week the gross box receipts did not amount to enough to pay the $4,000 to appellant and the salaries and traveling expenses of the troupe, respondent was legally liable to pay such deficit. Unquestionably, respondent was also liable to the government to see that the admission tax was paid.

In fact, when one carefully examines the contract, which, it must be admitted, is far from clear in declaring the legal relations between the parties, it appears that appellant had no obligations under the contract other than to furnish or induce Dempsey and Kearns to enter into the contract which at its outset declares that the respondent, as manager, agrees to engage and employ them as artists. Unquestionably, under the contract, Dempsey and Kearns, as individuals, assumed certain obligations toward the respondent, but otherwise the entire burden of carrying out the enterprise so far as the appellant is concerned was assumed by the respondent. Appellant's share in the profits of the venture was not dependent, except as to certain excess income, upon whether the enterprise was a success or not, nor, on the other hand, could the appellant be held liable under the contract for any portion of the loss that might be incurred in the enterprise.

[2] It is too well settled to require discussion that an essential element in a copartnership is the joint ownership of the property, a proportionate sharing in the profits, and a like proportionate sharing in the losses. Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203. The essential element of the copartnership is clearly lacking in the contract.

[3] However, the mere fact that compensation to one or all of the parties is dependent upon the enterprise producing a profit, and that such profit is shared in proportions, does not constitute the arrangement a copartnership. Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 100 P. 236; Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 P. 147.

We are satisfied that the contract in question does not meet the requirements of the provisions of the Civil Code relating to copartnerships so as to constitute it a copartnership.

[4, 5] But, respondent urges, even if his contention of a copartnership cannot be sustained, the contract constitutes a joint enterprise, and upon that theory the money stolen was the joint property of appellant and respondent, and therefore he cannot be held liable to appellant for a share of the funds taken.

The line of demarcation between a "copartnership" and a "joint enterprise" is not clearly drawn, either by statutory enactment or judicial interpretation. The term "joint enterprise" is commonly recognized in judicial discussion as a term used to characterize a single joint venture, while the term "copartnership" is more generally used to characterize a general and continuing joint venture. It is, however, held without dispute that, in order to bring a contract within the legal designation of a copartnership or a joint enterprise, it must appear that the parties thereto are associated together for the joint benefit of all; that they are joint owners of the property belonging to the association, and share jointly in the profits as well as in the same proportion bear the losses that might result from the enterprise. It has been held that certain requisites of a copartnership do not pertain to a joint enterprise, but we do not deem a discussion of those differences as necessary to this decision.

As already pointed out in our discussion, the contract does not provide for joint ownership of the box office receipts, nor for a joint division of the profits; nor does it provide anywhere for a joint sharing of the losses. Furthermore, it appears that the box office receipts which respondent claims were the joint property of respondent and appellant were never dealt with by the parties as joint funds. Indeed, the treatment of the box office receipts, particularly by respondent, would justify but one conclusion, and that is that the parties considered this money was the property of respondent, and that he was obligated to make certain payments to appellant. We are of the opinion that the funds stolen did not constitute the joint property of respondent and appellant, but, rather, the property of respondent, and that under the admissions made during the trial respondent would be liable to appellant for substantially the sum claimed in its complaint.

The record discloses that during the trial the parties showed a disposition to agree upon the amount which would be payable to the appellant by the respondent if it was determined that appellant was entitled to recover in this action. Under these circumstances, it would seem unnecessary to have a retrial of the case, in view of our conclusion on the legal question that seems determinative of the matter. If, therefore, the parties will file a written stipulation as to the amount of money that appellant would be entitled to under the views as herein expressed, then the lower court is directed to prepare findings of fact in accordance with this opinion and conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount from the defendant agreed to in such stipulation, and to enter judgment accordingly; provided that in such findings and judgment defendant shall be awarded judgment against the plaintiff for the sum of $312.70, being the amount claimed by defendant in his cross-complaint, and for which sum judgment was entered by the court in the judgment appealed from. If, however, such stipulation is not filed within such time as the trial court may determine that will enable the court to make the findings, and enter the judgment as here indicated, then a new trial will be necessary only as to the amount claimed owing by the plaintiff in his complaint from the defendant. The claim of the defendant in his cross-complaint against the plaintiff has been determined, and will require no retrial.

That part of the judgment which declares that the plaintiff is entitled to nothing from the defendant on its claim as set forth in its complaint is reversed. The judgment in favor of the defendant on his cross-complaint against the plaintiff is affirmed.

CONTINENTAL RUBBER WORKS v. BERNSON. (Civ. 5267.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 7, 1928.

Interest ⚿18(2)—Interest on open account for reasonable value of goods sold held not allowable prior to judgment, claim being unliquidated (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Plaintiff in action on open account for reasonable "value" of goods sold is, under Civ. Code, § 3287, not entitled to interest prior to judgment, though there was testimony that statement of account showing a claimed balance was served on defendant and payment thereof requested; the demand being unliquidated, and it not being alleged or shown that defendant knew the "market value" or price prior to the time the court made its findings, or that the goods had a well-established market value of which he could have been charged with knowledge, and no demand for payment being pleaded or found.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by the Continental Rubber Works against Benjamin Bernson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Paul F. Garber and Alfred Siemon, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

T. F. Allen and G. W. Hurley, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff sued upon an open account for the reasonable value of certain automobile tires and accessories bought by defendant and his partner, Morris Berncovich. Plaintiff was given judgment against defendant, Bernson, for $564.83 as the reasonable value of the tires and accessories, and $182.50 interest thereon from July 31, 1920, to the time of judgment on March 23, 1925.

Defendant, Bernson, appeals, contending that the demand sued upon was wholly unliquidated and for that reason the allowance of interest accruing prior to judgment was erroneous, and for the additional reason that plaintiff did not allege and the court did not find that plaintiff made any demand for payment prior to the commencement of the action.

Appellant filed no reply brief.

It appears that the account covered deliveries of goods from time to time during a period of several months at values which were determined for the first time at the trial, and that the market values fluctuated six or seven times during the period covered by the deliveries. It does not appear that the market values or prices were well established. Defendant, Bernson, made payments from time to time upon the account during the course of the deliveries.

In his answer defendant, Bernson, denied having purchased or received the goods and denied that they were of the reasonable value alleged in the complaint.

The question arises whether interest should have been allowed for any period before judgment.

Section 3287 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day. * * *"

Interest may be allowed as damages incidental to a debt. Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, 183 Cal. 199, 205, 190 P. 801.

Plaintiff alleged the reasonable value of the goods and produced witnesses who testified to their market price, and the court found that the reasonable value of the goods was $564.83. Bouvier in his Law Dictionary defines the term "value," when referring to property, as "the price which it will command in the market"; and "market value" as "a price established by public sales, or sales in the way of ordinary business, as merchandise," and the "price at which such articles are sold and purchased." The findings have support in the proof.

When damages are capable of ascertainment by calculation, or by reference to well-established market values, together with computation, interest is allowable from the time the damages fall due. Section 3302, Civ. Code; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 69, 18 P. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 399, 199 P. 767; Hind v. Uchida Trading Co., 55 Cal. App. 260, 263, 203 P. 1028; Niles Sand, etc., Co., v. Muir, supra; California Bean Growers Ass'n v. Rindge Land, etc., Co., 199 Cal. 168, 248 P. 658, 47 A. L. R. 904.

In general, interest is not allowable on unliquidated demands for any period prior to judgment. This applies in cases found in quantum meruit and quantum valebat. The reason is that the person liable does not know what sum he owes until determined by the court upon the presentation of the evidence, and therefore he can be in no default for not paying. Cox v. McLaughlin, supra; American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, 768, 121 P. 709; Hanlon Dry Dock, etc., Co. v. McNear, supra, p. 221 (232 P. 1002); Williams v. Flinn & Treacy, supra; Curtin v. State of California, 61 Cal. App. 377, 392, 214 P. 1030; Edwards v. Arp, 173 Cal. 472, 476, 160 P. 551. "Interest has relation to an ascertained principal sum." Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 192 Cal. 343, 356, 219 P. 998, 1003 (30 A. L. R. 1103).

However, in the case of Gray v. Bekins, supra, which was an action founded upon the reasonable value of labor and materials used in repairing a bridge, the court announced that:

> "The general rule is that interest is allowable from the time the sum in suit becomes due if the same is certain or can be made certain by mere calculation. * * * Civ. Code, § 3302; Fairchild v. Bay Point, etc., R. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 328, 134 Pac. 338."

In the Gray Case the answer was tantamount to an ascertainment of the balance found due, and interest was allowed from the date of filing the answer.

In this case plaintiff's claim was an unliquidated demand founded upon the reasonable value of the goods. Although testimony was received to the effect that in the fore part of 1921 plaintiff caused to be delivered to defendant, Bernson, a statement of account showing as the balance claimed of him by plaintiff the sum of $564 and that payment thereof was requested, it was not alleged or shown that defendant, Bernson, knew the market value or price of the goods prior to the time when the court made the findings, or that the goods had a well-established market value of which he could have been charged with knowledge.

Appellant also contends that the provisions of section 1 of the Usury Law (Stats. 1919, Act 3757, Deering's General Laws), relating to interest on accounts, do not apply in this case for the reason that plaintiff did not allege, nor did the court find, that any demand for payment was made by plaintiff. Section 1 of the act provides that:

> "The rate of interest * * * on accounts after demand or judgments rendered in any court of this state, shall be seven dollars upon the one hundred dollars for one year. * * *"

Should we here attempt to solve the proposition whether the Usury Law modifies or changes in any respect the principles announced in the decisions referred to in this opinion and laid down in sections 3287 and 3302 of the Civil Code, relating to the time when interest commences to run on accounts, we would be going outside of the questions involved in this appeal—no demand for payment having been pleaded or found.

Plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to judgment.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the allowance of $182.50 interest, and, as so modified, is affirmed in the amount of $564.83.

Where evidence in action for breach of implied covenant of lease for quiet enjoyment showed that plaintiff had waived benefit of implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, findings on question of eviction and damage were immaterial, and it was unnecessary to determine whether evidence supported such findings.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑130(3)—In action for breach of implied covenant of sublease for quiet enjoyment, evidence by plaintiff's assignor regarding knowledge of conditions of original lease regarding termination to construct building held competent.

In action for damages for breach of implied covenant of sublease for quiet enjoyment by assignee of sublease after owner of land terminated lease to construct new building, evidence by plaintiff's assignor regarding his knowledge that lease from owner to his lessor would be terminated whenever owner desired to build new building held competent on issue whether such knowledge was communicated to plaintiff before latter accepted assignment of lease and as bearing on conduct of plaintiff on question of waiver of implied covenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C Doran, Judge.

Action for damages for breach of implied covenant of lease for quiet enjoyment by Hyman Kushner against the Home Service Company. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Murphy & Cohen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ingall W. Bull and Harold Larson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was written by Burroughs, justice pro tempore, and is adopted as the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff by reason of the alleged violation of an implied covenant of a lease for quiet enjoyment.

The court found against the allegations of the complaint, and denied plaintiff any relief.

It appears from the evidence that the defendant was the owner of a lease of the store property at 601½ South Grand avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. The lease provided that it was subject to cancellation upon five months' notice to the lessee, in the event the owner desired to erect a new building on said property. During the term of said lease the defendant sublet a portion of said premises to one S. Yamanobe for the term commencing July 1, 1921, and ending December 31, 1925. The sublease contained no reference to the building clause above referred to. An officer of the defendant company and the sublessee Yamanobe testified that the latter knew of the building clause, and took the lease with full knowledge and understanding that said lease could be terminated by the owner of the property as provided in the defendant's lease. May 10, 1922, the said Yamanobe, by an instrument in writing, and with the consent of the defendant, assigned said lease to this plaintiff for the remainder of the term, and the plaintiff entered into possession of the premises under and by virtue thereof. On or about January 10, 1924, the lessor of the defendant served on defendant a notice that the latter's lease would terminate on the 30th day of June, 1924. Said notice gave as a reason for the cancellation "the landlord of the undersigned desires the premises for the purpose of erecting a new building." On or about April 15, 1924, defendant served notice on plaintiff that the plaintiff's lease would terminate on the 30th day of June, 1924, and gave as a reason for the termination of the leases "the owner's desire to erect a new building on the present ground."

The above facts are established without conflict.

S. Yamanobe testified that before assigning the lease to plaintiff he told him that the lease would be terminated whenever the owner wanted to tear down the building. He also testified that the negotiations for the sale and assignment of the lease to plaintiff were carried on over a period of several days, and that the last time the plaintiff came to see him he brought with him another man, and during the conversation one of them said: "Well, better you sell out, because any time it be torn down." The witness further testified that plaintiff asked how long a lease he had, and he replied four years, but it would expire any time when the building would be torn down.

Mr. Scott, agent of defendant corporation, testified that the plaintiff and Yamanobe came to his office asking permission to assign the lease, and told him the new occupancy would be for a key and lock store, and he told them it would be agreeable to the defendant company, provided it would be satisfactory to the owners, and that he would find out, and notify them. Thereafter he obtained such permission, and notified the plaintiff and said Yamanobe. Thereafter the witness had many talks with the plaintiff, and about November, 1923, the plaintiff told him of rumors in the neighborhood that the building was going to be torn down, and asked if he would have to get out. "I told him we had received no notice whatever—not to worry until we did."

After notice had been given him, we had another conversation and discussed another location. "I told him, we will take you right along with us wherever we go, and he seemed perfectly agreeable."

Mr. Scott further testified that he later located a room in the 600 block on Sixth street, between Grand and Hope streets, and that he told the plaintiff, "I could get him a space with us there, and went so far as to tell him I could save him money on it. I told him we could get him a space in there for $50, the space he would need, and whether or not he said yes or no I can't testify to, but the inference was that yes, we will do what we can and I says, 'You leave it to me, and we will get something for you.'"

The witness further testified that, after the foregoing conversation, he took the matter up with the agent for the building on Sixth street, and then saw the plaintiff again, and "he said at that time that he had been advised not to go with us, that he had a good air-tight lease where he was, to stay right there. Then I went and made another deal for just a small laundry space, and they divided the room and gave us the use."

This witness also told plaintiff that his rent in the new quarters would be $50 instead of $75 per month, as in the old quarters.

The evidence further discloses that at the signing of the lease between the defendant and Yamanobe the rent for the last month was paid; that plaintiff, upon the assignment of the lease, paid Yamanobe the $75 above referred to, and that payment was credited by the defendant to the plaintiff for the June, 1925, rent. Plaintiff tendered to defendant $75 for the rent of June, 1925, but his check therefor was returned to him. The plaintiff continued to occupy the premises until August, 1925, when the landlord, in tearing down the old building, took out the windows.

As against this testimony, the plaintiff denied that he had any knowledge of the building clause in the defendant's lease; denied he had any knowledge that his sublease could be terminated until he received notice that it was terminated by reason of the owner's desire to build; denied that he had ever been informed by Yamanobe that the lease would expire if the owner desired to tear down the building.

The court found that, at the time of entering into said lease with plaintiff's assignor, said plaintiff's assignor well knew that the defendant was leasing said premises under a lease which provided that said lease would be subject to cancellation upon five months' notice to the defendant, in the event the owner of said property desired to construct a building thereon, and said plaintiff's assignor at said time agreed to said provision and to the cancellation of his lease, in the event the defendant's lease thereon was canceled by said owners. The court further found that, at the time of the assignment of the lease to plaintiff of plaintiff's assignor S. Yamanobe's interest in and to said lease, plaintiff was fully informed of the provision in the defendant's lease for the cancellation thereof, and also of his assignor's consent to the cancellation as provided in the last-named lease, and that plaintiff accepted said assignment subject thereto. The court further found that plaintiff had waived any benefit he might have been entitled to under section 1927 of the Civil Code.

Under the title "Grounds Urged for Reversal," the appellant says:

> "(1) Admitting for argument's sake that the plaintiff was chargeable with constructive notice of the over-lease, that it might be canceled on six months' notice, his rights were not concluded, and he was entitled to damages from his immediate lessor.
> "(2) Appellant did not waive the benefit of section 1927 of the Civil Code.
> "(3) The findings, almost in their entirety, are contrary to the evidence.
> "(4) The trial court erred in overruling objections to questions calling for hearsay evidence."

We will first consider the objection that the court erred in holding that appellant had waived the benefit of the implied covenant of quiet enjoyment, under the provisions of section 1927 of the Civil Code. Said section provides:

> "An agreement to let upon hire binds the letter to secure to the hirer the quiet possession of the thing hired during the term of the hiring, against all persons lawfully claiming the same."

[1-3] There can be no question under the above section that the lease assigned to the plaintiff carried with it, even in the absence of a special covenant for quiet enjoyment, an implied one binding upon the defendant. Pedro v. Potter, 197 Cal. 751, 242 P. 926, 42 A. L. R. 1165; Baranov v. Scudder, 177 Cal. 458, 170 P. 1122. The foregoing section of the Code must, however, be read and construed in conjunction with section 3268 of the Civil Code, which provides:

> "Except where it is otherwise declared, the provisions of the foregoing fifteen titles of this part, in respect to the rights and obligations of parties to contracts, are subordinate to the intention of the parties, when ascertained in the manner prescribed by the chapter on the interpretation of contracts; and the benefit thereof may be waived by any party entitled thereto, unless such waiver would be against public policy."

Chapter one of title 5, of which section 1927, supra, forms a part, is embraced within the fifteen titles designated in said section 3268 of the Civil Code.

Viewing the instant case in the light of the foregoing section of the Code, the court found that plaintiff waived the benefit of section 1927 of the Civil Code. The evidence in support of this finding, although not without conflict, is substantially as follows: The lease held by the defendant contained a provision for cancellation in case the owner desired to tear down the old building and erect a new one. This clause was not contained in the sublease which the defendant gave to the plaintiff's assignor, but said assignor was fully informed of this provision, and entered into possession, with the agreement and understanding that his sublease terminated whenever the owner desired to enforce the building clause. When the sublessee was negotiating with the plaintiff for a sale of the sublease, the plaintiff was informed of the building clause, and that his lease would terminate whenever the owner wanted to build. With this knowledge and agreement, the plaintiff took the assignment of the lease. That by taking the assignment with such knowledge he intended to waive the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment would appear to be the only logical construction that could be placed upon such conduct.

It is claimed by appellant that, under the title relating to the interpretation of contracts referred to in section 3268 of the Civil Code, parol evidence was not admissible, as it varied the terms of the written lease, and he cites in support of this claim sections 1637, 1638, and 1639 of the Civil Code. But in the case at bar the evidence was received, not for the purpose of varying the terms of the written contract, but solely upon the question as to a waiver by the plaintiff of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. In 27 Ruling Case Law, § 7, p. 912, it is held that waiver is a question of fact, and the sufficiency of the evidence relating thereto is for the jury. Again, in the same volume, section 6, p. 910, it is said:

> "Waiver must be clearly proved, but this may be effected by various species of evidence. Thus it may be proved by express declaration or agreement, or by acts and conduct manifesting an intent and purpose not to claim the supposed advantage. * * *"

California S. H. Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 120, 29 P. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99, was an action upon a stock subscription. The defense was interposed that the conditions of the stock agreement had not been complied with, and it was held that this defense had been waived by the conduct of the defendant. The Supreme Court says:

> "The waiver may be express, or it may be by implication from the acts and declarations of the subscriber."

Appellant relies upon the case of Baranov v. Scudder, supra, but as we read that case it differs in many material aspects from the case at bar. In the Baranov Case, Scudder was a tenant of certain real property under a lease from the Western Union Telegraph Company. The lease contained a provision against subletting and a forfeiture of the lease for a violation of said provisions. In violation of that provision, Scudder sublet the premises to the respondent Baranov. The Western Union Telegraph Company exercised its option, and evicted Baranov because of this breach of the lease. Baranov then commenced this action against Scudder, and obtained judgment for damage suffered by reason of his eviction by the telegraph company. In upholding the decision of the trial court, the Supreme Court held that it appeared without conflict that Baranov knew that Scudder was a lessee merely, and, knowing that fact, he took with notice of the contents of the overlease as to the forfeiture clause. But, notwithstanding such knowledge, he had a right to assume that his immediate lessor had or would make such arrangements as would protect him in the quiet enjoyment of his term, and that, in the absence of such an arrangement, the sublessee had an action for any damage suffered by reason of an eviction. However, in the instant case the plaintiff was informed that the lease would expire whenever the overlord wanted to tear down the old building and erect the new one. Plaintiff knew from this that no arrangement for an extension of the term had been or would be made. He entered into the assignment with full knowledge of this fact, and, either by himself or a party present during the negotiations with Yamanobe, that fact was used in argument to Yamanobe as a reason why he should assign for a lesser figure. We are satisfied that the plaintiff waived the implied provision for quiet enjoyment, and the judgment of the trial court upon this question was correct.

[4, 5] Under the third assignment of error it is contended that the findings of the trial court are nearly all contrary to the evidence. From the foregoing review of the evidence upon the subject of waiver, it is apparent that the findings thereon are amply supported by the evidence.

[6] The court also found that the plaintiff had not been evicted from the premises. Also that he had not been damaged by reason of any act or acts of the defendant. Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiff had waived the benefit of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, the findings on the question of eviction and damage become immaterial, and no useful purpose would be served by an examination of the evidence upon those issues.

In Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 P. 495, it is held that a judgment will not be reversed on appeal because of failure to make findings which would not necessitate a different judgment, even if they were made and entered in the appellant's favor.

In Dalton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 7 Cal. App. 510, 94 P. 868, it is held that, if the findings as made support the judgment, it is immaterial whether other material findings are or are not supported by the evidence, as it could not affect the result. To the same effect are Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 P. 186; Coyle v. Lamb, 123 Cal. 264, 55 P. 901.

[7] The final alleged error is that the court erred in overruling appellant's objection to the following question propounded to the appellant's assignor:

> "Q. Now at that time, did you know the conditions of the lease, the Home Service Company had with the owners?
> "Mr. Cohen: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and varying the terms of a written lease now in evidence.
> "The Court: Overruled."

An examination of the transcript reveals that the question was not answered. However, later in his examination, the plaintiff's assignor testified without objection that he knew respondent's lease would be terminated whenever the owner desired to build a new building. This evidence, when considered in connection with the later testimony of said assignor, shows that this knowledge was communicated to the plaintiff before the latter accepted the assignment of the lease, and was material as bearing upon the conduct of plaintiff on the question of waiver of the implied covenant of his lease.

There are no other questions presented by appellant, and, as none of those already considered require a reversal of the judgment, it is ordered that said judgment be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

HOLMES v. SCHMITT et al. (Civ. 6144.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 10, 1928.

1. Bankruptcy ⚿302(1)—Complaint by trustee in bankruptcy, framed on common count for money had and received, need not allege leave to sue by bankruptcy court.

Complaint by trustee in bankruptcy, framed on a common count for money had and received, need not allege that trustee had leave to sue from bankruptcy court, since in such case capacity of plaintiff to sue is not a matter which he is required to plead, and point must be raised by defendant by special plea.

2. Appeal and error ⚿766—On failure of appellants claiming insufficiency of evidence to print evidence, findings, or judgment as required by statute, judgment must be affirmed (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Where appellants claiming that evidence is insufficient to support findings and that judgment was contrary to evidence failed to print evidence, findings, or judgment, or to otherwise comply with provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, the judgment must be affirmed.

3. Bankruptcy ⚿303(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that certain money belonging to bankrupt corporation was received and held by corporate manager and another.

In action by trustee in bankruptcy to recover money alleged to have been received by corporate manager and another on behalf of bankrupt, evidence held to sustain finding that certain money received and held by defendants belonged to bankrupt corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Holmes, trustee of the estate of the Fox Bros. Sporting Goods Company, a bankrupt, against Henry M. Schmitt and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Minor Blythe, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. L. Rowland and Dunham & Thompson, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued as trustee in bankruptcy of Fox Bros. Sporting Goods Company (a corporation) to recover $9,000 alleged to have been received by defendants on behalf of the bankrupt. Plaintiff had judgment for $8,390.85 against both defendants, from which they appeal on a typewritten record.

Two grounds are urged for a reversal of the judgment: That the plaintiff was not authorized by the United States District Court to prosecute the action; and that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment. The defendant Fox was the sole owner and directing head of the corporation, which was engaged in the sporting goods business in Grand Junction, Colo., on June 4, 1923, when the stock and fixtures of the concern were damaged by fire. Fox obtained from the insurance companies, as compensation for the damages, $4,615, and received, by way of salvage from damaged goods, $3,775.85. For some time following the fire he conducted a fire sale to dispose of these goods, and on December 20, 1923, paid to his mother $3,500 and to his sister $1,200, which, he claimed, had been loaned him for use in the business. On December 24, 1923, he claimed to have received from his codefendant, who was his nephew, the sum of $9,000 for the purpose of investing it in California. This sum, he testified, was received by him in cash and carried upon his person until April, 1924, at which time he purchased three cashier's checks in St. Louis for the sum of $3,000 each, which he carried with him until June, 1924, when he deposited them in a bank in Los Angeles. This deposit was made in the name of Henry M. Schmitt, but the defendant Fox procured from Schmitt a power of attorney which authorized him to draw the money from the bank. On February 29, 1924, defendant Fox was adjudicated a bankrupt, and at the trial of this action he testified that at the time of this adjudication he had no assets of any kind or no property belonging to the corporation. The judgment in this action represents the sum of the value of the salvaged stock which the defendant Fox disposed of after the fire and the amount paid to him by the insurance companies for the loss. It is the theory of the plaintiff and respondent that these sums were obtained by Fox as assets of the corporation, and that the purported repayment of loans to his mother and sister was made to cover up the misappropriation by him of corporate funds, and that the purported transaction with his nephew whereby Fox claimed to have received the sum of $9,000 for purposes of investment was merely a paper transaction for the same purpose.

[1] As to the first point raised by the appellants, that the trustee did not have leave to sue from the bankruptcy court, the point is not in issue. The complaint was framed upon a common count for money had and received, and the capacity of the plaintiff to sue is not a matter which he was required to plead. This point could be raised by the defendants by special plea of want of capacity to sue. The appellant Fox did not attempt to raise it, while the appellant Schmitt pleaded merely want of information and belief and made no effort to prove the defense.

[2, 3] The second point raised is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and that the judgment is contrary to the evidence. The appellants, however, have not printed the evidence, the findings, or the judgment, and in fact have made no effort to comply with the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure. For this reason alone the judgment must be affirmed. Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 359, 233 P. 330. We have, however, examined the record, and are satisfied that the trial court properly found that the money represented in the judgment belonged to the bankrupt corporation and that it was received and held by the appellants for the use and benefit of that corporation. Some of the testimony of the appellants is printed in their brief tending to show that this sum of $9,000 was given to appellant Fox by Schmitt to enable the former to invest it for Schmitt in Los Angeles. This, however, only serves to create a conflict with the undisputed evidence of the circumstances under which the appellant Fox obtained the money of the corporation following the fire and of the suspicious circumstances under which he claimed to have paid from these moneys the sum of $4,700 in satisfaction of purported loans from his mother and sister. In addition to this, it appears that throughout the trial the testimony of the appellants was so contradictory and improbable in itself that the trial court was justified in rejecting it is unreliable. Thus the allegation in the complaint of the receipt of the corporate funds is admitted, while the defense of disbursement for corporate purposes is not proved.

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGE v. SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 5016.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 11, 1928.

1. Banks and banking ⟹148(2)—Bank paying check on forged indorsement and collecting from drawee bank held liable to payee's assignee.

Assignee of payee of check, accepted and certified by drawee bank on presentation by one without authority to receive or indorse it, who thereupon forged payee's name and passed check to another who collected amount from another bank, which, in turn, collected from drawee bank, held entitled to recover amount from collecting bank on theory of ratification of collection by payee.

2. Pleading ⟹8(2)—Allegation of payee's ratification of collection of check by bank paying it on forged indorsement would be improper as conclusion.

In action against collecting bank on check presented with forged indorsement after acceptance and certification by drawee bank, allegation of payee's ratification of collection would have been improper as mere conclusion; ratification being fact to be drawn from proof adduced on allegations of facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by L. B. George against the Security Trust & Savings Bank. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Edgar K. Brown and L. B. George, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. A demurrer to the original complaint was sustained, and plaintiff filed an amended complaint. To this pleading a demurrer was likewise interposed. It was sustained by the court without leave to amend, and judgment went for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

There is no contention that plaintiff desired further to amend, and the briefs respond to the one question only: Does the complaint state a cause of action? This is the sole question to be considered here.

[1] The facts as alleged in the complaint are concisely put in appellant's opening brief, as follows:

"The complaint alleges that Lynch drew his check to the order of Vanderbilt and gave it to Allen, who had no authority to receive or indorse the same; that the drawee bank accepted and certified the check; that Allen thereupon forged the payee's name and passed the check to Cohen; that Cohen collected the amount thereof from the defendant bank; and defendant in turn collected the amount from the drawee bank; that the payee has demanded the amount from defendant, who refuses to pay."

Plaintiff is the assignee of the payee.

It seems that the exact point here presented has never been presented to the reviewing courts of this state, but it has been very thoroughly presented to the courts of last resort of several sister states, and the great weight of authority unquestionably is that the facts alleged in this case do state a cause of action.

The Supreme Court of Colorado had a case before it in all essentials the same as the instant one, and the opinion so well expresses the prevailing view that we shall quote therefrom extensively:

"In this case the payee in the checks seeks to recover from another bank who accepted and paid these checks upon forged indorsements, and thereafter collected the amounts upon the checks from the bank upon which they were drawn. In such case the rule in Tennessee, New Jersey, Ohio, New York, and Indiana is that the payee can recover from a bank which accepted them from the forger and collected them from the drawee bank, as for moneys had and received, even though it has fully paid over and accounted for the same to the forger without knowledge or suspicion of the forgery. Farmer v. People's Bank, 100 Tenn. 187, 47 S. W. 234; Knoxville Water Co. v. East Tennessee Nat. Bank, 123 Tenn. 364, 131 S. W. 447; Buckley v. Second Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. Law, 400, 10 Am. Rep. 249; Shaffer v. McKee, 19 Ohio St. 526; Talbot v. Bank of Rochester, 1 Hill [N. Y.] 295; Johnson v. First Nat. Bank, 6 Hun [N. Y.] 124; Graves v. American Exch. Bank, 17 N. Y. 205; Indiana Nat. Bank v. Holtschaw [Holtsclaw] 98 Ind. 85. This same principle is laid down in volume 1 (4th Ed.) of Morse on Banks and Banking, wherein, at page 483, the author states: 'If a negotiable instrument having a forged indorsement come to the hands of a bank and is collected by it, the proceeds are held for the rightful owners of the paper, and may be recovered by them, although the bank gave value for the paper, or has paid over the proceeds to the party depositing the instrument for collection.' These cases are based upon the theory of ratification by the payee of the collection of the check from the drawee, and that the collecting bank can then be held as for moneys had and received, and that the payment by the drawee bank to the collecting bank with the forged indorsement thereon is evidence that the check was accepted and paid by the drawee bank, which acts the payee ratifies." United States Portland Cement Co. v. United States National Bank of Denver, 61 Colo. 334, 157 P. 202, L. R. A. 1917A, 145.

The leading case taking the opposite view is Tibby, etc., v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 220 Pa. 1, 69 A. 280, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519. This case states the rule prevailing in some jurisdictions that the payee of a check cannot maintain an action against a drawee bank until the check has been accepted by it, because there is no privity of contract or other relation existing between the payee and the bank which establishes an obligation to pay or from which an assumption to pay arises. It then declares flatly that:

> "The plaintiff's right of action against the defendant [paying] bank is not superior to its right of action against the drawee banks. The money paid the defendant on the several checks was the money of the drawee banks, in which neither the drawers of the checks nor the plaintiff had any interest, and, having been paid on forged indorsements, it may be recovered from the defendant by the paying banks. The defendant, therefore, has received no money for or on account of the plaintiff company, and for which, in good conscience, it should account to the plaintiff."

The court, in this decision, did not adopt the theory of ratification of the check so clearly expounded in United States Portland Cement Co. v. United States National Bank, supra. A very useful note to the Tibby Case may be found in 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519, closing with this statement:

> "It is apparent from this review of the reported cases that the holding of Tibby Bros. Glass Co. v. Farmers' & M. Bank is contrary to the weight of authority."

A comprehensive note following the Portland Cement Company Case at page 148 of L. R. A. 1917A, refers to the Tibby Case and says, "But it is the only case in which this position is taken."

Respondent claims that the decisions cited by appellant were all prior to the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Laws and comments upon the old case of Talbot v. Bank of Rochester, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 295, referred to and quoted from in several of the later decisions. He then proceeds to argue that the weight of authority, and particularly since the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Laws is that the holder of a check cannot maintain an action against the drawee bank unless and until the check has been accepted by the drawee bank. For the sake of argument this may be conceded, but we do not appreciate the relevancy of this statement to the instant set of facts, nor do we see any applied importance in the statement in the brief immediately following this argument: "And that the acts of an intermediary bank do not constitute an acceptance." We confess we do not see that any great importance should be given to the fact that the drawee bank certified the check. Appellant in his reply brief asserts that the Portland Cement Company Case and the cases cited therein were decided since the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instrument Laws in those jurisdictions. Whether this is so or not, we do not believe the doctrine in those cases is contrary to any section thereof. We think the better reasoning is with the theory of ratification as stated in the Portland Cement Company Case, and, the great weight of authority being that way, we adopt it in this case.

[2] Respondent further contends that the matter of ratification should be alleged, but that would be alleging a conclusion. There are allegations in the complaint as to the facts, and whether or not there was a ratification is to be drawn from the proof adduced upon these allegations.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Petition by John Paul Fernel for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the State Board of Medical Examiners and others, compelling them to issue a license to petitioner to practice medicine. From the judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Petitioner applied to the board of medical examiners of the state of California for a certificate to practice medicine in this state under the Medical Practice Act, chapter 354, Statutes 1913. The board denied the application, and petitioner secured an alternative writ of mandate from the superior court. Upon a hearing, the court entered judgment "that the petitioner is not entitled to a writ of mandate, and that his petition be and the same is denied." Petitioner appeals therefrom.

Reduced to its simplest form, the question here to be considered is whether or not the board had a right to reject petitioner's application because it was not satisfied of the good moral character of the applicant. Section 8 of the Medical Practice Act, hereinafter referred to as "the act," provides among other things for the issuance of a "physician and surgeon certificate," a "drugless practitioner certificate," and a "reciprocity certificate." A reciprocity certificate does not refer to another class of the healing science, but refers to the manner of granting either a physician and surgeon certificate or a drugless practitioner certificate to an applicant who has practiced his profession in a sister state. The petitioner below, appellant here, claims that the act does not authorize the board to decline to grant the certificate because it is not satisfied that the applicant is possessed of a good moral character. He contends that the board has no jurisdiction to consider this subject at all in connection with an application for a reciprocity certificate, but argumentatively admits that the board may consider the subject when passing on an application for any other certificate.

[1, 2] Section 9 of the act states: "Every applicant must file with the board * * * satisfactory testimonials of good moral character." Following this section the details of requirements for the granting of certificates to practice the two schools of healing are set out, and then logically (section 13) follow the detailed requirements for the granting of a "reciprocity certificate." It should here be recollected that a reciprocity certificate is exactly like any other certificate in its class, and is a badge authorizing exactly the same acts. Every person appearing before the board for permission to practice his profession must file an application, and is throughout the act denominated an applicant. The act is not designed as a series of independent acts, but is one act designed to enforce its requirements for the protection of the people of the state. The general language of section 9, referring to the requirement of "satisfactory testimonials of good moral character," applies, of course, to every applicant under every section of the act. If this were not so, it would apply to none. This is so obvious that the mere statement of it is a conclusive argument as to its truth. Courts read statutes in the light of their common sense meaning and intention. The expressed meaning and intention of this portion of section 9 is plain and absolutely free from ambiguity. If it be required that one shall show reasonable evidence that he is an ordinarily decent fellow before he shall have the privilege of submitting himself to the examination provided before he may emerge from the status of a student to that of a licensed practitioner in our state, what reason could be advanced to excuse this showing in a recent comer in our midst, whose history is unknown to us, and who may have found it convenient to seek pastures new for reasons not comfortable to disclose? The plain expression of the act, its evident intent, and its sound reasonableness as protective legislation appeal to us, as it evidently did to the trial court. It must be borne in mind in this connection that no question as to abuse of discretion on behalf of the board is here presented. We are not shown the record upon which the board acted, and no intimation is made anywhere in the proceedings that it acted in any other than a reasonable and proper manner. The jurisdiction of the board alone is challenged.

[3, 4] Appellant points out that no proceeding has been taken by the board under section 14 of the act, but, when it is understood that this section applies to the accusation of a practitioner or applicant of "unprofessional conduct," and that the phrase is defined in this section as covering a number of specific acts connected with the practice of the profession, it will readily be seen that it is not intended to cover or apply to the requirement of section 9 as to "good moral character," although some of the acts designated are in close relation to good morals, and a person of good moral character would not resort to such acts. Moral character in a physician of any school contemplates a broader sphere of conduct than that relating specifically to his profession.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by J. J. Mellus against W. A. Potter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove and Robert B. Murphey, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carroll Allen and A. E. McManus, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $6,000 upon a contract between appellant and respondent for one-half of certain commissions derived through the negotiation of a lease. The trial was had before a jury, and a verdict was returned for the sum of $4,478.74 in favor of plaintiff. This appeal is taken from the judgment entered upon said verdict.

As to the facts involved, it appears that during the month of March, 1922, respondent endeavored, as a broker, to procure an oil lease from Gardena Syndicate to the Burhnam Company. He was approached by appellant, who convinced him that he (appellant) was in a position to procure the lease from the said syndicate, and appellant also stated that he could get a good commission from the said syndicate, and this commission would be divided equally between them. Respondent told him it was all right, and for him to go ahead. The parties also agreed to divide equally any commission received from the Burhnam Company. Both the proposed lessor and lessee knew of the arrangement in respect to the said commissions.

The lease was consummated, and the Burhnam Company paid appellant the sum of $3,500 as a commission. The syndicate also paid appellant a commission, amounting to $8,957.49.

Appellant admits the contract for commissions was made, and admits the receipt by him of the said commissions. He relies upon the insufficiency of the evidence as his principal ground for reversal. At the trial a receipt in the following words, and admittedly signed by respondent, was admitted in evidence:

> "June 14, 1922.
> "Received of Potter & Smith five hundred ($500.00) dollars payment in full for all deals up to date. J. J. Mellus."

And it is contended by appellant that this release "is an insuperable bar to recovery on the part of plaintiff," and that the jury could have drawn but one conclusion from the evidence, to wit, that respondent had released all claim to the commissions mentioned, in consideration of the receipt of the said sum of $500.

It is admitted by respondent that as to the commission of $3,500 he makes no claim. His position is, however, that the receipt does not cover or apply to the commissions received from the lessor syndicate. Unquestionably the jury so found, for their verdict was for one-half of the commissions received by appellant from the syndicate.

Section 1542 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

> "A general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, which if known by him must have materially affected his settlement with the debtor."

[1] Appellant argues that, under the evidence introduced at the trial, the only conclusion the jury could have reasonably drawn was that respondent knew or suspected the the existence of a claim in his favor arising out of commissions to be received from the syndicate. Therefore, appellant contends, the only possible verdict the jury could have rendered was one in his favor, as the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict for respondent. The only inquiry to be made by this court is whether or not there was substantial evidence to support the verdict. If the record contains such evidence, we cannot disturb the verdict. Taylor v. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co. (Cal. App.) 260 P. 898.

[2] Respondent testified that, at the time the receipt was given, nothing except the commission for $3.500 was discussed; that there was no understanding at that time to the effect that the receipt would cover any commissions received by appellant from the syndicate; that nothing was said about a contract between appellant and the syndicate for the giving of a commission; that he did not learn of the commission contract between the syndicate and appellant until informed of the fact afterward by Mr. Wright (connected by the syndicate); that if appellant had notified him (respondent) that he had a contract, it would have been a different proposition, but he never did.

[3] We are satisfied that from the foregoing evidence the jury was justified in finding that respondent did not know or suspect, at the time he signed the said receipt, that he had any claim against appellant arising out of the commissions received from the syndicate. Furthermore, the contract between appellant and the syndicate, covering said commissions, was not signed until five days after the execution of said receipt. It is earnestly contended by appellant that while respondent did not know of any claim he may have had against appellant at the time of the execution of said receipt, the evidence shows without contradiction that he suspected a claim to exist. To adopt this rule of construing the evidence would be, in effect, taking away from the jury their undoubted right to draw inferences from the testimony before them. That the jury might well have drawn the inference, from the evidence, as to want of suspicion on the part of respondent, there is no question, and upon this review of the evidence we are bound to hold that such inference, favorable to respondent and in support of the verdict, was made. Cooley v. Brunswig Drug Co., 30 Cal. App. 58, 157 P. 13; 24 Cor. Jur. § 230.

[4] There is also another reason why section 1542 has no application here. There is no proof, at the time said receipt was signed, that any claim existed in favor of respondent in respect to the syndicate commissions. "Claim," in its primary meaning, is used to indicate the assertion of an existing right. In its secondary meaning, it may be used to indicate the right itself. Appeal of Beach, 76 Conn. 118, 55 A. 596, 599. At the time of the execution of the said receipt no contract for the commissions in question had been executed by appellant and the syndicate, nor had appellant then received said commissions. The claim mentioned in the Code refers to an existing right in favor of the creditor, and not to rights which have not yet accrued.

The action of the trial court in denying the motion for a nonsuit was proper. Our discussion with reference to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict applies also to that motion, as the testimony summarized was all a part of plaintiff's case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GATLIN. (Cr. 1601.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 18, 1928.

Intoxicating liquors 🔑240—Verdict finding defendant guilty "of possession of intoxicating liquor," omitting word "unlawful" before "possession," held sufficient to support judgment of conviction.

Verdict reading. "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of the possession of intoxicating liquor," omitting word "unlawful" before word "possession," held sufficient to support judgment of conviction, where jury was carefully instructed that mere possession of liquor was not a crime, and no point was made that evidence was insufficient to support verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Joice Gatlin was convicted of possessing intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Stowe, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. He appeals from the judgment, from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial, and from an order of the trial court denying a motion for his release.

The verdict rendered in the cause reads: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of the possession of intoxicating liquor." It will be observed that the verdict omits the word "unlawful" before the word "possession." The sole contention made by appellant is that the verdict fails to support the judgment of conviction.

The charge made by the information was properly phrased; it notified appellant of the exact nature of the charge against him, and he makes no objection to it. The jury was carefully instructed that the mere possession of intoxicating liquor is not a crime, and other instructions were given which informed the jury as to the elements of the crime with which appellant was charged. Moreover, no point is made that the evidence was insufficient to prove the charge or to support a verdict of guilty. Under all these circumstances we think the verdict was sufficient. See People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 P. 675; People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430, 155 P. 1026; People v. Mercado, 59 Cal. App. 69, 209 P. 1035. The fact that the jury declared appellant "guilty," after hearing the information, the plea of not guilty, and the instructions of the court, is alone a circumstance of great weight.

Judgment and orders affirmed.

LAW et al. v. TITLE GUARANTEE & TRUST CO. et al. (Civ. 6165.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 7, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1928.

1. Deeds 🔑211(1)—Proof of occasional lapse of memory or belief in spiritualism is not proof of grantor's mental incapacity.

Neither the proof of an occasional lapse of memory nor the belief in spiritualism is proof of grantor's mental incapacity to execute deed.

2. Time 🔑10(10)—Generally, final day to perform contract is excluded if it falls on Sunday or holiday.

General rule for computing time within which a contract may be performed is to exclude the final day when it chances to fall on a Sunday or holiday and include the succeeding business day.

3. Time 🔑10(10)—Time to pay part of purchase price for realty having expired on Sunday, November 11, Armistice Day, following Monday was holiday and payment on Tuesday, November 13, was timely (Pol. Code, § 10; Civ. Code, § 11).

Where last of 30 days to pay half of purchase price expired on Sunday, November 11, 1923, which was also Armistice Day, a statutory holiday, held that, under Pol. Code, § 10, providing that when November 11 falls on Sunday, the Monday following is a holiday, and Civ. Code, § 11, providing that contract to be performed on a particular day falling on a holiday may be performed on next business day, Monday, November 12, was a legal holiday, and payment on Tuesday, November 13, by purchasers was timely.

4. Escrows 🔑10—Allegation of purchasers' complaint that price agreed to be paid for land was just, fair, and adequate held sufficient allegation of value, in absence of demurrer (Civ. Code, § 3380).

In purchasers' action, under Civ. Code, § 3380, to obtain delivery of deed wrongfully withheld by depositary after termination of escrow, allegation of complaint that purchase price agreed to be paid for property was just, fair, and adequate consideration held sufficient allegation of value of land, in absence of demurrer, if any allegation of value was necessary.

5. Escrows 🔑10—Findings that allegations of purchasers' complaint were true and that defendants' denials thereof were untrue held sufficient findings of value and adequacy of consideration (Civ. Code, § 3380).

In purchasers' action, under Civ. Code, § 3380, to obtain delivery of deed wrongfully withheld by depositary after termination of escrow, finding that allegations of complaint were true and that defendants' denials thereof were untrue held sufficient findings of fact as to value and adequacy of consideration.

6. Specific performance 🔑49(2)—Requirement of allegation and proof of adequate consideration in specific performance action merely means that consideration is substantially just and fair under circumstances.

Requirement of allegation and proof of an adequate consideration in an action for specific performance does not mean that contract price shall necessarily measure up to the highest market value of the property, but merely that it is a substantially just and fair valuation under all the circumstances of the case.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑13—Contract price of $16,500 for realty which real estate broker testified was worth $18,700 held not unjust or inadequate as matter of law (Civ. Code, § 3380).

Contract price of $16,500 for realty which real estate broker testified was worth $18,700 held not unjust or inadequate as matter of law, even if purchasers' right to obtain delivery of deed, under Civ. Code, § 3380, depended on adequacy of consideration.

8. Escrows 🔑10—Purchasers suing to compel delivery of deed by depositary need not allege or prove value or adequacy of consideration (Civ. Code, § 3380).

In purchasers' action, under Civ. Code, § 3380, to obtain delivery of deed wrongfully withheld by depositary after termination of an escrow, purchasers need not allege or prove the value of the property or the adequacy of consideration.

9. Escrows 🔑10—Grantee may sue third person to whom escrow holder wrongfully delivers property without joining latter or grantor.

If escrow holder wrongfully delivers property to third person, grantee may bring action against him without joining escrow holder or grantor.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

10. Escrows ⇨10—If grantor and depositary wrongfully convert property of grantee, they may be joined as defendants.

If grantor and depositary wrongfully convert property of grantee, they may be joined as defendants.

11. Escrows ⇨9—On performance of escrow conditions, depositary holds instrument as trustee for party entitled thereto (Civ. Code, § 1057).

Under Civ. Code, § 1057, defining escrow, when conditions on which deposit of instrument have been fully performed, relationship of interested parties automatically changes and depositary is then deemed to hold instrument as trustee for party entitled thereto and not in escrow.

12. Escrows ⇨8(2)—Depositary's failure to indorse accumulated interest as paid on note, to prorate rent and taxes and furnish guaranty certificates of title held not to authorize rescission of escrow by grantor or his heirs.

Any failure of depositary to fulfill escrow instructions as to indorsing on note accumulated interest to close of escrow, grantor intending to waive interest, and as to apportioning rent and taxes or furnishing guaranty certificates of title, held matters of which purchasers alone had right to complain, and did not harm grantor, so as to authorize grantor or his heirs to rescind escrow.

13. Escrows ⇨10—Evidence held to support findings that purchasers had fully performed conditions of escrow, entitling them to delivery of deed (Civ. Code, § 3380).

In purchasers' action, under Civ. Code, § 3380, to obtain delivery of deed wrongfully withheld by depositary after termination of escrow, evidence held to support findings that purchasers had fully performed every requirement of escrow contract on their part and that escrow was terminated, thus entitling them to delivery of deed of conveyance from depositary.

14. Escrows ⇨8(2)—Grantor's death after purchasers fully performed escrow conditions before manual delivery of deed held not to defeat purchasers' right to deed.

Where purchasers had fully performed every requirement of escrow contract, fact that grantor subsequently died before actual manual delivery of deed by depositary did not defeat their right to possession of deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Suit by F. M. Law and another against the Title Guarantee & Trust Company and Leo H. Nolte, individually and as administrator with will annexed of the estate of C. A. Nolte, deceased. Judgment for plaintiffs, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

William M. Hiatt, of Los Angeles, for appellant Leo H. Nolte individually.

William M. Hiatt and Frederick Baker, both of Los Angeles, for appellant Leo H. Nolte, as administrator, etc.

Cunningham & Blackburn and Porter C. Blackburn, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs in an equitable action decreeing delivery of an escrow deed to a portion of a certain Los Angeles lot to the grantees thereof, and quieting title thereto.

The appellant contends that (1) the grantor was of unsound mind; that (2) the deposit of the deed did not constitute an escrow; that (3) the conditions of the escrow were not performed; that (4) the escrow was revoked by the heirs of the grantor; that (5) the decree quieting title to the lot in question disregarded the validity of an existing mortgage lien; and that (6) the record is devoid of evidence of the value of the property or the adequacy of consideration for the purchase thereof.

The appellant's intestate, C. A. Nolte, was 89 years of age, and resided in Los Angeles. He was the owner of that portion of lot 6 of the Amey tract of Los Angeles, which is involved in this action. October 12, 1923, the grantor procured Kells & Grant, his real estate agents, to prepare a written contract of sale of said lot to the respondents for the sum of $16,500, by the terms of which agreement the agents receipted for $500 to be applied upon the purchase price. It was provided that the purchasers should pay the sum of $8,250 in cash, and execute and deliver to the seller a note secured by mortgage on said lot for the further sum of $8,250. This note and mortgage were to be deposited upon the delivery of a deed of conveyance of said premises free of incumbrance, together with a certificate of title to be issued by an acceptable company. This agreement was duly signed by the agents, by the owner, C. A. Nolte, and was assented to by F. M. Law, representing the purchasers. By the terms of this contract the owner agreed to pay the agent $825 as commissions for consummating the sale, which sum was to be retained from the purchase price. Pursuant to this agreement, a note and mortgage for $8,250 were executed by the respondents and acknowledged October 23, 1923, at the office of Kells & Grant. A deed to the lot in question was duly executed by the owner and acknowledged in the office of said agents October 18th. These instruments, together with written escrow instructions signed by C. A. Nolte, were, at his instance, delivered to the defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a corporation, at Los Angeles. With this title company the respondents deposited the balance of the purchase price, to wit, $7,762, on November 13, 1923. These instruments were indorsed by Mr. Baker, the escrow clerk of the trust company, as follows: "Baker—No. 504,561." The escrow instructions read:

"Los Angeles, Cal., October 12, 1923. Title Guarantee & Trust Company. I hand you herewith grant deed executed by C. A. Nolte to F. M. Law and Vera B. Law, on the following described property, * * * which you are authorized to use upon payment to you within 30 days from the date hereof for my account, the sum of $8,250, and a mortgage executed by [the grantees] in favor of C. A. Nolte [reciting the terms of the note and mortgage]. * * * Indorse interest on back of note to date of close of escrow. Said mortgage shall be first lien on the above-described property. * * * Prorate rents as of date of close of escrow. Prorate taxes for the fiscal year 1923–1924. Pay your escrow charges, also charges for your guaranty of title and recording mortgage. Pay all incumbrances of record necessary to show title as above. Pay Kells & Grant $825 as commissions. Mail your check for the balance to me. In the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless I shall have made written demand upon you for the return of all the instruments deposited by me. [Signed] C. A. Nolte. [Indorsed] Baker—No. 504,561."

C. A. Nolte died November 16, 1923. Upon demand the trust company delivered the deed to this property to the appellant C. A. Nolte. The deed was offered in evidence at the trial, and is now in the custody of the clerk of court.

[1] We are of the opinion that the evidence in the present case supports the findings of the court to the effect that the grantor was of sound mind and capable of executing the deed in question. Evidently the appellant does not rely upon his charge of mental unsoundness of the grantor as a ground for reversal. This subject is not mentioned in his briefs, except by way of a recital of the facts wherein it is said that the grantor was a man of nearly 90 years of age, and was suffering from infirmities of body and mind which naturally resulted from extreme age. The alleged incompetency of the grantor seems not to have been made an issue at the trial. The evidence of mental incompetency is meager indeed. One witness gave his opinion, without having been qualified as an intimate acquaintance, that for four or five months prior to his death, the grantor's mental condition seemed to be failing; that he had lapses of memory; was inclined to talk about spiritualism; and lacked business ability. Upon the contrary, there was evidence that he always attended to his own business affairs, which were usually profitable to him. Neither the proof of an occasional lapse of memory nor the belief in spiritualism is proof of mental incapacity. Many intellectual persons devoutly believe in spiritualism as a religion. This is evidence of neither insanity nor incompetency. 14 Cal. Jur. 367; In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 P. 453. In the absence of proof of undue influence, importunity, or gross advantage secured, neither the lapse of memory, nor extreme age, which is not shown to have affected the understanding or ability to transact business, will suffice to avoid a deed which otherwise appears to have been duly executed and valid. 1 Alexander on Wills, 458, §§ 340–342; Rogers v. Scott, 28 Cal. App. 93, 151 P. 379; Johnson v. Studley, 80 Cal. App. 538, 252 P. 638.

[2, 3] The respondents were neither in default for failure to pay the full contract price for the real property, nor for failure to pay it within the 30-day limit of time prescribed by the contract. The purchase price of the property was $16,500, one-half of which was represented by the note and mortgage, which were duly executed and delivered pursuant to contract. The balance was to be paid in cash to the trust company within 30 days from October 12th. The contract which was signed and accepted by the grantor acknowledged the deposit of $500 upon the purchase price, which was credited by agreement as a part of the broker's commissions. The balance of the purchase price, to wit, $7,762, was paid to the trust company by the respondents on November 13th. By the terms of this agreement the purchasers were given 30 full days in which to complete the contract. The thirtieth day fell upon Sunday, November 11, 1923, which was also Armistice Day, a statutory holiday. Section 10 of the Political Code provides:

> "If * * * the 11th day of November falls upon Sunday, the Monday following is a holiday."

It follows that since Armstice Day chanced to fall upon Sunday in the year 1923, the following Monday, November 12th, became a holiday. The respondents therefore were entitled to the following day in which to fulfill their contract. The general rule for computing time within which a contract may be performed is to exclude the final day when it chances to fall upon a Sunday or a holiday, and include the succeeding business day. 26 R. C. L. 749, § 23. Section 11 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Whenever any act * * * is appointed by law or contract to be performed upon a particular day, which day falls upon a holiday, it may be performed upon the next business day, with the same effect as if it had been performed upon the day appointed." Mox, Inc., v. Leventhal (Cal. App.) 264 P. 562.

It follows that since the performance of the agreement by the respondents was completed on November 13th, which was within the time specified in the contract, the heirs of the deceased had no authority to rescind the contract, as they attempted to do November 17th, by notifying the title company to that effect.

[4, 5] The appellant contends that the complaint fails to allege, and that the evidence and findings fail to support, a necessary showing of the value of the property or the adequacy of the consideration for the conveyance. Paragraph IV of the complaint, however, did allege:

> "That the said sum of $16,500 mentioned in said agreement for the purchase of said land is a just, fair, and adequate consideration and price for the land herein described."

In the absence of a demurrer, this was a sufficient allegation of the value of the land, if indeed any allegation of value was necessary at all. The first finding of fact adopted by the court was:

> "That all the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are true."

The fourth finding of fact was:

> "That the denials contained in said defendant's answer in paragraph 4 are untrue."

The court thus determined by the foregoing general finding that $16,500 was a just, fair, and adequate consideration for the purchase of the land. It is also specifically found that defendants' denial of these facts was untrue. This was a sufficient finding of facts as to the value and the adequacy of consideration. In 24 California Jurisprudence, 973, § 206, the author says:

> "Unless prejudice results from a failure to find more specifically, a general finding of the ultimate facts is all that is required, as such a finding is equivalent to a specific finding as to each material allegation to which it refers. Thus it is ordinarily sufficient to find that all of the allegations of a pleading are or are not true."

See, also, 24 Cal. Jur. 986, § 214, and cases there cited.

[6, 7] The record discloses evidence of the value of the land which is not disproportionate to the contract price. Mr. Kelliher, a real estate broker, testified that it was worth $275 per front foot, or $18,700 for the entire tract. The requirement of an allegation and proof of adequate consideration in an action for specific performance does not mean that the contract price shall necessarily measure up to the highest market value of the property, but merely that it is a substantially just and fair valuation under all the circumstances of the case. 23 Cal. Jur. 442. It cannot be said that the contract price of $16,500, as a matter of law, was unjust or inadequate.

[8-10] It was, however, unnecessary in the present case to allege or prove the value of the property or the adequacy of consideration. This is an action under section 3380 of the Civil Code, to obtain the delivery of a deed wrongfully withheld by the depositary after the termination of an escrow, and is not an action for specific performance. In 10 California Jurisprudence, at p. 594, it is said:

> "* * * If the depositary refuses to deliver the instruments after performance of the conditions, the grantee may bring an action for specific delivery of personal property, which technically is neither an action in claim and delivery nor for specific performance."

See section 3380, Civ. Code; Harrison v. Woodward, 11 Cal. App. 15, 103 P. 933; Danziger v. Benson, 175 Cal. 565, 166 P. 313. If the escrow holder wrongfully delivers the property to a third person, the grantee may bring the action against him without joining the escrow holder or the grantor. Feisthamel v. Campbell, 55 Cal. App. 774, 205 P. 25. If the grantor and the depositary wrongfully convert the property of the plaintiff, they may be joined as defendants. 10 Cal. Jur. 595; Trask v. Garza, 51 Cal. App. 739, 197 P. 807.

[11] Section 1057, Civil Code, defines an escrow as follows:

> "A grant may be deposited by the grantor with a third person, to be delivered on performance of a condition, and, on delivery by the depositary, it will take effect. While in the possession of the third person, and subject to condition, it is called an escrow."

It will be observed that it is only while the instrument is subject to the conditions imposed that the deposit will be deemed to be an escrow. When the conditions upon which the deposit of the instrument have been fully performed, the relationship of the interested parties automatically changes and the depositary is then deemed to hold the instrument as a trustee for the party entitled thereto. In the case of Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 707, 230 P. 448, 451, it is said:

> "* * * Whenever the conditions attending the escrow have been so far performed that the transaction which has called the escrow into being becomes complete the nature of this dual agency changes to an agency not for both, but for each of the parties to said transaction in respect to those things placed in escrow to which each has thus become completely entitled."

So, also, in the case of Feisthamel v. Campbell, supra, at p. 781 (205 P. 28), the court quotes with approval from 10 Ruling Case Law, at p. 640, the following:

> "* * * Upon the happening of the event or the performance of the condition upon which manual delivery should be made by the depositary to the grantee, although not in fact physically delivered to him, a deed theretofore in escrow becomes ipso facto the deed of the grantee in whom the title vests, and that thenceforth the depositary or holder is regarded as the mere agent or trustee of the grantee."

[12, 13] In the present case it becomes necessary to determine from the escrow instructions and from the evidence what specific acts were necessary to fulfill the escrow trust and entitle the grantees to the delivery of their deed. Was the depositary the trustee for both parties to this transaction, including the acts of indorsing upon the note the accumulated interest to the time of the close of the escrow, to apportion the taxes and the rent, and to furnish the guaranty certificate of title, or was the depositary the agent for both parties merely for the acceptance of the purchase price of the land together with the note and mortgage and the holding and delivery of the grantor's deed of conveyance? It seems reasonable to assume that for the performance of those acts by the depositary in which the grantor alone was interested, the depositary was his agent only, and not a trustee for the benefit of the purchasers. It is evident from the escrow instructions that the grantor intended to waive interest on the note from the date of its execution to the time of the termination of the escrow, and he therefore directed the depositary to indorse upon the note, as paid, all interest to that date. A failure to perform this clerical act does not harm the grantor, but entitles the purchasers to a claim against him for this small amount. So, also, the instructions directed the prorating of rent, with the evident intent of crediting the purchasers with the rent due or paid after the closing of the escrow. Assuming that the escrow was closed upon the depositing of the note and mortgage and the payment of the balance of the purchase price on November 13th, the purchasers would be entitled to a credit of one-half of $40 rent which was paid for the month of November. But the evidence does not show that any rent was deposited with the holder of the escrow for distribution. It seems absurd to hold that a grantor could defeat an escrow by his failure to deliver or account for rental which he had agreed to pay the purchaser. This, also, is a matter of which none but the purchasers could complain. The taxes for the fiscal year were also to be prorated. But these taxes became a lien upon the property and were chargeable to the purchasers, who would have a valid claim against the grantor for the proportion thereof which accrued before the completion of the escrow. This obligation was due from the grantor, and he may not complain because his depositary failed to perform the clerical duty of apportioning the taxes. No tax money was deposited, and none was to be distributed between the parties. The grantor merely owed the purchasers the amount of taxes which would have accrued to the time of the completion of the escrow. So far as the furnishing of a guaranty certificate of title is concerned, that, also, is a matter of which the purchasers alone could complain. In truth, the escrow instructions were not conditioned upon the actual furnishing of such a certificate. However, the record seems to indicate that the certificate was in fact prepared and ready to deliver. Mr. Cate, an employee of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, testified that the company was engaged in the business of furnishing guaranty certificates of title in connection with which business they maintained an escrow department for handling transactions for the sales of properties. He also said that all of the documents involved in this transaction were deposited with his company. It appears that the respondent F. M. Law, about October 26, 1923, received a letter from the trust company regarding some flaw which had been discovered in the title to the property, and he was requested to waive this flaw in writing. Mr. Law testified:

> "I investigated it, and inquired around, and the seller offered to put up a bond to protect me against that defect in the title. * * * After investigating the matter and being assured this title could be protected, I attached my check [for the cash payment on the purchase price of the land] to the waiver [of the defect of title] and the letter that they wrote me, and handed it back to Mr. Baker in the escrow office. * * * The letter stated that the escrow was approximately ready to close [and demanded that I] give them this check to close the escrow. * * * I delivered the check, the waiver, and the letter."

[14] Neither the purchase price, nor the note and mortgage were ever returned or even tendered to the respondents. This appears to furnish substantial evidence to support the findings of the court to the effect that the respondents had fully performed every requirement of the escrow contract on their part, and that the escrow was terminated, thus entitling them to the delivery of their deed of conveyance from the depositary. The fact that the grantor subsequently died before the actual manual delivery of the instrument does not defeat the grantees of their right to the possession of their deed of conveyance. Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 496.

The decree, however, quieted title in the respondents regardless of the mortgage lien for the balance of the purchase price to which the grantor was entitled. Both the contract of sale and the escrow instructions provided for this lien in favor of the grantor. This was erroneously omitted by the trial court. The judgment is therefore modified so as to quiet title in the respondents, subject, however, to a first mortgage lien in favor of the grantor and his heirs and assigns to secure the promissory note for the sum of $8,250 executed by the respondents October 15, 1923, according to the terms and conditions therein contained.

With this amendment, the judgment is affirmed. Respondents will recover their costs.

PEOPLE v. MORALES. (Cr. 1616.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 14, 1928.

Criminal law ⚷369(4)—Conviction for forgery was affirmed as against contention that admission of evidence tending to show other crimes was error.

In prosecution for forgery, conviction was affirmed as against defendant's contention that evidence was erroneously admitted, which tended to show that defendant had committed other similar crimes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

R. Morales was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, Franklin Padan, Chief Deputy Public Defender, and John J. Hill, Deputy Public Defender, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. Defendant appeals from an order denying a motion for a new trial and from a judgment of conviction of forgery of a bank check.

Appellant contends that he was convicted on incompetent and immaterial evidence admitted by the court over his objection. It is contended that the evidence complained of led the jury to believe that defendant had committed other similar crimes, and that this evidence was admitted in violation of the well-established rule of evidence that the prosecution cannot prove the commission by the defendant of other offenses committed by him, for the purpose of increasing the likelihood that he has committed the particular crime with which he is charged. There is no doubt about the law in such cases, but, in the application of the law to the instant case, we find that the evidence complained of is not of the class considered by appellant. It is true that, in bringing out evidence material to the issue, circumstances tending to cast suspicion on defendant in the commission of other crimes appeared incidentally, some of which were elicited by the defendant on cross-examination of witnesses produced by the prosecution. The evidence complained of came out in statements extrajudicial made by defendant to witnesses and extrajudicial statements made in his presence by others, which he did not deny, all of which statements were relevant and material in establishing defendant's guilt in the instant case. The court did not err in overruling objections to such evidence offered by the prosecution or in declining to strike out evidence which pertained to defendant's guilt in the instant case. Illustrative of the point made in appellant's brief that there was error in admitting that class of evidence over his objection, Jane H. Uhl, a witness on the part of the prosecution, was asked by the district attorney whether in the conversation which had been referred to between the witness and Morales anything was said by Mr. Morales or Mrs. Fruhling relative to the check in question. She answered: "No; not particularly to that one check." The district attorney said: "Was there anything said about any check?" The defendant objected to the question on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, no foundation laid, and on the ground that there was no proof of other checks. The witness answered: "Not about any one particular check." The district attorney then asked:

> "What was said about any check? A. Well, that he signed them.
> "Q. What did he say about signing them? A. In the course of this conversation they brought up Mrs. Zimmerman. * * * Then they commenced to talk about the checks he was accused of, and he admitted that she was very, very ill, and her folks would get all her money anyway, and he would just as well have that money out of her.
> "Q. Who said that? A. Ralph. He said that in the presence of Mrs. Fruhling.
> "Q. Was that this defendant? A. Yes."

On cross-examination she said:

> "He said he had signed the checks, * * * and that Mrs. Zimmerman was very, very ill, and he didn't expect her to live, and her folks would get all the money, and that he would just as well have some money out of her. * * * He told me that he got the money."

The cases cited by defendant in support of the alleged errors are not in point. The evidence objected to in each of these cases was not inextricably mixed with the evidence which was proper, as in the instant case, and in People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, cited by appellant, the defendant's confession of another and distinct forgery was under consideration. It was not, as in the instant case, a case where an admission of the commission of the crime was linked with, or made only in connection with, the admission of the commission of other crimes. In the Canfield Case the confession did not in any way pertain to the charge upon which the defendant was being tried. The appellant's counsel is mistaken in the statement that the court further held in that case that such an error is not cured by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, but (in view of the fact that the appeal was from an order granting a new trial) the court held that that question was one for the trial court to decide. The case of People v. Baird, 105 Cal. 126, 38 P. 633, was a case where evidence of other and distinct forgeries were received over defendant's objection. It does not appear that the evidence tending to prove other forgeries had any relation to the charge on which trial was had, but was considered with reference to absence of proof establishing the corpus delicti. The same can be said of the other cases cited by appellant on the requirement to prove the other alleged forgeries before the evidence of defendant's admissions of committing them can be received.

But those cases are inapplicable to the instant case, in that in this case the evidence complained of came in in connection with the check alleged in the information to have been forged, and no evidence was introduced for the purpose of proving that the defendant had forged other checks. Evidence tending to prove any fact pertinent to proof of the crime charged in the information should not be excluded on the ground that it might have a tendency to prove another crime of the same character and against the same complaining witness and in connection therewith. Such restriction would have a tendency to defeat justice. If the evidence tending to prove other crimes establishes a general scheme to obtain money from the complainant unlawfully, and it establishes one common motive of the defendant to effect his object, it cannot be excluded on the ground that it might create a prejudice against the defendant.

As to the question of venue, as was stated by the trial court, that was solely a question for the jury, by reason of the fact that evidence was introduced from which the jury could determine the fact that the crime was committed in Los Angeles county, and their verdict shows that they did so determine it.

We have reviewed the evidence, and find that it supports the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

I concur in the judgment: HOUSER, J.

CONREY, P. J. I concur in the judgment. Appellant was accused of forging a $300 check, drawn against the bank account of I. M. Zimmerman. The check was shown to have been made and uttered. It was made payable "to the order of cash," and purported to be signed by I. M. Zimmerman. In her testimony Mrs. Zimmerman stated that she did not write the check, and did not sign it, and that she did not authorize any other person to write the check or to sign her name thereto. The evidence therefore is sufficient to prove the corpus delicti, or, in plain English, that the forgery was committed by some one.

Also there is testimony tending to prove that the signature "R. Morales," on the back of the check is in the handwriting of the defendant; and that this indorsement and the writings on the face of the check, including the name signed at the bottom of the check, were all written by the same person.

As an incidental fact, in the introduction of testimony to show that the defendant had admitted that he forged People's Exhibit 1, the check particularly in question in this action, it appeared that this check and others were present before the parties to those conversations; that is, the witnesses and the defendant. The conduct and statements of the defendant, as shown by the testimony, did not amount to a direct statement wherein defendant singled out the one check and said that he forged that check. It did tend to show that he obtained the money on several checks, including People's Exhibit 1. But there was no attempt made by the prosecutor to establish the commission by appellant of any forgery other than of the one instrument specified. In a case where a defendant's admission of a fact is to be proved, the testimony proving such admission should not be excluded merely because the statement, as made by the defendant, included other facts which tend toward proof that defendant had also committed another crime.

SAHAKIAN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

(Civ. 4384.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1928.

Appeal and error 🔑102—No appeal lies from an order sustaining demurrer without leave to amend (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

An order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend is not one from which an appeal lies, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by John Sahakian against the City of Los Angeles and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

T. C. Gould, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Chas. B. MacCoy, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff states in his opening brief in his appeal herein that defendant city of Los Angeles filed a general demurrer to his complaint, which the trial court sustained without granting him leave to amend, and that "our only alternative is this appeal." From this statement we understand that he attempts to appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend, and his notice of appeal shows that he appeals from the order, and not from the judgment thereon. Such order is not one from which an appeal lies. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc.; People ex rel. Goodell v. Garrett, 72 Cal. App. 452, 237 P. 829; 2 Cal. Jur. 156.

The attorney for appellant in this case was substituted after the appeal was taken, and after the briefs were filed.

The appeal is dismissed.

CALIFORNIA CANNING PEACH GROWERS v. HARRIS. (Civ. 3442.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 8, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑313(1)—Refusal of performance by party to executory bilateral contract before time of performance may give rise to action for damages by other party for defense to performance (Civ. Code, §§ 1440, 1515, 1511, par. 3).

Party to an executory bilateral contract may avail himself of refusal of performance made by other party in advance of time of performance as basis for action for damages or as defense to own performance under Civ. Code, §§ 1440, 1515, 1511, par. 3.

2. Trial 🔑382—Trial court may pass on witnesses' credibility and weight of their testimony.

Trial court has power to pass on credibility of witnesses and weight of their testimony.

3. Corporations 🔑432(6)—Agent's authority to act for corporation may be shown by evidence of conduct for corporation with knowledge of directors or general manager.

Authority of an agent to act for corporation may be shown by evidence that person does business for corporation and in its behalf as agent with knowledge and acquiescence of its directors or general manager or by their directions.

4. Corporations 🔑425—Corporation holding out as agents persons apparently empowered to transact ordinary business cannot claim authority was not conferred against third parties affected thereby.

Where corporation holds out to world as its agents persons apparently clothed with power to transact ordinary business, third parties will not be permitted to suffer from acts of agents by corporation's attempted defense that ostensible authority was not in fact conferred.

5. Corporations 🔑426(2)—Corporation holding out agent as authorized to act cannot repudiate acts after agent has acted.

When corporation by long course of acquiescence holds out officer or agent as having authority to do certain things, it cannot after he has acted repudiate his acts.

6. Agriculture 🔑6—That person solicited memberships in marketing association or was director thereof held not to empower him to release defendant from marketing agreement.

That person prior to organization of co-operative marketing association solicited subscriptions to membership in association or was director of association did not vest in such person power to release defendant from obligation to deliver his crop to association in accordance with marketing agreement.

7. Agriculture 🔑6—Test of authority of director of marketing association to relieve defendant of contract held not what defendant understood him to say, but what reasonable person would be justified in believing.

In suit by co-operative marketing association to enforce marketing agreement, finding that defendant understood director of association to state without qualification that association would not receive his crop when it ripened cannot be held to be sole test of director's authority to release defendant from obligation under contract, true test being what reasonable man was justified in believing under circumstances from acts and conduct of director.

8. Agriculture 🔑6—Act of assumed agent defeating legislative purpose of marketing association could not be exercised as mere incident to authority, but should be expressly conferred by association.

Any act by assumed agent of co-operative marketing association to defeat legislative purpose of giving association power to control subject-matter of its operations by holding members to agreement to deliver crop to it would be of such vital character that it could not be exercised as a mere incident to agent's authority, but should be conferred by express conduct of association.

9. Principal and agent 🔑48—Agent's mission is to fulfill and not to destroy.

Mission of an agent is to fulfill, but not to destroy.

10. Agriculture 🔑6—Marketing agreement requiring grower to sell all products to association held for benefit of association, members, and public, and entitled to extraordinary protection.

Provision in marketing agreement that grower should sell all his product to association held intended for benefit of association and also for benefit of members of association and for public, and entitled to extraordinary protection.

11. Agriculture 🔑6—Evidence held insufficient to show director's agency for marketing association to refuse to accept grower's fruit or to relieve grower of marketing agreement by anticipatory breach of association.

In suit by co-operative marketing association to enforce marketing agreement requiring grower of peaches to sell all its products to association, evidence failing to show assumed agent of association, alleged to have told defendant that association would not accept his peaches, ever exercised such authority with knowledge of directors of association, and that such authority was incidental to or connected with agent's business, or that conduct was ratified, was insufficient to show agency to refuse acceptance of peaches, and did not show marketing association refused to perform conditions of agreement sufficient to relieve defendant of obligation thereunder on ground of anticipatory breach.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the California Canning Peach Growers against John Harris and another. Judgment for defendant Harris, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, and Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox, of Visalia, for appellant.

Power & McFadzean and J. Thos. Crowe, all of Visalia, for respondent.

BUCK, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff is a nonprofit co-operative marketing association, organized in 1921 under the laws of the state of California. From the beginning the defendant, John Harris, was a member of the association, and, with his fellow members, had signed a marketing agreement with the association whereby he sold to the association, to be marketed for the benefit of himself, all of the peaches to be grown by him on a 20-acre orchard for the next 14 years.

During the years 1922 and 1923 defendant's yearly crop was delivered and marketed under the terms of the marketing agreement. But during the season of 1924 the defendant sold his crop to other parties and failed to deliver any part of it to the association. Upon suit being brought by the association to recover the punitory damages provided for in the agreement, the defendant, John Harris, set up as a defense his claim that there was an anticipatory breach of the marketing agreement on the part of the association. Upon the trial of the case before the court, sitting without a jury, the court found, in accordance with the defendant's claim of an anticipatory breach, that "during the summer of 1924, about the month of June, and shortly before any of the peaches mentioned in the marketing agreement were ripe and ready for delivery, the plaintiff association informed the defendant, John Harris, that it would not accept or receive said peaches or any part thereof, and that said plaintiff did then and there fail and refuse, and ever since has failed and refused, to accept said peaches, or any part thereof."

The court, accordingly, after having granted a nonsuit as to the defendant Lizzie Harris, gave judgment in favor of the defendant John Harris, and against the plaintiff. From this judgment in favor of the defendant John Harris the plaintiff appeals, and bases its appeal upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the foregoing finding of an anticipatory breach on the part of the plaintiff such as would justify the defendant in failing to deliver his peaches to the association under the terms of the written agreement.

[1] The rule, of course, is well established that a party to an executory bilateral contract may avail himself of a refusal of performance made by the other party in advance of the time of performance either as a basis for an action for damages, or may himself set up such refusal as a defense to his own performance. Civil Code, §§ 1440, 1511, par. 3, § 1515, and 6 Cal. Juris. pp. 457 to 460; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 12, 96 P. 884; Howard v. Galbraith, 13 Cal. App. 373, 377, 109 P. 889; 13 C. J. 653, 654.

As regards the nature and character of the refusal by one party which will justify nonperformance by the other, the rule is well stated in the case of Rauer v. Harrell, 32 Cal. App. 45, at page 66, 162 P. 125, 133, as follows:

"Before the salt company could avoid performance, defendant's refusal to perform should appear to have been explicit, positive, and unequivocal. The rule stated by Mr. Benjamin is as follows: 'A mere assertion that the party will be unable, or will refuse to perform his contract is not sufficient; it must be a distinct and unequivocal, absolute refusal to perform the promise, and must be treated and acted upon as such by the party to whom the promise was made.' Benjamin on Sales, § 568.

"In 6 Ruling Case Law, p. 1025, the rule is thus stated: 'In order to justify the adverse party in treating the renunciation as a breach, the refusal to perform must be of the whole contract or of a covenant going to the whole consideration, and must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute. * * * It may be observed, however, that the renunciation itself does not ipso facto constitute a breach. It is not a breach of the contract unless it is treated as such by the adverse party.' Hanson v. Slaven, 98 Cal. 377, 382, 33 P. 266; Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 242, 94 P. 889.

"In Smoot's Case, 15 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 107, it was held that mere assertion that the party will be unable, or will refuse to perform his contract, is not sufficient to terminate it; it must be distinct and unequivocal absolute refusal to perform, treated and acted on as such by the promisee. Approved in Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 503, 6 S. Ct. 850, 29 L. Ed. 984."

For the purpose of showing an abandonment by the association of its contract by its claimed refusal in June of 1924, to accept future delivery of defendant's peach crop, defendant testified that Ross Denison, one of the directors of the association, came to his place in June, 1924, and stated to him:

"We cannot accept Elberta peaches."

Witness continuing: "I didn't say anything to that. There wasn't particularly so much conversation, only that they cannot receive those Elberta peaches. He said, the first time when he came over in June, that they cannot accept those Elberta peaches. After that my wife took charge of these peaches and says, 'Since they refused I am going to sell them myself;' and I didn't have anything to do with it any more. She sold them to the Kings County Packing Company or cannery."

Also, F. W. Brown, the district representative of the plaintiff, testified that he informed defendant of the contents of the marketing agreement and what would be the result if defendant broke his contract, and asked defendant to go and see the only lawyer that witness knew of in Reedley and to talk to his neighbors before he violated the contract, and that defendant then "said that he could get more money for his freestones and that we would not accept his freestones." The Elberta peaches, it seems, were freestones, and the balance of his crop consisted of clingstone peaches.

Ross Denison, when called as a witness by the defendant, testified that he (Ross Denison) had an agreement with Mr. Pogooto, the manager of the plaintiff, to receive crops of peaches in the vicinity of Reedley. During the year 1923 the plaintiff engaged in co-operative canning. Before that time all members' peaches were sold to commercial canneries; Denison was asked to look after receiving for the Herbert Packing Company, which was canning co-operatively for the association, part of the crop being sold to other canneries in Reedley in a raw state. The witness testified that it was part of his duty to solicit growers to designate the Herbert Packing Company as the receiving point, and in his conversation of June, 1924:

"I asked Mr. Harris to designate the Herbert plant as a receiver for his peaches. * * * As I remember, I asked Mr. Harris for his cling peaches, stating that we could not handle the Elbertas. Now, I can't remember the exact words, but that was the essence of it. * * * I wasn't the only one receiving from the association. The association was delivering to different plants. But I was the only one that received for the Herbert Packing Company for the association.

"Q. The variety of peaches and the tonnage that would be received was left by the association to you, was it not? A. Certain agreements were made with the Herbert Packing Company to can a portion of the tonnage of fruit controlled by the California Canning Peach Growers. This plant was only engaged in canning cling peaches.

"Q. Did you tell Mr. Harris that you didn't see your way clear to take from him any freestones? A. Yes, I wanted to convey to Mr. Harris that it would not be very easy for us to handle them up there and I would only take the clings at the plant.

"Q. Did you tell Mr. Harris in that conversation that he would have to make some other disposition of those freestones? A. By 'disposition' you mean what?

"Q. Sell or get rid of them some way? A. Words to that effect; yes."

Cross-examination:

"Mr. Sweet: Q. You merely asked him if he wanted to deliver them to the Herbert Packing Company his clings? A. I think that is the way I specified it. I can't exactly recall the words.

"Q. Mr. Pogooto didn't tell you to tell any one that the association would refuse to receive any peaches it had contracted for, did he? A. I didn't get any definite instructions from Mr. Pogooto.

"Q. You can answer the question 'yes' or 'no'? A. No.

"Q. The board of directors never told you to reject any peaches that the association had agreed to receive, did they? A. No; decidedly not.

"Q. You never told Mr. Pogooto that you had refused or had told any grower that the association would not taken any peaches that it contracted for, did you? Is that clear? A. Yes; that is clear. No; I didn't tell Mr. Pogooto that.

"Q. And you didn't tell the board of directors that, did you? A. I don't believe we had a board of directors' meeting until after the peaches were being delivered."

[2] For the purpose of this appeal it may be assumed that the trial court, acting within its power to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of their testimony, did not entirely accept the testimony of the witness Denison to the effect that the refusal to accept the Elberta peaches was limited to a refusal only to accept them for delivery at the plant of the Herbert Packing Company, which was handling cling peaches alone, but that the court chose rather to accept the testimony of the defendant to the effect that the defendant understood and was justified in understanding from his conversation with Denison that there was an unqualified refusal on the part of the association to accept, for any purpose or at all, defendant's Elberta peaches. But the vital question still remains as to what extent, if any, was Denison authorized to bind the association by the unqualified refusal testified to by the defendant.

It is the contention of learned counsel for defendant "that the preponderance of all the evidence introduced at the trial shows conclusively that Denison was acting in the capacity of agent of the California Canning Peach Growers, and that the rejection of the respondent's Elberta peaches was within the scope of his authority," and in support of his contention cites and quotes from the following authorities: Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 P. 658; Newton v. Johnston Organ Mfg. Co., 180 Cal. 185, 180 P. 7; 6 Cal. Jur. 1099; Stevens v. Selma Fruit Co., 18 Cal. App. 242, 123 P. 212; Nicholson v. Randall Banking Co., 130 Cal. 533, 62 P. 930.

[3-5] These authorities as quoted from by counsel lay down the well-established rules that the authority of an agent to act for a corporation may be shown by evidence that the person does business for the corporation and in its behalf as agent with the knowledge and acquiescence of its directors or general manager or by their directions. And that where a corporation holds out to the world as its agents persons apparently clothed with power to transact ordinary business, third parties will not be permitted to suffer from the acts of such agents by the corporation's attempted defense that the ostensible authority was not in fact conferred. And that when a corporation, by a long course of acquiescence, holds out an officer or agent as having the authority to do certain things, it cannot, after he has acted, repudiate his acts. But in the case at bar there is no evidence that Denison, with the knowledge and acquiescence of its directors or general manager or by their direction, ever had exercised authority of the kind called in question in this case. In fact, the testimony in the case is directly to the contrary. Furthermore, there is no evidence in the record indicating that the business in question claimed to have been transacted by Denison could be deemed to be incidental to or connected "with power to transact ordinary business." Furthermore, there is no evidence in the record showing any ratification on the part of the corporation of the claimed conduct of the assumed agent in refusing in advance to accept defendant's peaches.

[6, 7] The fact that Denison had, at a time prior to the organization of the corporation, solicited the subscription to membership of the defendant, or the fact that the said Denison was a director of the corporation, did not vest in him the power to release the defendant from his obligation to deliver his crop in accordance with the marketing agreement. The mere fact that the trial court may have found, according to the testimony of the defendant, that the defendant understood Denison to state, without qualification, that the association would not in any event or at any time receive his freestone peaches when they would be ripe and ready for delivery, is not and cannot be held to be the sole test of the authority of Denison in the matter. The test is not what the defendant believed when he availed himself of a better offer and allowed his wife to sell the peaches. But the test is what, under all the surrounding circumstances was he, by the acts and conduct of the plaintiff, justified, as a reasonable man, in believing.

As regards the nature and relative importance of the act of the assumed agent: Without going into any extensive discussion as to the purposes and necessary business methods of co-operative marketing associations, it may be stated that the whole legislative and business scheme of such an association necessarily depends upon the ability of the association to hold and control the subject-matter of its operations. It is only by holding such control that it can give to its members the benefit of such a bulk and quantity handling and increased credit facilities as will, first, diminish the cost of preparing for market and marketing the product in question, and, second, will enable the producers properly to control such a share of the commodity protected as will enable them to set such a stabilized price for the commodity as will at the same time be attractive to the consumer and will afford a living profit to the producer; all of which would be accomplished without detriment to anyone except speculators and intermediate handlers who may seek unduly to reap where they have not sown.

[8] It would therefore seem that any act on the part of any assumed agent tending to defeat such an essential legislative purpose would be of such an extraordinary and vital character that it could not be exercised as a mere incident to the authority of a subagent but should be conferred, if conferred at all, directly by the express act or conduct of the governing body of the association.

[9] The general principle that the mission of an agent is "to fulfil but not to destroy" is clearly stated, with appropriate citations, in the case of Morton v. Albers Bros. Milling Co., 66 Cal. App. 391, at page 398, 226 P. 809, 812, where the court uses the following language:

> "Prenot was not a general officer. He was only an assistant manager for appellant at one of its branch offices. It possibly may be inferred from the evidence that he was authorized to do certain things which were necessarily incident to the performance of the written contract, such, for example, as seeing to it that proper tests were made to determine whether the milo measured up to the requirements of the contract. But authority in an agent to carry out or to perform a contract already made by his principal does not include authority to change the contract or to waive any of its provisions, especially where, as here, the provision is one which was intended for the benefit of the principal. Presumptively, an agent is employed to acquire interests, not to give them up. Gerrish v. Maher, 70 Ill. 470; Hutchings v. Munger, 41 N. Y. 155; Thomas v. Anthony, 30 Cal. App. 217, 157 P. 823. See, also, 2 C. J. pp. 645, 646."

[10] And not only was the provision herein "one which was intended for the benefit of the principal," but it was also one which was intended essentially for the benefit of each of the members of the association, and, even beyond that, was one involving the interests of the public. First, in regard to the association as stated in the case of Anaheim C. F. Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, at page 763, 197 P. 959, 961:

> "The existence and life of the association itself depended upon its being furnished fruit to dispose of in the public market. A reduction in the amount of fruit so handled would not only tend to increase the overhead cost to the non-transgressing members, but, we may assume, to some extent affect the prestige and standing of the association as a marketing concern. The argument would be the same, regardless of the quantity of fruit which might have been delivered by the defendant, whether it composed but a small fractional part or one-half or more of the entire product designed to be marketed by the plaintiff agency."

And, second, in regard to the members of the association, including the defendant himself, as stated in the case of California C. P. Growers v. Downey, 76 Cal. App. 1, at page 15, 243 P. 679, 684:

> "All the other members of the association have an interest in the proceeds received from the sale of the respondent's peaches. * * * Every member of the association must, of course, be held to have knowledge of all of these elements which enter into co-operative marketing agreements. They are not simply agreements entered into with an agent, although a few people may be selected to act in the capacity of officers to manage the business of the association. The agreements are essentially to and with all the other members of the co-operative association and the interests of every member rest upon the same foundation, and no member can be advantaged to the detriment of any other member. Of all this each member must also be held to have full knowledge, as the contract sets forth all of these facts in equalizing burdens and advantages."

And, finally, as regards the interests of the general public in the protection of these marketing agreements. In the very recent case of Liberty Warehouse Co. v. Burley, etc., 48 S. Ct. 291, 72 L. Ed. —–, decided February 20, 1928, the Supreme Court of the United States, after a full review of all the authorities, went to the extent of holding that a marketing agreement of a co-operative marketing association of farmers is, by reason of the public interests it subserves, entitled to such extraordinary protection as to render valid and constitutional a state statute declaring any person guilty of a misdemeanor who shall "knowingly induce or attempt to induce any member or stockholder of an association organized hereunder to breach his marketing contract with the association, or who maliciously and knowingly spreads false reports about the finances or management thereof."

In holding as above, the Supreme Court demonstrated its high capacity to so interpret legal principles and the safeguards of the Constitution as to make our basic laws conform to present economic and social conditions, and be actually, and not merely theoretically, promotive of the general welfare. For, in rendering its decision, the court said:

> "Undoubtedly the statute does prohibit and penalize action not theretofore so restricted and to that extent interferes with freedom. But this is done to protect certain contracts which the Legislature deemed of great importance to the public and peculiarly subject to invasion. * * * It is stated without contradiction that co-operative marketing statutes substantially like the one under review have been enacted by 42 states. * * * These statutes reveal widespread legislative approval of the plan for protecting scattered producers and advancing the public interest."

[11] We are therefore of the opinion that the evidence in this case, being insufficient to show agency on the part of Denison, is insufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff refused to accept defendant's fruit, or that the plaintiff failed to keep or perform the terms, conditions, and covenants of the marketing agreement.

The judgment therefore is reversed.

PETERS v. PAUMA SCHOOL DIST. OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5315.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1928.

Indians ⚷5—Lands set apart under Mexican grant as planting grounds and subsequently conveyed to government held not "Indian reservation," so that children residing thereon may attend public schools.

Indians residing on land set apart to them for planting ground under terms of Mexican grant, and subsequently conveyed to United States government for use and benefit of Indians thereafter occupying it, without treaty of any kind, held not residing in Indian reservation so as to preclude attendance at public school; "Indian Reservation" constituting part of public domain set aside by proper authority for use and occupation of tribe or tribes of Indians.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Indian Reservation.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Mandamus by Wesley W. Peters, an infant, by his guardian ad litem, against the Pauma School District of San Diego County and another. Judgment for petitioner, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Turrentine & Wright, of San Diego, for appellants.

Samuel W. McNabb, U. S. Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, and Ames Peterson, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., of Fresno, amici curiæ.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendants appeal upon the judgment roll, claiming that the findings do not support the conclusions reached by the trial court. Wesley W. Peters, a minor Indian child, filed in the superior court a petition for a writ of mandamus, by which he seeks to compel the defendant school district and the teacher thereof to admit him as a pupil. Among the findings of the trial court are the following:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"That Max Peters and Wesley W. Peters are Mission Indians, and live upon the Pauma grant, originally a large Spanish grant patented by the Mexican government in 1844, to Jose Sorreno. That the patent excepted from the grant planting ground for the Indians' use and benefit, and said patent was confirmed in 1879, by United States patent, which also excepted planting grounds for the use and benefit of said Indians.

"That in 1899 the Pauma grant had passed to Francis Mora, who entered into an agreement with the United States government in the year 1889, defining boundaries of the Indian lands excepted from both patents above referred to, and title to this land was then quitclaimed to the United States government, for the use and benefit of said Mission Indians.

"That Wesley W. Peters, petitioner in this matter, and Max Peters, his father and guardian ad litem, were both born on land excepted and reserved for the use of the Mission Indians, and lived thereon at the commencement of this action.

"That the Indians living and residing on this excepted and reserved land do not live in tribal relations, that the United States Government has never made treaties of any kind with these Indians, and that said Indians live in the manner of other American citizens in the vicinity.

"That the lands upon which these Indians live is not subject to taxation, and that said lands at all times since 1844 have been and now are vested in the United States government for the use and benefit of the Mission Indians, of which Wesley W. Peters and Max Peters are a part.

"That said lands upon which said Max Peters and Wesley W. Peters live is within the exterior boundaries of the Pauma school district of San Diego county, Cal."

The court concluded:

> "That Wesley W. Peters, petitioner, and his guardian ad litem, Max Peters, are not tribal Indians, and are both citizens of the United States and of the state of California.
> "That the property upon which Wesley W. Peters and Max Peters reside is not a part of an Indian reservation, and that Wesley W. Peters is a resident of the Pauma school district of San Diego county, Cal., and entitled to be admitted to the duly established school of Pauma school district, San Diego county, Cal."

Defendants base their appeal upon the sole proposition, as claimed, that the findings disclose that petitioner is a resident of an Indian reservation. They state in their brief:

> "If the court can find, as a conclusion of law, that this is not a reservation, then of course this appeal must fail, for if petitioner is not a resident of an Indian reservation, admittedly he is entitled to be granted admission to the Pauma school under the authority of Piper v. Big Pine School District, 193 Cal. 664, 226 P. 926."

A brief has been filed as amicus curiæ by the United States attorney for the Southern district of California, in which it is contended that petitioner is not a resident of an Indian reservation, and that, regardless of the determination of this question, he is entitled to demand admission to the school.

The facts set forth in the findings do not establish that petitioner resides upon an Indian reservation. The definition of an Indian reservation is given in the Matter of Forty-Three Cases Cognac Brandy (C. C.) 14 F. 539, where the court says:

> "An Indian reservation is a part of the public domain set apart by proper authority for the use and occupation of a tribe or tribes of Indians. It may be set apart by an act of Congress, by treaty, or by executive order; I do not think an Indian reservation can be established by custom or prescription. The fact that a particular tribe or band of Indians have for a long time occupied a particular tract of country does not constitute such tract an Indian reservation."

The foregoing is set forth in 31 Corpus Juris, 499, as the proper definition of an Indian reservation. The author of that work has placed a footnote under the general definition in this language:

> "Another definition: An Indian reservation may be defined to be a certain limited portion of our national domain, assigned by the federal government to a tribe or tribes of Indians, or some part of parts of the same, to be held by them according to the terms of the assignment. U. S. v. Certain Property, 1 Ariz. 31, 25 P. 517."

Counsel for petitioner have not furnished us with any authority showing these definitions are not correct.

Applying the facts as found by the trial court to the foregoing definitions, it is apparent that elements are lacking which are necessary to constitute the land on which plaintiff is residing an Indian reservation. The findings expressly negative any inference that the land is occupied by any tribe or tribes of Indians, or that any treaty was ever made between the Indians and the United States. The findings show only that certain Indians are living on land which, under the terms of the Mexican grant, was set apart to them for planting ground; that in 1889 the government received title to the land from one Mora and holds that title for the use and benefit of the Indians who are now occupying it in the same manner as other citizens.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Exchange of property 🔑8(4)—In action to rescind land exchange, evidence held to support finding of fraudulent representation of amount of land conveyed.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of real property, evidence held to support finding relative to fraudulent representation in respect to amount of land to be conveyed.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑65(1)—Generally, phrase "more or less" following given number of acres is one of precaution, but term may be construed as estimate of unknown quantity.

As a general rule, phrase "more or less," when immediately following given number of acres, is one of safety and precaution and intended to cover some slight or unimportant inaccuracy, but term may also be treated and construed as mere estimate of unknown or indefinite quantity which parties have agreed shall be subject-matter of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, More or Less.]

3. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—As respects rescinding exchange, where property was described by metes and bounds, disparity held not excused by use of phrase "more or less."

In action to rescind land exchange, where defendants alleged that disparity of 1.32 acres was excusable because of use of phrase "12 acres, more or less," in description in contract, held that, since contract described property by metes and bounds and designated it as certain ranch, use of phrase "more or less" was merely an attempt to approximate the acreage, and did not excuse.

4. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—Phrase "more or less" held not to excuse disparity in tract described and one conveyed, where excluded portion contained improvements.

In action to rescind land exchange, where defendant sought to be excused because of use of phrase "more or less" in contract and excluded portion contained valuable improvements, held that phrase was not applicable.

5. Exchange of property 🔑8(4)—In action to rescind land exchange, evidence held to support finding that representation that there was sufficient water for domestic and irrigation purposes was fraudulent.

In action to rescind land exchange, evidence to support finding that representation that water on ranch was sufficient for domestic and irrigation purposes was fraudulent.

6. Fraud 🔑11(1)—While expressions of opinion are not generally considered representations of fact, yet, when stated as fact, may be basis of action for fraudulent misrepresentation.

Mere expressions of opinion are not generally considered as representations of fact, consequently they are insufficient for purpose of maintaining action for fraud or for purpose of rescinding contract, but, where matters which might otherwise be expressions of opinion are stated as accomplished fact by one of parties to contract and accepted and relied on by other as such, they may become basis of action for fraudulent misrepresentation.

7. Exchange of property 🔑3(1)—Representation made to inexperienced woman that there was plenty of water on land for irrigation purposes held representation of fact, not expression of opinion.

In action to rescind land exchange, representation made to inexperienced woman that there was plenty of water on land for domestic and irrigation purposes held representation of fact, not expression of opinion.

8. Exchange of property 🔑8(5)—In action to rescind contract for exchange of property, measure of damages held difference between actual value of property and its value had it been as represented.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of ranch for house, measure of plaintiff's damages was difference between actual value of property proffered and passed in exchange by defendants and its value had it been as represented.

9. Exchange of property 🔑8(4)—Evidence held to justify finding of $4,500 damages for plaintiff, in action to rescind land exchange.

In action for rescission of contract for exchange of ranch for house, evidence held to justify court in finding plaintiff was damaged to extent of $4,500.

10. Appeal and error 🔑221—In action to rescind land exchange, where defendants made no objection to allowance of rental on trial, held that they were not prejudiced.

In action to rescind land contract for exchange of ranch for house, where rental was allowed to compensate defendants for money paid out by them for payments of taxes and improvements on house, to which no exception was made at trial, held that they were not prejudiced by such finding.

11. Pleading 🔑129(1)—Trial 🔑36, 388(4)—Failure to deny averment in complaint is admission of truth, and obviates need of introducing evidence and making finding.

Failure to deny material averment in complaint is admission of truth of fact stated, and obviates need of introducing evidence and making finding upon facts involved.

12. Exchange of property 🔑5—Notice that she would restore property and tender of deed of property received under contract for exchange of lands held compliance with statutory provision for rescission (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In action to rescind land exchange, where plaintiff, in written notice duly served upon defendants, stated that she would restore any and all things of value received as fully and completely as if contract of exchange had never been made, at same time tendering expenses and deed to property which she received in exchange, held that such notice and tender were sufficient to comply with Civ. Code, § 1691, providing for rescission.

13. Exchange of property 🔑8(1)—In action to rescind exchange, judgment that property be reconveyed subject to incumbrance held proper.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of lands, where defendants had paid off incumbrance which was on property at time they received it, and plaintiff did not tender this sum to them, held that judgment expressly providing that property should be reconveyed subject to incumbrance of same amount sufficiently protected defendants.

14. Exchange of property 🔑5—Plaintiff need not tender sum received under independent agreement in order to rescind land exchange under statute (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In action to rescind contract for exchange of property, where independent agreement was entered by which sum was paid to agent as commission, held that plaintiff was not obliged to offer restoration of sum due under independent agreement as condition precedent to right to maintain action to enforce rescission under Civ. Code, § 1691.

15. Exchange of property 🔑8(1)—Sum not due under contract sought to be rescinded does not come within scope of statute (Civ. Code, § 1691).

In action to rescind contract for exchange of land, question of any sum not due under contract calls for adjudication of facts independent of contract itself, and this does not come within scope of Civ. Code, § 1691, providing for rescission.

16. Exchange of property 🔑8(1)—Defendant could not complain where court directed reconveyance of property after foreclosure, since it had notice of rescission prior to foreclosure.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of lands, where court directed plaintiff to reconvey ranch subject to incumbrance, which had been foreclosed subsequent to notice of rescission, held that defendants could not complain.

17. Exchange of property 🔑8(1)—In action to rescind exchange, defendant could not complain of judgment which provided for reconveyance or payment of damages.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of property, where judgment was entered in alternative which gave plaintiff right to reconveyance or to payment to him by other party of value of property, held that defendants could not complain.

18. Exchange of property 🔑8(1)—Defendant could not question ability of plaintiff to restore, where judgment was rendered in alternative.

In action to rescind contract for exchange of property, where judgment was rendered plaintiff in alternative in event she restored ranch to defendants, held that ability of plaintiff to reconvey was not matter of concern to defendant, since, in event she was unable to convey, matter would be at an end.

Appeal from Superior Court of Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Mary Dvorak against M. R. Latimer and another to rescind a contract for the sale of real property. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loyd Wright, Charles E. Millikan, and Fred Reed, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Sebald L. Cheroske, of Los Angeles, Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia (W. J. Tremeear, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to obtain a rescission of a contract for the sale of real property and for alternative relief in damages, in the event a return of plaintiff's property cannot be had.

From the facts it appears that for more than two years prior to February 20, 1923, defendants (husband and wife) were the owners of certain ranch property situated in the county of Tulare, Cal. The said ranch was improved by a dwelling house, barn, pumping plant, and some orange and peach trees. For some time prior to said date, plaintiff was the owner of a lot in the city of Pasadena, Cal., on which was erected a "double" or "duplex" bungalow.

On February 17th, plaintiff called at said ranch in company with her husband, one Ryman, and F. L. Polansky, a real estate salesman who was interested in promoting a trade of said properties. Prior to said visit plaintiff had not communicated with or seen defendants, nor had defendants inspected said bungalow. Plaintiff is of Czech descent, and spoke very little English. Most of the conversation had on said visit was through the said real estate agent, who acted as interpreter, and who apparently was acting as agent for both parties with their knowledge and consent. Certain conversations were had with reference particularly to the acreage and water supply. Thereafter defendants inspected said bungalow, and on February 20, 1923, a contract was entered into and executed by the parties to said action, providing for the exchange of their respective properties. At that time the said ranch was free of incumbrances, and the bungalow was subject to an incumbrance of $2,000. The said agreement provided that the ranch should be accepted, subject to a lien of $1,275, and that the bungalow should be accepted, subject to the existing lien of $2,000. By a separate agreement between the parties, which does not appear to be in writing, it was agreed that, prior to the exchange of said properties, defendants would mortgage their ranch for the sum of $1,300, and of this sum defendants retained $1,000 and the balance of $300 was paid to plaintiff. After the foregoing details of the transaction had been consummated, deeds to the respective properties were delivered, and on March 7, 1923, plaintiff went into possession of said ranch, and remained there for some seven months. On or about May 24, 1924, an action was started to foreclose the said mortgage upon the ranch, and a sale was had under those proceedings on September 23, 1924; the purchaser being one W. R. Carson, and the price being $1,584.42.

On July 7, 1923, plaintiff commenced an action against defendants, which was entitled "Complaint to Set Aside Deed and for Reconveyance." Said action was dismissed on January 3, 1924, and on January 10, 1924, this action was commenced.

On or about December 4, 1923, and prior to the filing of the complaint herein, plaintiff served upon defendants a notice of rescission, and at the same time tendered to defendants a deed to said ranch, duly executed, and the sum of $43.03, the amount of expenses incurred by defendants in the transaction. This notice offered to restore to defendants all things of value received by plaintiff under the said contract.

The complaint sets forth the facts substantially as we have summarized them, and, in addition, alleges that defendants falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that there was on said ranch water in sufficient quantities for domestic purposes and for the purposes of irrigating the growing trees and whatever crops may be grown upon said ranch; that defendants pointed out to plaintiffs a certain tract of land which did actually contain 12 acres of land, more or less, and represented to plaintiff that the tract so shown to plaintiff was the land which they agreed in said agreement of exchange to exchange for the herein described premises then belonging to plaintiff; that the water on said land was and still is entirely insufficient for domestic purposes or for irrigating the trees on said ranch or for irrigating such crops as might be grown on said ranch; that the tract of land deeded to plaintiff was only a portion of the land defendant agreed to convey to her, and did not contain 12 acres, more or less; that in truth and in fact the representations so made were each and all of them fraudulent and false, as defendants well knew. Allegations in respect to the value of each of said properties then follow, and the service of the notice of rescission is stated. Plaintiff prayed that the agreement of exchange be rescinded; that the conveyance from plaintiff to defendants be canceled; that defendants be adjudged to reconvey the premises conveyed by the plaintiff to defendants to plaintiff, and, in the event that rescission be impracticable, that plaintiff have judgment against defendants in the sum of $7,000. There is also a prayer for general relief.

The answer denies all of said allegations, but admits that plaintiff notified defendants that she elected to rescind said agreement by reason of the fraud and deceit of defendants.

The court found the facts to be substantially as alleged in the complaint, and judgment was entered decreeing a rescission of the said contract, directing defendant to reconvey the San Pedro property to plaintiff, subject to a mortgage of $2,000, and, upon this being done, directing plaintiff to reconvey to defendants the said ranch, subject to the incumbrance which was upon the same at the time of said exchange, and to the foreclosure proceedings and sale as found by the court, and also directing plaintiffs to pay to defendants the sum of $350.52. In the event that it shall be impossible for defendants to reconvey to plaintiff, the judgment provided that the latter shall retain said ranch and have judgment against defendants in the sum of $4,149.48.

This appeal is taken from the judgment, by means of a bill of exceptions, and appellant makes the following points as a ground for reversal:

(1) The insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings.

(2) That the judgment is uncertain, in that there is no method of resolving the alternative to be followed, or the party by whom an election is to be made.

(3) That the judgment is uncertain in respect to certain ditch water to be transferred thereunder.

(4) That the judgment is uncertain as to the incumbrance to be placed on the property to be reconveyed by defendants.

[1] As to the first ground above stated, defendants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding relative to fraudulent representations made in respect to the amount of land to be conveyed. The court found that defendants did not convey the whole ranch to plaintiff, as agreed, but only a portion thereof.

The agreement for the exchange of the said properties described the property of defendants as "that certain ranch located on Worth road, 2 miles southwest from Porterville, Cal., known as the W. R. Latimer ranch, containing 12 acres, more or less." It is admitted that the property actually conveyed to plaintiff contained 10.677 acres. Defendant W. H. Latimer testified that in the northwest corner of the said ranch there was a tract containing about two-thirds of an acre, which was separated from the remainder of the place by a fence; that said tract was planted with some fig trees, and there was situated thereon two 8-foot square board houses used for sulphuring when drying peaches taken from the orchard on the ranch; that he had told plaintiff that this tract had been conveyed to his son, and it did not belong to the ranch. This tract was omitted from the conveyance to plaintiff. Walter Latimer, son of defendant above mentioned, testified that he was present at the office of the real estate agent when the exchange was discussed and while negotiations leading to its consummation were in progress; that he told the said agent that "we (his father and himself) would trade the clear ranch for the San Pedro property." At no time, prior to the trial of said action, did the said son make any claim to said tract of two-thirds of an acre. No proof of a conveyance from father to son, covering this tract, was made. In addition to this two-thirds of an acre which was omitted from the deed to plaintiff, there was also left out of said deed another tract known as "that portion east of the canal." It is admitted by appellant that the disparity between the amount of land actually conveyed and 12 acres is 1.323 acres.

The testimony of plaintiff on this point brings out very clearly the difficulty confronting an appellate court in an attempt to pass upon a question of this character, where the sufficiency of the evidence is relied upon for a reversal. This witness testified through an interpreter. When it came to the question of just what land was shown her by defendants upon her inspection of the ranch, the court adopted the most obvious method of bringing out her testimony, instructing her to go to the map on the blackboard and point out just what was shown her and where she went. She did this, and, while counsel attempted to fix her migrations by stating the different objects which she appeared to designate, it is impossible for us to say what her testimony was. Only those present in court could tell. Other witnesses who were present and went over the ranch at the same time as plaintiff were her husband, Charles Dvorak, and one Joe Kolar. Neither of these heard defendant make any claim that the omitted acreage was not part of the ranch proper. It is admitted that the sulphur houses on said omitted tract were used to dry peaches raised on the other portion of the ranch deeded to plaintiff. These houses were quite clearly an adjunct of the ranch proper, and were used in connection with operating the same.

[2-4] Appellants, however, insist that a conveyance of the acreage mentioned was a substantial compliance with the contract, and that the disparity of some 1.32 acres is excusable because of the use of the phrase "12 acres, more or less," in the description found in the contract. As a general rule, the phrase "more or less," when immediately following a given number of acres, is one of safety and precaution and intended to cover some slight or unimportant inaccuracy (41 C. J. 214, note 12), but the term may also be treated and construed as a mere estimate of an unknown and indefinite quantity or number which the parties have agreed shall be the subject-matter of the contract. Mosby v. Smith, 194 Mo. App. 20, 28, 186 S. W. 49. In the instant case the contract described the property by metes and bounds, but it was also designated as the "W. H. Latimer ranch," and the use of the phrase "more or less" was merely an attempt to approximate the acreage in the ranch, which was the subject matter of the contract. Furthermore, the phrase mentioned does not meet the situation where the portion omitted contained valuable improvements, and without which the ranch might be worthless. Plaintiff also testified that defendants showed her the ranch, and if, as the court found, it was falsely represented to her that said omitted portion was a part thereof, the question as to the exact amount of acres discussed in the preliminary negotiations becomes more or less immaterial. It is admitted by appellants that they themselves did not know the exact acreage in their ranch, as it had never been surveyed.

[5-7] The evidence is claimed to be insufficient to support the finding with reference to fraudulent representations made on the question of water on the ranch for domestic and irrigation purposes. On this question plaintiff testified that defendant W. H. Latimer told her, in response to her inquiry as to whether or not there was an ample supply of water, that "there was plenty of water"; "that he said there was plenty of water"; "all that water is in the ditch the year around, and we can irrigate with the pump and sell the ditch water; that there is plenty of water the year around"; that she would not have made the trade if defendant had not stated to her that there was plenty of water; that in March, after she had moved on the property, there was not water enough for the house or for irrigation. On the same question, witness Charles Dvorak testified that prior to the execution of the exchange contract he visited the ranch with plaintiff, his wife; that Mr. Latimer, defendant, told him that he could use the pump all the time; that the water never went down, and that they would have enough ditch water to sell to their neighbors; that plaintiff lived on the place six or seven months, and after April there was not enough water for the house; they never got water at all after May.

Appellant takes the position that all the foregoing statements with reference to the water supply are mere expressions of opinion, quoting the following language from Wolleson v. Coburn, 63 Cal. App. 315, 218 P. 479:

> "Mere expressions of opinion * * * are not generally considered as representations of fact. Consequently they are * * * insufficient for the purpose of maintaining an action" for fraud or "deceit, or for the purpose of rescinding a contract."

While that is the general rule followed in this state, it is subject to the qualification that:

> "Matters which might otherwise be only expressions of opinion, when stated as accomplished facts by one of the parties to a contract and accepted and relied upon by the other as such, may, and often do, become the basis of actions for fraudulent misrepresentations." Sheer v. Hoyt, 13 Cal. App. 662, 110 P. 477.

In the case of Owen v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 131 Cal. 530, 63 P. 850, 64 P. 253, relied upon by appellant, no representations were made as to the permanency of the water supply, and the improvements made by purchaser were made upon the strength of his own belief, and not in reliance upon a representation made by the owner. That representations of the character involved in this action may constitute the basis for fraud, and that they are not, as appellant states, expressions of opinion or predictions, has been held to be the rule by the Supreme Court in the case of Hill v. Wilson, 88 Cal. 92, 25 P. 1105. In that case plaintiff sought to rescind a contract for the purchase of land on account of fraudulent representations as to the water supply, and the representations consisted in the statements made to plaintiff by defendant that the land was well and abundantly watered by means of a ditch; that said ditch would carry and there would be flowing therein during all of the dry and irrigating season from two to three hundred inches of water, which was and would be ample and sufficient to irrigate the whole of the land so that the same would produce large and valuable crops of alfalfa and other grasses. The contention that these statements were mere expressions of opinion was answered by the court in the following language:

> "They were statements of very material and important facts, and such as were well calculated to induce the purchase. It was not a statement that there would be water from a certain stream or ditch, but that the ranch was well supplied with water. This was a statement of an existing supply of water. Nor could it be construed as a mere statement that at the time the representation was made it was supplied with sufficient water. To say that the ranch was well watered was equivalent to a statement that it had a supply of water sufficient to irrigate and produce crops at all proper seasons of the year. And this was expressly stated."

The case of Tracy v. Smith, 175 Cal. 161, 165 P. 535, is also authority for the rule that what is a matter of opinion in cases of this character depends largely upon the circumstances of the particular case under consideration, and whether or not the representations were made in the character of a statement of fact.

It might be noted in passing that the fraudulent character of the said representations made in respect to the water supply was established by the testimony of a former employee of defendants, witness Kaehler, who testified that while he was working on the place for several years prior to the time plaintiff went into possession they could not get enough water from the pumping plant to run up to the house; that they could not get the tank half full; that the peach crop dried up the year previous from lack of water.

Upon the question of the character of the representations made upon the water supply, we must hold that they were positive representations made by one assuming to have knowledge of the subject, and that they were not mere expressions of opinion or predictions, but were stated as accomplished facts.

[8, 9] Appellants question the finding of the trial court on the matter of damages and the insufficiency of the evidence in respect thereto. This chief complaint seems to be that there was no evidence of the value of the land if the water supply had been as represented, and the value of the land with water conditions as plaintiff actually found them. It is well established that in a case of this character the measure of plaintiff's damages is the difference between the actual value of the property proffered and passed in exchange by defendants and its value had it been as represented by defendants. Hunter v. McKenzie, 197 Cal. 176, 239 P. 1090. Witness Smith testified that the ranch was worth the sum of $2,500 at the time the contract was made. Defendant testified that his ranch was worth $9,000. The estimate given by defendant was unquestionably the value of the property as he represented it to be. Various other estimates were given of the value of the ranch, and there was ample evidence before the court to justify its finding of damages in the sum of $4,500.

[10] Complaint is made of the manner in which the court computed the credit to be allowed defendants in respect to the said damages. The court allowed defendants credit for the sum of $350.52 paid by them in connection with the exchange of the properties, and also allowed them the sum of $70 per month as the rental value of the San Pedro house, and said rental was held to compensate defendants for money paid out by them for payment of taxes and improvements made upon said house. No exception was made to this computation at the trial. There was evidence that defendants occupied said house, and the value of the house and lot was testified to as being $11,000. While there appears no direct evidence as to the rental value of this property, this was a matter which the court could properly determine with such evidence before it. No complaint is made by defendants upon the ground that the estimate of rental is excessive, and therefore they cannot be prejudiced by this finding. We see no reason why this finding should be disturbed.

[11-15] Appellant next attacks the insufficiency of the finding to the effect that plaintiff offered to restore to defendants everything she received under the contract. This finding is made in the exact language of the amended complaint, and this allegation of the complaint is not denied by defendants in their answer. A failure to deny a material averment in a complaint is an admission of the truth of the fact stated, and obviates the need of introducing evidence and making a finding upon the fact involved. 21 Cal. Jur. p. 156. Notwithstanding this condition of affairs, evidence was introduced by both parties concerning the matter of rescission. Plaintiff offered, in a written notice duly served upon defendants, to "fully restore to you any and all things of value received by me from you as fully and completely as if said contract of exchange had never been made." At the time of said service tender was made of the sum of $42.03 and a deed to said ranch property. Defendants refused to read the said notice. We believe the said notice and tender were sufficient to comply with section 1691 of the Civil Code. Appellants complain because they paid off a $2,000 incumbrance on the San Pedro property, and respondent did not tender this sum to them. We do not see that respondent was concerned with this payment which appellants had voluntarily made, following the fraudulent transaction. The judgment expressly provided that this property should be reconveyed to plaintiff, subject to an incumbrance of $2,000, and defendants' rights were fully protected in this respect. As to the sum of $300, which the evidence shows was paid plaintiff out of the proceeds of the loan which defendants placed upon their ranch, prior to the execution of the contract, and which was paid to the real estate agent as his commission, this was a matter which was not mentioned or referred to in the contract. It was an entirely separate transaction, and no offer to repay the same, as a basis for rescission, was required. Section 1691 of the Civil Code obligates the party seeking rescission to "restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same." The $300 was not received under the contract sought to be rescinded. It was admittedly a separate agreement which was not before the court. The only thing of value which plaintiff received under the contract in question was the real property, for which the evidence shows a deed was tendered. Where the vendee and vendor, under a contract for the sale or exchange of real property, enter into another independent agreement and advances have been made to the vendee under said agreement, the vendee, upon rescinding the contract for purchase, is not obliged to offer restoration of a sum due under said independent agreement as a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action to enforce rescission. The question of any sum not due under the contract calls for an adjudication of facts independent of the contract itself, and this does not come within the scope of section 1691 of the Civil Code. California Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 91 P. 593. Credit was given appellant in the judgment for said sum of $300 and for taxes and other expenditures made by appellant with respect to the San Pedro property, and we see no reason why the adjustment of the equities between the parties, made by the learned trial judge, should be disturbed. As has been well stated in a case involving rescission based upon fraud:

> "Parties engaged in a fraudulent attempt to obtain a neighbor's property are not the objects of the special solicitude of the courts." Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 P. 234.

[16] The court directed plaintiff to reconvey the said ranch, subject to the incumbrance thereon at the time of the exchange, and to the foreclosure proceedings and sale referred to in the statement of facts, supra. We see no reason why appellant can complain of the judgment in this particular. Notice of rescission was served prior to the commencement of proceedings to foreclose said mortgage. The adjustment of this and the other equities between the parties was wholly consonant with the principles of equity, and in pursuance of the right of the court to adjust such equities according to the respective rights of the parties. All of these matters were fully covered by the trial court in its findings, and we do not feel disposed to disturb the conclusions reached in respect thereto.

[17] Appellants are not satisfied with the alternative judgment rendered herein, stating that it is uncertain, in several particulars. Their objections to a judgment in the alternative in cases of this character are all met by the decision of this court in the case of Marks v. Howkins, 55 Cal. App. 664, 203 P. 1035, wherein it was held that, in an action for rescission, based upon fraud, it may be adjudged that plaintiff is entitled to a reconveyance of the property or to the payment to him by the other party of the value of the property found by the court. The situation which confronts defendants was brought about by their own fraud, and, if they refuse to reconvey the San Pedro property, they cannot complain if a money judgment is enforced against them, as an alternative to said reconveyance.

We have examined the other grounds of uncertainty which appellants rely upon, but believe there is no merit in them. The judgment is specific and complete in its details, and it was one which we hold was in form and effect in keeping with the broad and extensive powers which a court of equity possesses and which was necessary to adjust the equities of the case according to the just rights of the parties.

[18] The ability of plaintiff to restore is questioned by appellant. We see no merit in this objection. If appellants offer to convey the San Pedro property to respondent, according to the judgment, and she is, through her own fault, or neglect, unable to convey the ranch to appellants, the matter would be at an end, and no resort to the alternative money judgment could be had by respondent. Thus the finding upon the ability of respondent to restore the property received by her cannot operate in any manner to the prejudice of appellant, and affords him no ground for complaint. There is, however, some substantial evidence showing the ability of plaintiff to perform.

Summing up our conclusions in respect to the foregoing points urged by appellant, we find substantial evidence in the record to uphold the conclusions of the trial court as set forth in the findings. Respondent was a foreigner unacquainted with the English language. She undoubtedly purchased the ranch under and relying upon the representations made by appellants, in respect to the water supply and land included in the transfer. In these matters fraudulent representations were made to her by appellants, and the court was fully justified in placing the parties in practically the same situation in which they found themselves prior to the execution of the contract.

The conclusions of the trial court being based upon substantial evidence and in accordance with well-recognized principles of equity, the judgment is affirmed.

The cause of action which was alleged in the trial court cannot be changed in the appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by George Elliott against J. H. Sims, who filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff, the Richfield Southern Oil Company, for which the American Gasoline Corporation was substituted, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gerald Willis Myers, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James P. Fitzpatrick, of Los Angeles, for respondent American Gasoline Corporation.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff sued to recover the balance due on a promissory note for the sum of $1,000, executed by defendant J. H. Sims. Plaintiff alleged that $450 had been paid on the note, and asked judgment for $550 and an attorney's fee. Defendant Sims filed an answer and cross-complaint in which he alleged that J. P. Mannen, originally a party defendant, had sold him a number of shares of the capital stock of Richfield Southern Oil Company; that Mannen was an agent of said company; that the note was to be "placed in escrow by said company until paid." Sims further alleged that the note, quoting from his cross-complaint, "was sold and transferred by the defendant Mannen with the knowledge of the defendant Richfield Southern Company, to the cross-defendant Elliott, who this cross-complainant alleges on information and belief knew and was well acquainted with all of the facts surrounding the case, and further that said cross-defendant Elliott was acting in collusion with the cross-defendants Mannen and Richfield Southern Oil Company, for the purpose of defrauding the cross-complainant Sims of the value of face of said note and of dividing the profits between them." He asks that the note be canceled and that he be given judgment against Elliott, Mannen, and Richfield Southern Oil Company for the sum of $450, the amount he had paid to plaintiff on the note. He now appeals from the judgment entered against him for the balance due on the note.

At the trial it was established that Elliott was an innocent purchaser for value, and this was conceded by counsel for Sims. Mannen was not served with process, and the action was dismissed as to him. Mannen was a salesman employed by Sloan & Noll, who were fiscal agents for the sale of the capital stock of the Richfield Southern Oil Company. The sale of the stock to Sims was not reported to the company, but the note was sold to the plaintiff by Mannen. Sims did not receive his stock, and was unaware that none had been issued to him until some of his neighbors received dividends upon their stock. He thereupon inquired at the office of the company and learned that his note had not been turned in, but had been improperly sold to Elliott by Mannen. In the meantime he had made payments on the note to the amount of $450.

[1, 2] It is now contended that Mannen was the agent of Richfield Southern Oil Company, and that the company is responsible for his conduct. This issue is not properly before us. In his pleadings, Sims alleged that the plaintiff, Mannen, and the Richfield Southern Oil Company acted together in collusion for the purpose of defrauding him. In his prayer he asked the court to cancel the note and reimburse him for the amount paid thereon by a judgment against these three parties. No evidence whatever was offered to sustain these allegations. The cause of action which was alleged in the trial court cannot be changed in the appellate court. At the trial, Sims conceded that plaintiff, the innocent holder of the note, is entitled to recover the balance due thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Frank Barrington against Don E. Sarles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Coleman E. Stewart, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Ivan Kelso, Alfred T. Hutchins, and Chas. A. De Flon, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This case was tried by the court without the aid of a jury, and judgment went for plaintiff for the sum of $415.05 and costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

Defendant was driving from a private driveway into a main boulevard. Plaintiff approached, traveling upon the boulevard. Defendant's machine was partly across the road, and, in endeavoring to avoid it, plaintiff's car skidded against a tree, and a piece of timber lying by the roadside, and into a concrete ditch which ran along the edge of the road, to the damage of his automobile. The court found that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and the only question in the case for us to decide relates to such finding. This question is regarding the speed at which plaintiff's car was traveling. In the circumstances of this case, plaintiff was not negligent per se if he was not exceeding 35 miles per hour. Having carefully read the evidence, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in determining that plaintiff's speed was not in excess of that rate.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LONG BEACH v. O'DONNELL et al. (Civ. 5692.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1928.

Eminent domain 🔑265(5)—Property owners' employment of attorneys on contingent fee basis, dependent on city's condemning property, precluded taxation of attorney fees on dismissal following abandonment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a).

In eminent domain proceedings subsequently abandoned, property owners' obtaining judgment of dismissal under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, were not entitled to recover attorney's fees thereunder, where it was shown that the property owners had employed attorneys on a contingent fee basis under contract whereby attorneys were to receive nothing unless the city took the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Proceeding by the City of Long Beach against Peter O'Donnell, Samuel Matthias Bird, and Emeline Bird, his wife, and others. From an order striking out the item of attorney's fees from the cost bill on judgment of dismissal, the two last named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bruce Mason, City Atty., George W. Trammell, Jr., Asst. City Atty., C. A. Windham, Chief Deputy City Atty., and John K. Hull, Deputy City Atty., all of Long Beach, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This was a proceeding in eminent domain brought to condemn several parcels of real property for public park purposes. The appellants were named in the complaint as defendants, and filed an answer, appearing by attorneys whom they had engaged for that purpose. Thereafter the plaintiff filed notice of abandonment of the proceedings, whereupon appellants sought and obtained, under section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure, a judgment of dismissal. Appellants then filed a cost bill in which they included a sum claimed by them as attorney fees. Plaintiff made a motion to tax costs, and upon the hearing of this motion the court made an order striking out entirely the item of attorney fees. From this order the appeal is taken.

The order is defended by plaintiff upon the ground that appellants had employed their attorneys on a contingent fee basis, whereby the attorneys were to receive nothing unless the plaintiff took the property, and that hence appellants had not incurred any liability for attorney fees, and section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure did not authorize the award of such fees to them on the abandonment of the proceedings. That section reads in part as follows:

> "Upon such abandonment, express or implied, on motion of defendant, a judgment shall be entered dismissing the proceeding and awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees. These costs and disbursements, including expenses and attorney fees, may be claimed in and by a cost-bill, to be prepared, served, filed and taxed as in civil actions. * * *"

We have no doubt at all that the object of this provision as to attorney fees is merely to reimburse a defendant for attorney fees which he has paid, or to indemnify him for such fees for which he has become liable, provided the fees so paid or incurred are reasonable. A statute similar to this provision of the Code exists in Illinois, and the Supreme Court of that state in Chicago, etc., Co. v. Flaherty, 222 Ill. 67, 78 N. E. 29, gave it the construction just stated in substantially the same language which we have used. This precise question has not arisen in California, but in City of Sacramento v. Swanston, 29 Cal. App. 212, 223, 155 P. 101, 106, where this provision for attorney fees was held constitutional, the court said, in the course of its discussion:

> "Under the statute complained of here, * * * if the property is not accepted by the plaintiff, then he must reimburse the defendant for the expenses which he has been compelled to bear in litigation for which he was not responsible."

It has also been uniformly held that mortgages and other agreements providing for the allowance of attorney fees to a party in litigation arising thereon did not extend to a case where the party has neither paid nor incurred a liability to pay such fees. Carriere v. Minturn, 5 Cal. 435; Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369, 380; Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379; City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 49 Cal. App. 353, 193 P. 504. In Rapp v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 P. 325, the court intimated that the same rule would apply to the provision formerly contained in section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure for allowing reasonable attorney fees to the successful claimant in a mechanic's lien case.

At the hearing of the motion to tax costs, one of the appellants' attorneys testified that he told the appellant Samuel M. Bird, who apparently had charge of the matter for both appellants:

> " 'Well, Mr. Bird, it is a little stiffer fee, being a contingent fee; as you know, it is a little more than if you gave us a per diem, which we would much rather have; the fees will be 20 to 30 per cent.' He just nodded his head up and down and said, 'Well, all right, go ahead.' "

Appellant Samuel M. Bird testified that this was correct; that nothing was said at all about what was to be paid in case there was an abandonment; that he had paid no attorney fees in this proceeding; and that the only obligation which he had with the attorneys was to pay them 20 to 30 per cent. of the value of the property in case it were condemned. This testimony shows that the agreement was for a contingent fee, and that the appellants never incurred any liability to their attorneys for a fee in this proceeding; the contingency on which the fee was payable not having occurred. The case is squarely within the rule declared in Lavenson v. Wise, 131 Cal. 369, 63 P. 622, and Reynolds v. Sorosis Fruit Co., 133 Cal. 625, 66 P. 21. In Lavenson v. Wise, the attorney had made an agreement to collect a note for "the sum of $500 as a fee upon collection of the same," both he and the client expecting at that time that there would be no litigation over the matter. In fact, the suit which he brought upon the note was defended and defeated. The Supreme Court held that the fee was contingent, and that, although the attorney and client had both assumed that there would be no litigation, yet the attorney could not proceed under that agreement and after defeat of his client attempt to repudiate it and collect an attorney's fee. This rule was approved and followed in Reynolds v. Sorosis Fruit Co., supra.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1928.

1. Perjury ⟹11(2)—Defendant's false testimony in prior prosecution for larceny of potatoes, relative to purchase of potatoes, and why he did not pay therefor, held material.

In prosecution for perjury, defendant's false testimony, given in his prior prosecution for grand larceny of potatoes relative to purchase by him of such potatoes, and why he did not pay for them, held material.

2. Perjury ⟹11(8)—It is sufficient to constitute perjury, if false testimony is circumstantially material; degree of materiality being unimportant.

The false testimony used as basis for perjury prosecution need not be directly material to the proceeding in which it was given, but it is sufficient if it is circumstantially material; the degree of materiality being unimportant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Perjury.]

3. Perjury ⟹34(4)—Corroboration of prosecuting witness as to defendant's perjury in preceding trial held sufficient.

Evidence corroborating prosecuting witness as to defendant's perjury in preceding trial, wherein defendant was alleged to have made the false statements used as basis for perjury charge, held sufficient.

4. Criminal law ⟹808½—Instruction on corroborative evidence held not misleading, where substantially in language of statute (Pen. Code § 1103a).

Instruction, in prosecution for perjury, on corroborative evidence, to the effect that it was not absolutely necessary that falsity of testimony be established by two witnesses, but that it might be proved by testimony of one witness and other corroborating facts or circumstances, held not misleading so as to be erroneous, since it was substantially in language of Pen. In absence of special request otherwise, it is generally sufficient to instruct the jury in the language of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

A. R. Albert was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

E. T. Taylor, of Modesto, and Frank M. Carr and Richard Liebman, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information contains four separate charges of perjury. The defendant was convicted of the offenses charged in the first and fourth counts. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he was sentenced to imprisonment for both offenses, the terms of imprisonment to run concurrently. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. The respondent admits inability to find any corroboration of the testimony of the prosecuting witness in support of the fourth count, and a careful search of the record fails to disclose any corroboration thereof.

The first count alleges that in the trial of the defendant, in November, 1926, upon a charge of grand larceny, he falsely testified that he paid certain moneys for certain sweet potatoes. The testimony given in that case shows that the defendant and C. C. Piccanco had entered into an agreement for the sale of the latter's sweet potatoes to the former, payment to be made for each load thereof as delivered, and that the defendant received eight loads of the potatoes; he hauling them in his own truck from the defendant's home in Stanislaus county to Oakland or San Francisco. Piccanco testified in that case and in this that the defendant did not pay for any of the potatoes, but that he was induced to deliver all but the last load to the defendant, without requiring immediate payment, by certain representations and promises of the latter. As to the potatoes so delivered, it may be conceded that the defendant was not guilty of larceny under the law as it then stood; the owner having intentionally parted with possession and title. 17 R. C. L. 12. When the defendant appeared for the purpose of getting the last load of potatoes, Piccanco, according to his testimony, demanded immediate payment for all the potatoes, and it was agreed that, after loading the potatoes on defendant's truck, the parties would go to the town of Turlock, where the load of potatoes would be weighed, and payment would be made for all the potatoes. After the potatoes were so loaded, and weighed, it was agreed that the parties would meet at a certain pool room, where the defendant would make payment. Piccanco testified:

> "He (defendant) started up with full speed. When I got down to the pool room he was stepping on the gas. * * * He started out as fast as the truck could go through town."

Piccanco followed and overtook the defendant, but the latter refused to make payment. A justifiable inference from the evidence is that Piccanco did not intend to surrender control over the last load of potatoes or to part with title thereto until payment therefor by the defendant, and that the defendant was guilty of larceny in taking those potatoes under the circumstances shown by the evidence. In the larceny case the defendant testified that he had paid for all of the potatoes from time to time as they were delivered, except the last load; that the reason he did not pay for that load was "because he (Piccanco) give me two loads of potatoes, small, black, decayed, and I couldn't sell them in Oakland, and I want him to pay for those two loads of potatoes before I pay him."

[1, 2] From the testimony quoted it clearly appears that the alleged false testimony was material. The defendant's explanation of his reason for refusing to pay for the last load of potatoes is wholly without force, if he had made no payments on account of potatoes theretofore delivered to him, because, under such circumstances, Piccanco was under no obligation to pay or repay any money to the defendant, and, therefore, there was no reason for withholding payment for the last load. The false testimony need not be directly material. It is sufficient if it is circumstantially material; the degree of materiality being unimportant. In re Braynard, 52 Cal. App. 631, 634, 199 P. 576; People v. Phillips, 56 Cal. App. 291, 293, 205 P. 40; People v. Dunstan, 59 Cal. App. 574, 584, 211 P. 813; People v. Patterson, 64 Cal. App. 223, 229, 221 P. 394.

[3] Appellant contends that there is no corroboration of Piccanco's testimony to the effect that the defendant did not pay for any of the potatoes. Both Piccanco and the defendant testified that, immediately after the last load of potatoes had been weighed, as stated, the defendant made out and delivered to Piccanco a written statement, which was admitted in evidence, showing the net weight of each load of potatoes and the aggregate weight thereof. From the computations set forth in the statement it appears that 22,785 pounds of potatoes were to be paid for at 3½ cents a pound, amounting to $797.47, and 5620 pounds at 3 cents, amounting to $168.60. These two sums are then added together, showing a total of $966.07. No credit for any payments appears in the statement. It is highly improbable that the defendant would have given Piccanco this statement without inserting therein any credits for payments made, if any. A witness testified that she took down in shorthand certain statements made by defendant in a justice's court, after the delivery of the potatoes, in which the following occurred: "Q. He (Piccanco) claims you owe him about $900, doesn't he? A. I never denied it." Another witness testified that at a time when nearly all the potatoes had been delivered Piccanco asked the defendant "if he had the money to pay for the * * * potatoes," and that the defendant replied, "Yes, I be back to-morrow. I bring the tags back. I straight up all the potatoes with you." The foregoing evidence tends to prove the falsity of the defendant's testimony to the effect that he had paid for all but the last load of the potatoes, and must be held to be sufficient corroboration of Piccanco's testimony. People v. Follette, 74 Cal. App. 178, 204, 240 P. 502.

[4] Complaint is made of the language italicized herein contained in an instruction of the court, reading in part as follows:

> "As regards proving the falsity of such testimony the court instructs the jury that while that fact cannot be established by the testimony of one witness alone, it is not absolutely necessary that it be established by the testimony of two witnesses; it may be proved by the testimony of one witness and other corroborating facts or circumstances corroborating such witness; provided, the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony of said witness and such corroborating facts and circumstances that such testimony was willfully false in fact."

The instruction substantially states the rule prescribed by section 1103a of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

> "A perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and corroborating circumstances."

[5] In view of the context, it would be hypercritical to hold that the jurors may have understood the instruction to mean that the corroborating facts and circumstances need not tend to prove the falsity of the alleged testimony or that it was sufficient if there was corroboration of other parts of Piccanco's testimony which did not relate to such falsity. If the defendant desired fuller or more explicit instructions on the subject he should have requested them. It is generally sufficient, in the absence of such a request, to instruct the jury in the language of the statute.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed in so far as they relate to the fourth count and affirmed as to the first count in the information.

PEOPLE v. ESTORGA. (Cr. 1607.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 12, 1928.

1. Jury ⚷131(3)—Discretionary power of court to limit or deny examination of jurors for purpose of peremptory challenge is absolute (Pen. Code, § 1077, repealed by St. 1927, p. 1048, and section 1078, amended by St. 1927, p. 1039).

The discretionary power of court to limit or deny examination of jurors for purpose of peremptory challenge is absolute, pursuant to St. 1927, p. 1048, repealing Pen. Code, § 1077, and St. 1927, p. 1039, amending Pen. Code, § 1078, relative to examination of prospective jurors by trial court, and preserving distinction between challenges in accordance with definition of Pen. Code, § 1069, of "peremptory challenge," as objection to juror for which no reason need be given.

2. Jury ⚷131(1)—Refusal, in prosecution for rape, to permit interrogation of prospective jurors on voir dire, held erroneous, where court examined entire panel collectively (Pen. Code, § 264).

In prosecution for rape, refusal of trial judge to permit defendant's counsel right to interrogate prospective jurors on voir dire examination to ascertain fitness to act as jurors, held erroneous, where examination by court was of entire panel as whole, and only defense consisted of attempt to show mitigating circumstances surrounding commission of offense so as to reduce punishment in accordance with Pen. Code, § 264, providing that jury shall recommend whether punishment shall be by imprisonment in county jail or in state prison.

York, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

Charles Estorga was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

H. E. Thompson, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted on three counts in an information charging the crime of rape. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is not questioned by appellant. The testimony of the defendant himself admitted the commission of the offenses charged in the information. His testimony as to certain matters that might have caused the jury to recommend a different punishment was fully before the jury. Appellant contends, however, that "the court erred in holding that the examination for cause, by the court, was sufficient, and in denying defendant's counsel the right to interrogate the prospective jurors on their voir dire examination with competent questions, or any questions, to ascertain their fitness to act as jurors in said cause." This contention should be sustained. We are further of the opinion that the error was prejudicial, because the examination as conducted by the court, together with the court's limitation of examination by counsel for appellant, denied to appellant the right to test, by reasonable inquiry, the qualifications of the prospective jurors.

This court should not put the stamp of approval upon the method used in this case, of collective examination of the entire panel, including those who had not been drawn and called into the jury box as prospective jurors of the case about to be tried. Such method of general examination does not tend to protect the parties in their right to be assured of the proper qualification of the individual jurors.

[1] For a clear understanding of the situation presented when a jury is about to be selected for the trial of a cause, it is important to keep in mind the distinction between the right of challenge for cause and the right to a limited number of peremptory challenges. It must be conceded that the discretionary power of the court to limit or deny examination of jurors for the purposes of peremptory challenge is absolute. In People v. Ferlin, 265 P. 230, 235, the Supreme Court said:

> "Upon voir dire examination, the defendant attempted to ascertain of each juror whether he was a member of or affiliated with a named secret organization. Objection was promptly made by the prosecution, which the court sustained. The defendant thereupon explained the purpose of this line of inquiry as being necessary to his intelligent exercise of peremptory challenges. It is now well settled in this state that a juror may not be examined on voir dire solely for the purpose of laying the foundation for the exercise of a peremptory challenge. People v. Edwards, 163 Cal. 752, 754, 127 Pac. 58."

In People v. Edwards, supra, there is a careful review of the rules governing the subject of challenges of jurors. It should be noted, however, that the Legislature of 1927 made several changes in the Penal Code on that subject. Prior to those amendments, sections 1077 and 1078 provided for exceptions to the challenge of an individual juror, and for trial of the challenge. By the amendments of the year 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1048), section 1077 was repealed, and section 1078 was amended to read as follows:

> "It shall be the duty of the trial court to examine the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury. He shall permit reasonable examination of prospective jurors by counsel for the people and for the defendant."

The title of the amending act describes the amendment as one "relating to selection of jurors by trial judge." Stats. 1927, p. 1039. Giving consideration to the Penal Code as thus amended, and keeping in mind the decisions above mentioned, we see nothing in the amendment which adds anything to the right of examination of prospective jurors for the purposes of peremptory challenge. The distinction between the two kinds of challenge to an individual juror has been carefully preserved. The peremptory challenge is "an objection to a juror for which no reason need be given, but upon which the court must exclude him." Pen. Code, § 1069. As was said in People v. Edwards, supra:

> "This definition shows that no issue of fact can possibly arise with regard to the reasons for such challenge. * * * The conclusion is that there is no statutory authority for the examination of jurors solely for the purpose of a peremptory challenge or for the allowance of questions which do not tend to prove some fact material to a challenge for cause."

In the case at bar, therefore, the sole question is whether or not the court refused to allow counsel for the defendant to make reasonable examination of the prospective jurors for purposes related to the right of challenge for cause. In the first place, the record shows that the clerk called the roll of the venire men and women, and they were sworn to answer questions touching their qualifications to act as jurors in the trial of the case. The judge asked them to remain standing a few minutes while he stated the nature of the case and asked them a series of questions. It may be assumed, and, indeed, it appears, that they were usual and appropriate questions covering the proper qualifications of jurors, and particularly touched upon the causes of challenge mentioned in sections 1073 and 1074 of the Penal Code. The record does not contain any answer given by any of said prospective jurors, except one, and the record shows that, when the names of the jurors were drawn from the box, that person's name was not drawn, and she never appeared in the jury box at all. After the judge had made this examination, he directed that twelve names be drawn, and this was done. The court then said:

> "Gentlemen, the examination for cause in the opinion of the court is sufficient. Exercise your peremptory challenges."

Mr. H. E. Thompson, counsel for defendant, then said:

> "If the court please, in the answers the veniremen made I was not able to find out how they answered. I was not able to see a nod of the head. There was a large number here standing up. I am not able from the examination to intelligently challenge on behalf of this defendant, and I would like to have the privilege of asking each individual juror a few questions.
> "The Court: What questions would you like to ask?
> "Mr. H. E. Thompson: I would like to know if they are married men, and if they have children, and whether they are young men or young women, and if they would have any prejudice by reason of those facts, and whether they have had any trouble of the kind in their family, or in the near families or near relations, and I don't know, any questions—all being examined in a body, I don't know how any of them answered any questions, and I would not know unless I individually asked them separately how each one feels.
> "The Court: None of the questions you have suggested would tend to develop a ground for challenge for cause, and therefore would be immaterial.
> "Mr. H. E. Thompson: Very well. We except to the ruling."

Thereupon two jurors in succession were excused on peremptory challenge of the defendant, and their places supplied. The district attorney passed the jury, and thereupon defendant's attorney said:

> "I will not make any further challenges, for the reason I am not sufficiently informed.
> "The Court: Either challenge them or pass them, one or the other.
> "Mr. H. E. Thompson. I will have to pass them, your honor."

The jury was then sworn to try the case.

It may be assumed, and under the decisions apparently it must be assumed, that the silence of the veniremen under the questions put to them (and in view of the court's statement to them on this point) was equivalent in some instances to a negative answer to each question, and, in others, equivalent to an affirmative answer, where any other answer would have brought forth facts tending to disqualify. The court asked them to consider the questions as addressed to them individually and personally, and directed them to let the facts be known. Under such circumstances, it has been held that the silence of the jurors may be taken as an answer. A few months ago, in People v. Raymond, 262 P. 442, this court had occasion to discuss the matter of collective examination as to general qualifications of jurors, and referred to People v. Riordan, 79 Cal. App. 488, 250 P. 190, where the collective examination of jurors was criticized, but not held to be illegal. In both cases, however, the jurors so examined were only those who had been drawn and seated in the jury box, who were thus reduced to twelve in number, and who thereby had become, definitely, prospective jurors for the case on trial. Until so drawn, if jurors are at all "prospective jurors" within the meaning of the statute, they are much more remotely in that class. This point becomes clear, if we suppose that the court should undertake to examine an individual venireman whose name had not been drawn from the jury box. This would be a "useless gesture." For it may be that his name will not be drawn at all, and so he would never have any direct connection with the case, even as a "prospective juror." And it should be noted that, in the case before us, after the judge had conducted his general examination, he caused twelve names to be drawn, and the jury box filled, before even the slightest opportunity was given to counsel to ask any questions. If before these names were drawn counsel for defendant had asserted that he was entitled to further examine all of the persons who had been questioned by the judge, the court would have been justified in ruling that such questions could not be allowed, until after the names were drawn from the jury list. The interesting question arises here whether false answers made to questions thus put by the court to one whose name never was drawn by the clerk from the jury list would constitute perjury.

In this case it might perhaps be conceded that there was no miscarriage of justice in defendant's conviction of the crime of rape, because by his own testimony he admitted that he did have illicit relations with the girl named in the information, and that her age was known to him to be less than 18 years. But, even so, it must be remembered that in a case of this kind the jury has a most important function to perform in relation to the penalty.

The rape in this case consisted of acts of sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 18 years. Under the evidence, it was the age alone of the girl which supplied the element of crime in the transaction. In such a case the punishment may be either "imprisonment in the state prison not more than fifty years," or "in the county jail for not more than one year." And the statute provides that "the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison." Pen. Code, § 264. The jury here recommended imprisonment in the state prison. The defense consisted of an attempt to show, by the circumstances which surrounded the commission of the offense, that the defendant ought not to suffer the more severe punishment. It is manifest that in this instance the substantial rights of the defendant are involved, not so much in the decision of the main issue, as in the determination of the punishment to be inflicted. It needs no other information than the slightest knowledge of human nature affords to reveal the fact that a juror who had suffered, in his own family, or among his near relations, from "any trouble of the kind," by an act of rape against some one thus near and dear to him, almost inevitably would prescribe the most severe form of punishment. He would regard with suspicion or dislike evidence of mitigating circumstances shown by the evidence, although to a fair-minded person they might have indicated that punishment in the county jail for not more than one year would be a just sentence, and that imprisonment in the penitentiary for "not more than fifty years" would be a very unjust sentence.

[2] We have arrived at the conclusion that, in view of the proceedings which have been outlined herein, there was never any real or substantial examination made of the prospective jurors "to select a fair and impartial jury," as required by law; and particularly we are of the opinion that, by reason of the manner in which the examination was conducted by the court, it was erroneous, and prejudicial to defendant's rights, to refuse to allow defendant's counsel to supply, by further examination, the defects caused by the irregularity and indefiniteness of the examination made by the trial judge.

The judgment and order are reversed.

I concur: HOUSER, J.

YORK, J. I dissent, for the reason that I do not believe that any of the questions suggested by the attorney for the appellant were proper, or would tend to prove some fact material to a challenge for cause.

LOCKHART v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Civ. 3526.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷276(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish that railroad employee at time of injury was engaged in interstate commerce.

Evidence in employee's action against railroad for personal injuries held insufficient to establish that plaintiff, at time of injury, was engaged in interstate commerce.

2. Commerce ⚷27(5)—Work in which servant was engaged at time of injury does not constitute "interstate commerce" merely because railroad was interstate carrier.

From the mere fact that the railroad company is an interstate as well as an intrastate carrier of passengers, and therefore engaged in interstate commerce, it does not follow that work in which servant was engaged at time of injury constituted interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interstate Commerce.]

3. Commerce ⚷27(8)—Employee, at time of injury repairing cars generally used in interstate commerce, is engaged in "interstate commerce."

Railroad employee, who at time of receiving injury is engaged in repair of cars generally used in "interstate commerce," is at such time engaged in work of an interstate character.

4. Master and servant 🔑265(4)—Railroad employee, to avoid jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission, must prove that at time of injury railroad was engaged in interstate commerce.

Railroad employee, suing for injuries received in course of employment, has burden to allege and prove that at time and place of accident defendant was engaged in interstate commerce, in order to avoid jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission.

5. Master and servant 🔑352—Railroad employee, injured in intrastate commerce, cannot maintain action for injuries on ground accident was caused by gross negligence of defendant (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1913, § 12, subd. (b); St. 1917, p. 831).

Provisions of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1913, § 12, subd. (b), St. 1913, p. 279, providing that, in case of gross negligence of employer, injured employee might at his option maintain action in court or apply to Industrial Accident Commission, having been omitted from St. 1917, p. 831, employee injured in intrastate commerce cannot maintain action for damages on ground accident was caused by gross negligence.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Exclusion of testimony later admitted held not error.

Where testimony excluded was later admitted, rulings excluding evidence in the first instance did not constitute prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Thomas R. Lockhart against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Rollinson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges:

"That, at all of the times in this complaint mentioned, defendant company has been and now is a foreign corporation, conducting an interstate commerce business in the state of California and for the purpose of this complaint, in the county of Los Angeles, therein engaged in the business of a common carrier.

"That on April 14, 1924, at the hour of 10:45 p. m., on said day, at the Southern Pacific Company shop yards in the city of, and county of, Los Angeles, state of California, the plaintiff herein, Thomas R. Lockhart, was in charge of an engine crew at that time and place."

The complaint then alleges that while in the discharge of his alleged duties the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the defendant.

The answer admits the allegations of the complaint herein quoted, denies the alleged negligence and injuries, and then alleges:

"Further answering, by way of separate defense, the defendant alleges that at the time and place of the accident the defendant was then and there engaged in intrastate commerce, and that the superior court of the state of California is entirely without jurisdiction to appear or to try said cause, and that the same can be heard only by the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California."

At the close of plaintiff's case the court entered a judgment of nonsuit on motion of the defendant. This appeal is from the judgment. The only material question raised by the appeal is whether the plaintiff was employed in interstate commerce at the time of the alleged injury.

[1] The evidence shows that he was in charge of a yard switch engine; that his duties were to take cars in need of repairs "into the repair yard," and, after they had been repaired, to place them "on other tracks where they might be cut back into use"; that immediately before the accident he had taken about seventeen cars from the repair yard and had left them on a track outside such yard, all of the cars being "empties except one car of poles for San Pedro"; and that the alleged injuries were sustained on the return trip after so placing the cars. None of the witnesses knew where any of these cars had been used or the use intended to be made of them, except that one car, loaded with poles, was to go to San Pedro.

[2] While the complaint alleges that the defendant was "conducting an interstate commerce business" and "engaged in the business of a common carrier," it is not alleged that the work in which the plaintiff was engaged when injured was connected with interstate commerce. "From the mere fact that a railroad company is an interstate, as well as an intrastate, public carrier of freight and passengers, and therefore is engaged in interstate commerce, it does not follow that the work in which its servant was engaged when killed or injured was interstate commerce." 12 C. J. 44.

[3] If it had been shown that the cars in question were generally used in interstate commerce, it might be argued logically that plaintiff's work was so connected with the repair of the cars as to be of an interstate character. "An employee performing repair work or other work in connection with an engine, car, or other similar instrumentality habitually used in interstate commerce is entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the act, although at the time the instrumentality is temporarily at rest or out of service, or is not being put to the particular use for which it was designed. * * * Where repair work is a part of interstate commerce, all minor tasks which form a part of the larger one are likewise interstate commerce so as to make a person engaging in them engaged in interstate commerce." 12 C. J. 47. Here the evidence not only fails to show that the cars in question were habitually used in interstate commerce, but it does not appear that they were ever so used.

[4] The burden was on the plaintiff to allege and prove that at the very time and place of the accident the defendant was engaged in interstate commerce. Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 199 Cal. 126, 131, 248 P. 501, 49 A. L. R. 1323. It is clear that he was not relieved of the burden of establishing that fact by his failure to allege it or by defendant's allegation that it then and there engaged in intrastate commerce. The admission in the answer of the allegations contained in the first paragraph of the complaint is not an admission that the particular work in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of the accident was interstate in character. The defendant is always engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce. While the allegation in the answer, that "at the time and place of the accident the defendant was then and there engaged in intrastate commerce," may have cured the defect in the complaint resulting from the plaintiff's failure to allege that the defendant was then and there engaged in interstate commerce, it did not shift the burden of proof on this necessary element of his cause of action. Such allegation in the answer does not constitute an affirmative defense, but is in effect the denial of a fact necessary for the plaintiff to establish, but which he failed to allege.

[5] Appellant contends that, whether the work in which he was engaged at the time of the accident was interstate or intrastate, he is entitled to maintain this action on the ground that the accident was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant, citing Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 185 P. 510. The decision in that case was based on the provisions of subdivision (b) of section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 279) providing that, in a case of gross negligence of an employer, an injured employee might, at his option, maintain an action in court for damages or apply to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation for the injury. Those provisions were omitted from the act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 831), and therefore the case cited is inapplicable. It may be stated further that gross negligence was neither alleged nor proved in this case.

[6] Appellant complains of several rulings made by the trial court. The plaintiff was asked: "Where were those empties from, if you know? * * * Did you notice any of those cars as to whether they all belonged to the Southern Pacific?" The defendant's objections to these questions were sustained. The plaintiff suffered no prejudice by reason of the rulings, however, because he was permitted, at a later stage of the trial, to testify relative to the subject-matter of the injury, and then testified that he did not know where the cars came from or "whether or not any of those cars on the last cut were from any other road besides the Southern Pacific." The other rulings of which complaint is made are so clearly correct that a discussion thereof is deemed unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RAY et al. (Cr. 1631.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 16, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑964, 1144(18)—Court's oral statement is not part of order granting new trial, and so does not affect presumption on appeal, where order is silent as to ground.

Any oral statement by the court, made at time of granting new trial, excluding insufficiency of the evidence as a ground for granting it, cannot be considered as part of the order, and so does not interfere with applicability of rule that, one of the grounds of the motion being insufficiency of the evidence, and the order granting it not specifying the grounds therefor, appellate court will presume that new trial was granted for insufficiency of the evidence.

2. Criminal law 🔑1158(1)—Exclusion by order of insufficiency of evidence as ground for new trial is not conclusive on appellate court, in absence of conflict in evidence.

Even where trial court by its order expressly excludes insufficiency of the evidence as ground for granting new trial, such action is conclusive on the appellate court only where there is a conflict in the evidence.

3. Criminal law 🔑406(1)—There must be prima facie proof of corpus delicti that extrajudicial admissions may be considered.

In absence of prima facie proof of the corpus delicti by other evidence, extrajudicial admissions of defendants should be excluded from consideration.

4. Embezzlement 🔑44(6)—Conviction of embezzlement held not sustained; there being no proof of fraudulent misappropriation.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of embezzlement for want of any proof of fraudulent misappropriation.

5. Embezzlement 🔑44(6)—Charge of embezzling money held not sustained by evidence merely of receipt of note.

Charge of embezzling money from a corporation held not sustained by evidence merely that defendants, its managing agents, authorized to sell memberships for it, but not shown to have authority to take notes therefor, sold one and took in payment a note payable to the buyer and executed by one of defendants and another, with no showing as to what they did with the note; its receipt not being converted into a receipt of money by the fact that no other representative of the corporation knew of the transaction, and so it took no action to repudiate or ratify it.

J. M. Ray and another, after conviction of embezzlement, were granted a new trial, and appeal is taken by the People. Affirmed.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the people from an order granting a new trial. The defendants were prosecuted upon an indictment in five counts, charging the following offenses: First, obtaining of $1,660, lawful money of the United States, from Mrs. E. A. Nulton by false pretenses; second, larceny of the same sum of money from Mrs. E. A. Nulton; third embezzlement of $1,660, lawful money of the United States, from the Welfare League of America, a corporation; fourth, embezzlement of $11,000 from the Welfare League of America; fifth, larceny of $11,000 from the Welfare League of America. At the conclusion of the prosecution's evidence, the court held that there was a variance between the pleading and the proof as to the first two counts, dismissed the indictment as to those two counts, and ordered them resubmitted to the grand jury. The defendants were convicted upon the third and fourth counts, and found not guilty upon the fifth count. Thereupon they made a motion for a new trial, which was granted as to both the third and fourth counts.

[1, 2] The motion for a new trial was not written, but oral, and appears from the record to have been made upon the following grounds: First, insufficiency of the evidence; second, errors of law occurring at the trial which prevented the defendants from having a fair trial; third, misconduct of the district attorney which prevented the defendants from having a fair trial. The minute entry of the order granting a new trial does not state the grounds upon which it was made, but appellant claims that the court, by its remarks, made at the time and set forth in the reporter's transcript, excluded insufficiency of the evidence as a ground of the order. We cannot so construe the statement of the court. It appears rather to be a declaration that there was sufficient proof of the corpus delicti to justify evidence of the admissions of the defendants and to warrant the submission of the case to the jury. But, even had the court orally made such a statement of the reasons for its action as appellant suggests, it could not be regarded as a part of the order; and this court, on finding that insufficiency of the evidence was one of the grounds of the motion and that the order granting it did not specify the grounds upon which it was made, must presume that the new trial was granted for insufficiency of the evidence. People v. Lum Yit, 83 Cal. 130, 23 P. 228; People v. Flood, 102 Cal. 330, 36 P. 663; People v. Dewar, 49 Cal. App. 263, 193 P. 156. In People v. Flood, supra, this rule was applied, although the Supreme Court had before it a written opinion of the trial court filed upon the granting of a new trial, which clearly showed that the new trial was granted because of an instruction which the trial court regarded as erroneous. Furthermore, even where the trial court has by its order expressly excluded insufficiency of the evidence as a ground for granting a new trial, its action in that respect is conclusive upon the appellate court only where there is a conflict in the evidence. It is therefore proper in this case for us to examine the evidence to ascertain whether its condition is such as to justify the order granting a new trial.

It appeared that the Welfare League of America was a corporation, and that it was engaged in operating on certain premises, known as the Palms Hotel, a home for aged persons. The defendants were members of the board of directors of this corporation, and were acting as its managing agents. In that capacity they disposed of a number of life memberships in the home above mentioned, receiving from the parties to whom the same were sold, except in the case of Mrs. Nulton, various sums of money, ranging from $1,000 to $1,500. It appeared without dispute from the testimony of Mrs. Nulton, mentioned in the first and second counts as the victim of the offenses therein charged, that defendants had not obtained from her any lawful money of the United States, as charged in the indictment, but that she had turned over to them in payment for her life membership a promissory note in her favor signed by the defendant Estella Ray and one C. Q. Ray in the principal sum of $1,500, upon which the total amount due at the time, including interest, was $1,660. It was for this variance between the indictment and the proof that the first two counts were dismissed.

[3, 4] The third and fourth counts charged two separate embezzlements from the Welfare League of America; and, while there was evidence that the defendants had received the promissory note above mentioned from Mrs. Nulton and considerable sums of money from other persons, for the account of said Welfare League of America, the evidence that the defendants had fraudulently misappropriated any of this property was not at all certain or satisfactory. The fraudulent misappropriation of the property is, of course, one of the essential elements of the crime of embezzlement. There was no showing of a demand for the property by or in behalf of the Welfare League or of any failure or refusal of the defendants to account therefor upon request. There was no showing as to what they did with the note received by them. The evidence as to their use of money received by them consisted entirely of their extrajudicial admissions contained in statements made by Estella Ray before the grand jury and to a grand jury accountant, and by J. M. Ray to the district attorney, and in written statements made by Estella Ray as to the financial condition of the home. In their statements the defendants claimed with considerable plausibility that all of the expenditures mentioned by them were made for the use and benefit of the Welfare League of America. As to some of the expenditures, this claim was unquestionably true, but the facts admitted would perhaps support a finding that other expenditures were made for the personal benefit of the defendants. The defendants objected to the introduction of these extrajudicial admissions in evidence when they were received, and at the close of the prosecution's case they moved to strike them out, basing the objection in both cases on the lack of any other proof of the corpus delicti, but the court ruled against them on each objection. "Proof of the corpus delicti should be made before the introduction of evidence of extrajudicial statements or admissions, and confessions. But, in the absence of any showing of prejudice, irregularity in the order of proof is of no consequence, if the commission of the crime is ultimately established independently of the alleged admissions of the defendant." 8 Cal. Jur. 234; People v. Quarez, 196 Cal. 404, 238 P. 363; People v. Watters (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 442. To authorize the reception in evidence of such extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions, or their consideration by the jury, it is not necessary that the other evidence of the corpus delicti prove it beyond a reasonable doubt; prima facie proof is sufficient for either purpose. 8 Cal. Jur. 235; People v. Selby, 198 Cal. 426, 245 P. 426. But "the extrajudicial statements or admissions of a defendant, in the absence of other evidence of the commission of the crime charged against him, are insufficient to establish his guilt; and they are equally insufficient to establish the existence of any substantive or essential elements of a crime charged against the defendant." People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 P. 384; People v. Quarez, 196 Cal. 404, 238 P. 363; People v. Villanueva, 74 Cal. App. 276, 240 P. 43. The ruling refusing to strike out the evidence of defendants' admissions constituted error of such importance as to require the granting of a new trial. Furthermore, excluding these admissions from consideration, as we must do in determining the sufficiency of the evidence on this point, we find there is no evidence to uphold the conviction on either the third or the fourth count, for want of any proof of a fraudulent misappropriation.

[5] The third count charged the defendants with embezzling $1,660 in lawful money of the United States from the Welfare League of America, and alleged that this was another statement of the offense alleged in the first count. We question whether the latter allegation can be correct, for it would seem that the offense of obtaining the money from Mrs. Nulton must necessarily have been completed before the defendants could embezzle the money so obtained from the Welfare League of America, for which it was obtained. But this allegation connects the offense charged in the third count with the transaction by which defendants delivered to Mrs. Nulton a life membership as above stated. Unless that transaction amounted to a receipt of money by the defendants, the evidence is insufficient to uphold the conviction on the third count for the reason that there is a failure of proof that the property embezzled was that described in the indictment. A material variance in the description of the property embezzled is fatal. 10 Cal. Jur. 262; 20 Cor. Jur. 478; People v. Meseros, 16 Cal. App. 277, 116 P. 679; People v. Nelson, 70 Cal. App. 476, 233 P. 406; Ex parte Cirro, 76 Cal. App. 142, 243 P. 888. The note received by the defendants was not money, and under the circumstances of the case cannot be treated as money. An agent whose authority is merely to sell property or to collect a debt has no authority to accept in payment a credit on, or a discharge of, his own personal indebtedness. If he does so, the principal may repudiate the transaction and enforce the liability of the other party as if no such transaction had been made; and, if the other party claims the existence of special authority for such a transaction, the burden is on him to prove it. 2 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 886; Stetson v. Briggs, 114 Cal. 511, 46 P. 603; Runyon v. Snell, 116 Ind. 164, 18 N. E. 522, 9 Am. St. Rep. 839; Stewart v. Woodward, 50 Vt. 78, 28 Am. Rep. 488; Wheeler v. Givan, 65 Mo. 89. While the defendants appear to have had authority to sell life memberships for the Welfare League of America, there is no showing at all that their authority was broad enough to cover the transaction with Mrs. Nulton. The Welfare League might therefore have repudiated the transaction if brought to its notice and enforced payment of the price from her in money; and, if it had taken this course, there could have been no ground for the claim that defendants had received any money in its behalf. It might also have ratified and adopted the transaction, but, if it had done so, it must have accepted the transaction as made and could not have claimed that the defendants had received for it money instead of the note. In that case its remedy to recover the money would have been a suit upon the note, and a failure to pay the note would not have been an embezzlement. In fact it does not appear that this transaction was ever made known to any of the officers or representatives of the Welfare League other than the defendants themselves; hence it had no opportunity to elect which course it would take, and it took no action. But these facts cannot convert the receipt of the note into a receipt of money and thus give the transaction an aspect which the Welfare League could not possibly have given to it.

The foregoing reasons are sufficient to uphold the action of the trial court. There are other matters argued, and some of the other rulings complained of by defendants may have been erroneous, but there seems no probability that they will occur again upon a new trial, and it is therefore not necessary to consider them.

The order is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑419(1)—Notice of appeal, stating appeal was taken from judgment of nonsuit, notwithstanding reference to formal judgment in final words, held to sufficiently refer to judgment.

Where plaintiff, in notice of appeal, stated that he appealed from judgment of nonsuit heretofore rendered, and final words of notice referred to formal judgment, held that, since liberal construction should be placed upon notice in order that right to have review might be preserved, final words of notice referring to formal judgment could be regarded as surplusage.

2. Appeal and error 🔑419(1)—Identification of judgment appealed from in notice of appeal must be made with reasonable certainty.

Identification of judgment appealed from in notice of appeal must be made with reasonable certainty.

3. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Under unconditional promise to pay sum equal to 5 per cent. commission on total sale, salesman who had performed was entitled to whole commission, notwithstanding project was abandoned.

In action for commissions under contract, in which promoter unconditionally promised sum equal to 5 per cent. commission on total sale of each apartment, providing that salesman received 1 per cent. of commission when sale was accepted and 4 per cent. when contract to erect apartments was let, where project was abandoned by promoter because he was unable to finance it, held that, project having been abandoned, salesman, having waited reasonable length of time, had right to demand sum earned as commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Lucian E. Wallace against David B. Carlin for services. From a judgment of nonsuit, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Walter W. Hoye, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carl E. Cameron, of Long Beach, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff seeks to recover a sum alleged to have been earned as a salesman for defendant. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant presented a motion for nonsuit, which was taken under advisement and on a later date, December 18, 1925, granted by the court. An entry of the order granting the motion was made upon the minutes of the court. On January 5, 1926, a judgment was signed by the trial judge and caused to be filed, in which the following appears:

> "Whereupon, upon motion of said counsel, said court take said motion under advisement, and thereafter and upon the 18th day of December, 1925, said court decided to and did grant such motion for nonsuit, and there was caused to be entered in the minutes of said court a minute order granting judgment for defendant on defendant's motion of nonsuit thereon: Now therefore, pursuant to law and the premises, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that a judgment of nonsuit be and the same is hereby entered in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff, on the ground that upon said trial the plaintiff has failed to prove sufficient facts to constitute a course of action in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant. It is hereby further ordered and adjudged that defendant have and recover against plaintiff its costs of suit herein, taxed at $———."

A motion for new trial was made within due time and denied. On February 25, 1926, plaintiff filed the following notice of appeal:

> "Notice is hereby given that Lucian E. Wallace, plaintiff in the above-entitled cause, intends to appeal, and does hereby appeal, to the District Court of Appeal of the state of California, from the judgment of nonsuit heretofore rendered in said cause in favor of defendant and against plaintiff, by the Honorable John L. Fleming, judge of said court; which said judgment was formally entered of record in said court under date of January 5, 1926."

[1, 2] Defendant asks us to dismiss the appeal, claiming that it was taken from the formal judgment entered on January 5, 1926, and that no appeal was taken from the judgment of nonsuit entered in the minutes on December 18, 1925. The order granting the motion for a nonsuit was a final judgment and as such was "effective for all purposes." Section 581, Code Civ. Proc. If, therefore, there is no appeal before us from the order of December 18, 1925, there is presented only a moot question. Burks v. Bronson, 58 Cal. App. 143, 207 P. 1018. We are of the opinion, however, that plaintiff has in fact appealed from the judgment of nonsuit entered on December 18, 1925. Although it is necessary for the appealing party to specify the judgment or order from which he wishes to appeal, a liberal construction should be placed upon the notice in order that his rights to have a review of the proceedings may be preserved. The identification of the judgment appealed from must be made with reasonable certainty. 2 Cal. Jur. 315; Hopkins v. Sanderson, 29 Cal. App. 666, 159 P. 1063. In his notice, plaintiff states that he appeals "from the judgment of nonsuit heretofore rendered in said cause." In Burks v. Bronson, supra, the court referred to an order granting a motion for nonsuit as "the judgment of nonsuit." It is therefore apparent that plaintiff did in fact appeal from the order of December 18, 1925. It was manifestly his intention to appeal from the judgment which terminated his action, and he has in fact specifically referred to that judgment. The final words of the notice in which plaintiff refers to the formal judgment may be regarded as surplusage.

[3] Defendant was contemplating the erection of a building to be known as the "Ambassador Apartments," and which was to be operated on what is commonly called the "own-your-own apartment" plan. He employed plaintiff to sell apartments in the proposed building; the contract between the parties being in writing and containing, among others, the following provisions:

> "Party of the first part agrees to employ party of the second part as a salesman for the sale of apartments in the proposed Ambassador Apartments and agrees to pay him for such services a sum equal to a five per cent. commission on the total sale of each apartment. Said commission to be paid to party of the second part in the following manner: One per cent. (1) shall be paid when the sale is accepted and the contract signed, the balance of four per cent. (4) shall be paid when the contract to erect the Ambassador Apartments is let. All payments for commissions shall be paid through the selling agents, the Davidson Investment Company. Party of the second part in consideration of the commission of five per cent. (5) to be paid by the party of the first part as stated above agrees to devote his entire time to the sale of apartments in the Ambassador Apartments and to use his best efforts in closing the sale of apartments."

It is established by plaintiff's evidence that he sold apartments for the total sum of $41,342.50. Defendant paid plaintiff a sum equal to 1 per cent. of the total selling price. The project for the erection of the Ambassador Apartments was abandoned by defendant for the reason that he was unable to finance it. Plaintiff commenced the action to recover the remaining 4 per cent. due him as commission more than a year after the last sale was made by him and after the project had been abandoned by defendant.

In the contract of employment defendant made an unconditional promise to pay "a sum equal to a 5 per cent. commission on the total sale of each apartment." The remaining portion of the contract fixes the time when the commission shall be paid, 1 per cent. to be paid upon the signing of the contract for the sale of the apartment and the balance upon the letting of the contract for the erection of the building. The agreement does not provide that the plaintiff should be paid his commission if the contract for the erection of the building should be let or if the project should not be abandoned. Defendant cannot, by abandoning the project, deprive plaintiff of his right to demand commissions which had been earned. The agreement is silent as to the time for the letting of the contract for the erection of the building. In such a case the law fixes the period as a reasonable length of time. The project having been abandoned and the plaintiff having waited a reasonable length of time, he now has the right to demand the sum earned as commissions. In Taylor v. Simi Construction Co., 23 Cal. App. 308, 137 P. 1095, plaintiff sued upon a contract which provided that the payment should "be made within three days after water is turned on the first twenty-five or more acres of land," etc. The court said:

> "The defendant, having agreed to make payment within a stated time after the happening of an event, could not by refusing to permit that event to occur escape liability upon its contract."

In Rosenheim v. Howze, 179 Cal. 309, 176 P. 456, an architect was suing for a fee on a contract in which it was provided:

> "I will further agree to make no demand for payment on account of my own services until you have succeeded in negotiating a loan."

In affirming a judgment for plaintiff the court said:

> "Mr. Howze could not, therefore, by abandoning the contract, defeat recovery by the plaintiff, who had fully performed his part. If he did not negotiate a loan, the indebtedness became payable within a reasonable time. Nunez v. Dautel, 19 Wall. 560, 22 L. Ed. 161; Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554; Greenstreet v. Cheatum, 99 Kan. 290, 161 P. 596; Randall v. Johnson, 59 Miss. 317, 42 Am. Rep. 365; Doe v. Thompson, 22 N. H. 217; Sears v. Wright, 24 Me. 278."

The judgment is reversed.

BUCKNER v. A. LEON & CO. (Sac. 4010.)

Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1928.

1. Evidence ⚷442(1)—Separate oral agreement as to matters not referred to in written instrument and not inconsistent therewith is admissible.

Where parties have not incorporated into written agreement all the terms of their contract, evidence is admissible to prove the existence of a separate oral agreement as to matter not mentioned in the written instrument and which is not inconsistent with its terms.

2. Customs and usages ⚷13—Persons carrying on trade are deemed to have contracted with reference to known usage.

Where there is a known usage of the trade, persons carrying on that trade are deemed to have contracted with reference to the usage, unless the contrary appears.

3. Customs and usages ⚷15(1)—Known usage, which does not alter or vary contract's terms, is admissible to supply deficiency in construing contract.

Known usage forms a part of contract, and evidence of usage is admissible to supply deficiency therein as means of interpretation, where it does not alter or vary contract's terms.

4. Customs and usages ⚷16—Evidence ⚷441(9)—Separate oral agreement and custom conforming thereto whereby buyer of grapes was to furnish lug boxes at seller's ranch held admissible, notwithstanding written contract which called for seller's delivery f. o. b.

Evidence of separate oral agreement whereby one buying grapes, to be delivered by seller f. o. b. a shipping point near seller's vineyard, was to furnish lug boxes for the grapes at seller's ranch, and evidence of prevailing custom to that effect in the county where the transaction took place, held admissible as collateral, contemporaneous oral agreement, since furnishing of lug boxes was mere preliminary act not inconsistent with written sales contract requiring delivery f. o. b.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Action by A. B. Buckner against A. Leon & Co. for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John G. Covert, of Hanford, and Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

Clark Clement, of Lemoore, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages because of failure of defendant buyer to accept full delivery under a written contract between the parties for the sale and purchase of green grapes.

Said contract provided that the grapes were to be delivered f. o. b. a shipping point near plaintiff's vineyard. At the same time the parties also agreed orally, as alleged, proved, and found by the court, that defendant would furnish lug boxes for said grapes at plaintiff's ranch in accordance with the prevailing custom of the county where the transaction took place, and defendant did, in fact, furnish many such boxes, but not in sufficient numbers to permit of delivery of the total tonnage contracted for; hence plaintiff was obliged to make other disposition, at a loss, of the undelivered balance of said grapes for which no boxes were furnished. The trial court gave judgment in his favor for the contract price of said undelivered grapes, less the amount received by him from sale thereof, and certain costs. Defendant has appealed.

[1-3] It has long been the rule that, when parties have not incorporated into an instrument all of the terms of their contract, evidence is admissible to prove the existence of a separate oral agreement as to any matter on which the document is silent and which is not inconsistent with its terms. Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 521, 32 P. 571; Torrey v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 313, 317, 318, 155 P. 820; Greathouse v. Daleno, 57 Cal. App. 187, 190, 206 P. 1019; Mitchell v. North Pacific, etc., Co., 60 Cal. App. 554, 558, 213 P. 293. And likewise:

> "It is the general rule that, when there is a known usage of the trade, persons carrying on that trade are deemed to have contracted in reference to the usage, unless the contrary appears; that the usage forms a part of the contract, and that evidence of usage is always admissible to supply a deficiency or as a means of interpretation where it does not alter or vary the terms of the contract." Hind v. Oriental Products Co., Inc., 195 Cal. 655, 667, 235 P. 438, 443.

See, also, cases therein cited, and Civ. Code, §§ 1646, 1647, 1655, 1656.

But it is appellant's contention that the contract was not silent on the matter here in question, but, on the contrary, by use of the term "f. o. b." it expressly relieved the buyer from any obligation to furnish lug boxes under said contemporaneous oral agreement. In other words, appellant contends that, in the face of the written contract to deliver grapes f. o. b. a specified shipping point, plaintiff was not entitled to prove an oral agreement or custom in conflict therewith, to wit, an oral agreement imposing upon appellant the duty assumed by plaintiff under the term "f. o. b." of boxing the grapes.

[4] Said term, as defined by various cases (Whitaker v. Dunlap Morgan Co., 44 Cal.

App. 140, 144, 186 P. 181; Acton Rock Co. v. Lone Pine Co., 44 Cal. App. 597, 601, 186 P. 809; 22 Cal. Jur. 938), implies no obligation on the part of a seller to furnish lug boxes prior to hauling, loading, or transportation to a shipping point of a commodity of this character, when interpreted in accordance with the prevailing custom in the place where the transaction took place. The furnishing of the lug boxes was a preliminary act to be performed prior to assumption of the transportation obligations within the common import of said term; that is, the furnishing of boxes was a matter not contemplated by use of the term concerning which the contract was silent, and as to which evidence of a collateral, contemporaneous, oral agreement conforming to custom was properly received. This is the only practical construction of the contract and appellant must have so understood it, for he did, in fact and without objection, furnish upon the 17 different dates, covering a large portion of the contract period, boxes in sufficient numbers to care for at least half of the grapes contracted for. Under such circumstances, it cannot be denied that he understood and concurred in the agreement here contended for by plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

TOBIN GROCERY CO. v. SPRY et al.

(Sac. 4040.)

1. Principal and agent ⚷69(2)—Employee, buying and selling cattle with employer's money, must account for moneys, together with profits, without reduction for losses (Civ. Code, § 2237).

Employee, buying and selling cattle on his own account, paying therefor with money of employer, held, under Civ. Code, § 2237, required to account for money, together with profits made, without reduction for losses, as dealing with trust funds.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1039(2)—Judgment for plaintiff suing for conversion will not be reversed because of failure of complaint to specifically charge making of profits with converted money.

Where complaint in action to recover money wrongfully converted contained general charge of conversion of money for use of defendants and prayer for general relief, judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed for failure to definitely and specifically charge making of profits with converted money, in absence of showing that prejudice resulted from error of attorney drawing pleading.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1039(1)—Judgment will not be reversed for errors in pleadings, where substantial justice has been done.

Supreme Court, on appeal, is bound to take account of equities of case as between parties, and not to reverse a judgment for errors in pleadings, where substantial justice had been done by judgment rendered.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by the Tobin Grocery Company against Frank Spry and another. Judgment for plaintiff against named defendant, and such defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 255 P. 791.

Samuel V. Cornell, of Turlock, for appellant.

Wm. N. Graybiel, of Turlock, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Frank Spry from a judgment against him for $571.50 in an action brought to recover money wrongfully converted to the use of defendants.

The plaintiff, a copartnership, employed the defendants as manager and clerk, respectively, in its Turlock branch. The complaint charged that the defendants, while so employed, "wrongfully and without the assent of said plaintiff, conspired together to apply some of the money or receipts and profits of said business * * * to their own use. * * *" It is alleged that said money, receipts, and profits were applied to the joint use and benefit of defendants, and by reason of this fact they became indebted to plaintiff; that plaintiff has repeatedly requested an accounting from defendants, which has been refused. It is prayed that the defendants and each of them be required to account for the profits and moneys belonging to said plaintiff which said defendants have misappropriated to their own use and benefit, and that judgment be given plaintiff for the amount found due and for general relief. The answer admitted that the defendant Emma Spry was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $12.50; being the amount of a profit made by her in the course of her employment, and alleged that defendant Frank Spry had mingled certain moneys of his own with money belonging to the plaintiff, and that he thereupon drew upon such commingled fund for use in a private enterprise not connected with his employment, and also alleged that said defendant had accounted for and paid to the plaintiff all money due to it by him, and that said defendant was not indebted to said plaintiff.

The court found:

"That said defendant Frank Spry, while in the employ of said plaintiff, did buy merchandise and resell it to plaintiff at a profit, said merchandise being the same kind of merchandise as said defendant was employed to buy and sell for the sole use and benefit of said plaintiff, and said Frank Spry also, while in the employ of said plaintiff as aforesaid mentioned, took money > from the business of said plaintiff, said money being at the time the money of said plaintiff, and said Frank Spry used said money for his own use and benefit, and he has failed, refused, and neglected to return said money or any part to said plaintiff; that the amount of profits made as aforesaid and moneys taken from said plaintiff by said defendant Frank Spry was and is the sum of $571.50."

It appears from the testimony of the appellant that at the time he undertook the management of the plaintiff's store he expected to purchase an interest in the business, and for that purpose paid $500 to the plaintiff; that shortly thereafter he concluded he did not wish to own an interest in the business, and told his employer of this decision. Apparently no objection was made by the employer, and Mr. Tobin asked Mr. Spry what was to be done about the $500. Spry replied that the money might be left in the business, and when he wanted it he would get it. Spry also testified that he later drew this money out by check; so it is not involved in the problems presented upon the appeal.

[1] It is admitted by the appellant that during the period of his employment he bought and sold cattle on his own account, paying for the cattle with the money of the plaintiff. On some of these transactions he made a profit and on others a loss. Appellant contends that, as the net result of the cattle ventures was a loss, he is to be charged only with the amount of money which he used of the plaintiff's funds, together with interest. In other words, his position is that he may not be charged with the profits made with the trust fund unless the plaintiff will bear a share of the losses. The respondent contends, however, and the judgment of the trial court was based upon this position, that, as the appellant dealt with trust funds, he was liable to account for all profits made therewith, with no reduction for losses which he may have sustained. This would appear to be the proper interpretation of section 2237, Civil Code. In the case of Oakland Bank of Savings v. Wilcox, 60 Cal. 141, it was said:

> "An officer of a bank could not make profit to himself out of loans made by him of the money of the bank; and it very naturally follows, if losses occur in the attempt he must bear the losses."

In the case of Walls v. Walker, 37 Cal. 424, 99 Am. Dec. 290, it was said:

> "If he [an administrator] makes a profit, he becomes liable for that also at the election of the parties in interest. * * * If, in this case, the administrator sustained a loss, the loss is his. * * *"

In Estate of Piercy, 168 Cal. 755, 145 P. 91, it was said:

> "If any loss occurs, the loss must be borne by him [trustee], while the beneficiaries are entitled to any profits realized."

The losses would not be borne by a trustee if he were entitled to set them off against profits realized from property of his cestui que trust.

The foregoing discussion involves the main point upon appeal, because, if the rule adopted by the trial court with reference to the profits and losses upon the cattle transactions be the correct one, the judgment is amply supported. The evidence was susceptible of the inference that appellant had made profits in these transactions amounting to $477.50. Appellant admits liability upon two other items—one for $17.45, paid by plaintiff as freight upon merchandise of defendant, and the other an admitted profit of $12.50 upon sugar sold to the plaintiff by defendant, but which profit the evidence would indicate was really of a much larger amount. The evidence also admits of the conclusion that there was a misappropriation of $100 in connection with the check drawn by appellant in favor of the Sperry Flour Company, which appeared upon his books as $137.50, but which was shown to have been in fact for but $37.50.

It is true that the proof was somewhat uncertain and inferential in some particulars, which was due to the fact that the defendants could not or would not testify definitely as to matters wholly within their knowledge, and the trial judge seems to have given defendants the benefit of the doubt with reference to many matters disclosed by the record.

[2, 3] It is also contended by the appellant that the findings were beyond the issues made by the pleadings. The foregoing quotation from the complaint shows its inadequacy to meet the facts relied upon in this case. Certainly it should have definitely and specifically charged the making of profits with the converted money if recovery of such profits was sought. While we are not disposed to encourage attorneys in violating logical and fundamental rules of pleading, we are also bound to take account of the equities of the case as between the parties, and not to reverse a judgment for errors in pleadings where substantial justice has been done by the judgment rendered. This is an equitable proceeding; the equities are all with the plaintiff. A general charge of conversion of money to the use of defendants was made in the complaint, and general relief was asked. It does not seem that any prejudice has resulted to defendants from the error of the attorney in drawing his pleading. The record discloses the utmost bad faith on the part of defendants, to say the least, and justice has been done by the judgment.

BOGGS v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.
(S. F. 12911.)

1. Statutes ⚷35½—Duties of county clerk or registrar of voters respecting referendum petition are ministerial, and he may not go beyond face of petition or resort to extraneous evidence (Const. art. 4, § 1).

When referendum petition regular in form and substance has been filed and county clerk or registrar of voters has determined from records what number of qualified electors has signed it and has attached his certificate thereto showing result of examination, and has transmitted petition and certificate to secretary of state, his duties under Const. art. 4, § 1, have been fulfilled, and he has no authority to go beyond the face of the petition or to resort to extraneous evidence to determine contents thereof, his duties being ministerial.

2. Mandamus ⚷172—Clerk or registrar having determined sufficiency of referendum petition, fact that others than signers affixed dates of signatures may not be inquired into in mandamus proceeding against secretary of state (Pol. Code, § 1083a; Const. art. 4, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

If county clerk or registrar of voters is justified in rejecting names of persons who signed referendum petition without affixing dates of signing as required by Pol. Code, § 1083a, and Const. art. 4, § 1, when dates of signing are actually affixed and clerk or registrar has determined that signatures are those of qualified electors and has so certified to secretary of state, whether persons other than signers affixed said dates may not be inquired into in mandamus proceeding against secretary of state under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, in absence of any allegations of fraud or misconduct on part of county clerks or registrars.

3. Statutes ⚷35½—Duty of secretary of state in submitting referendum petition to electors is ministerial and mandatory (Const. art. 4, § 1).

Under Const. art. 4, § 1, when secretary of state receives certificates of county clerks and registrars of voters showing that sufficient referendum petition has been filed and that requisite number of qualified electors has signed petition within time prescribed by law, it is his duty to submit act named in petition to electors of state for their approval or rejection, and his duty in doing this is ministerial and mandatory.

4. Statutes ⚷35½—Contention that constitutional requirement of referendum related only to reapportionment by commission and not by Legislature held without merit (Const. art. 4, § 6, as amended in 1926).

Contention that Const. art. 4, § 6, as amended in 1926, providing that if Legislature fails to reapportion state as required thereby a reapportionment commission shall reapportion assembly and senatorial districts, subject to same provisions of referendum as apply to acts of Legislature, made referendum provision applicable only to reapportionment by commission and not by Legislature, held without merit.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Frank S. Boggs, to be directed to Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, to compel him to disregard certain referendum proceedings for submission to the people of the act of the Legislature (St. 1927, p. 1757), providing for reapportionment. Writ denied.

J. M. Inman and P. G. West, both of Sacramento, and Edson Abel, of San Francisco (Frank L. Coombs and Nathan F. Coombs, both of Napa, amici curiæ), for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen. (Henry E. Carter, Harry Lyons, J. W. McKinley, and Frank Weller, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ), for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, secretary of state, to disregard and take no further action with reference to certain referendum certificates heretofore filed in his office and to notify the county clerks and registrars of voters throughout the state of the offices of members of the Legislature to be nominated at the primary election to be held in August, 1928, in their respective counties and city and county, such notification to be in accordance with the provisions of the reapportionment measure adopted by the Legislature in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1757).

As a return to the alternative writ the respondent filed a general demurrer and at the same time an answer denying, for want of information or belief, the allegations of the petition which form the basis of the petitioner's alleged cause of action.

Prior to November 2, 1926, and since the adoption of the Constitution in 1879, section 6 of article 4 thereof provided, among other things, for the division of the state into senatorial and assembly districts in such manner that the 40 senatorial districts and the 80 assembly districts should be "as nearly equal in population as may be." It was also provided that the Legislature, at its first session after each federal census, should adjust such districts and reapportion the representation so as to preserve them "as nearly equal in population as may be" in accordance with the last census. With substantial regularity the Legislature complied with the constitutional mandate up to and following the federal census of 1910. The last action of the Legislature, however, prior to 1927, was the amendment of sections 78 and 90 of the Political Code at its special session in 1911. Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 140. No action was taken by the Legislature with reference to reapportionment following the federal census of 1920 until the passage of the act of 1927 above referred to, which act was adopted pursuant to the provisions of section 6 of article 4 of the Constitution as amended at the general election on November 2, 1926. This amendment effected a radical departure from the former plan, especially with reference to representation in the Senate. It was provided by the amendment that the representation in the assembly should continue by the formation of districts "as nearly equal in population as may be," but with reference to representation in the Senate it was provided that the senatorial districts should continue to be 40 in number, but that in the formation of such districts no county or city and county should be divided. The effect of this amendment is that while a senatorial district may embrace more than one county, no county or city and county may embrace more than one senatorial district.

Pursuant to the requirements of the constitutional amendment the Legislature at its session in 1927 adopted said reapportionment measure by amending section 78 and by repealing section 90 of the Political Code. By section 78 as amended the assembly districts in the state were in some instances changed and renumbered and the senatorial districts were readjusted and in some instances renumbered in conformity with the requirements of the constitutional amendment.

The Reapportionment Act of 1927, which was known as Senate Bill No. 490, was scheduled to become effective on July 31, 1927, and did take effect on that date unless the same was suspended by the referendum proceedings alleged in the petition herein. The petition sets forth that on June 27, 1927, there were filed with the registrars of voters of the county of Los Angeles and of the city and county of San Francisco and with the county clerk of the county of Alameda, and on July 14, 1927, with the county clerk of the county of Santa Clara, "certain identical original referendum petitions addressed to the secretary of state of the state of California, asking that there be submitted to the electors of the state of California for their approval or rejection said act of the Legislature of the state of California, known as Senate Bill No. 490." It is further alleged:

> "That said registrars of voters and said county clerks within 20 days after said filing transmitted said petitions, except the signatures thereto appended, to the respondent, attaching thereto their respective certificates as to the date of the filing of said petitions, the number of sections comprising it, and further certifying that each of said sections contained signatures and dates purporting to be, respectively, the signatures of qualified electors of the respective counties and the dates upon which such electors had, respectively, signed said petition. That attached to said petition at the time of its filing was an affidavit purporting to be the affidavit of the person who solicited the signatures thereof. That the person by whom said affidavit purported to have been taken and verified was at the time thereof an officer authorized to administer oaths. That in said affidavit the affiant stated his own qualifications, that he had solicited the signatures upon said section, that all of said signatures were made in his presence, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief each signature was the genuine signature of the person whose name it purported to be. Said certificates further attested that the certifying officers, after said petitions had been filed with them, had examined the affidavits of registration in their respective counties, and the records relating thereto, current and in effect at the respective purported dates of each signing, to determine therefrom what number of qualified electors had signed said petitions, and had respectively affixed thereto the purported dates of their signing, and from said examination it was determined that said petitions were signed by a specific number of qualified electors of their respective counties or city and county, each of whom had affixed to said petition a date purporting to be the date when such elector had signed said petition, and each of whom was a registered, qualified elector of the respective counties and city and county on said date. That the total number of qualified electors certified to have signed said original referendum petitions by said registrars of voters and said county clerks was 904. That thereafter, to wit, on the 18th, 23d, and 25th days of July, 1927, respectively, there were filed with the registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco, with the registrar of voters of the county of Los Angeles, and with the county clerk of the county of Alameda, certain supplemental petitions identical with each other and with said original petitions in wording, content, and all other respects except as to the purported signatures attached thereto, and bearing the purported signatures of other qualified electors of the respective counties. That thereafter and within ten days after said filing and within the time allowed by law, said registrars of voters and said county clerk transmitted to and filed with the respondent said supplemental petitions, except the signatures thereto appended, attaching thereto their respective certificates of a form and tenor identical in all material respects with the certificates attached by them to said original referendum petitions except as to the number of qualified electors certified to have signed said petitions. That the total number of qualified electors certified to have signed said supplemental referendum petitions by said registrars of voters and said county clerk was 76,521."

It is further alleged:

> "That the total number of qualified electors of the state of California certified to the respondent within the time allowed by law by the various registrars of voters and county clerks to have signed said original and said supplemental referendum petitions was 77,425."

It is also alleged that the total number of votes cast for all candidates for Governor at the last preceding general election at which a Governor was elected is 1,144,112, and that the total number of genuine signatures required to be affixed to said petition in a lawful manner in order to subject said act to referendum is 57,206. From the foregoing allegations of the petition it appears that all of the steps necessary to subject the said act to a referendum have been regularly taken, and said act has not become a law by reason of said referendum proceedings unless the allegations of paragraph VII of the petition may now be inquired into, and, the truth thereof having been established on a hearing either before this court or before a referee, the said referendum proceedings be declared a nullity.

In said paragraph VII of the petition it is alleged in subdivision (a) thereof that:

> "In the case of not less than 25,000 purported signatures the purported signers of said petitions failed, neglected or refused to affix to the section of said petitions purporting to have been signed by them the date of such signing, and dates purporting to be the dates on which such signers signed their respective sections of said petition were unlawfully and in fraud and deception of said county clerks and said registrars of voters with whom said petitions were originally filed, inserted and forged to said sections by persons other than the respective signers but unknown to this petitioner."

It is further alleged in subdivision (b) of said paragraph that in the case of not less than 5,000 of such signatures the signers thereof failed, neglected, or refused to affix to the section of said petition signed by them the date of such signing, and in subdivision (c) of said paragraph it is alleged that in the case of not less than 5,000 of such signatures there was not attached to any of the sections of said petitions bearing such signatures any affidavit by the person purporting to have solicited the signatures to the same to the effect that the signatures to said sections were made in the presence of the solicitor.

It is further alleged in said petition that notwithstanding the alleged illegal, false, fictitious, and fraudulent character of said signatures and their respective dates, the said registrars of voters and said county clerks included in their enumeration of the number of qualified electors of their respective counties and city and county, and in fraud of the respondent herein certified to said respondent the aforesaid signatures as good and sufficient signatures attached to said petitions. It is then alleged that the actual number of qualified electors whose signatures are appended to said petition is not in excess of 50,000. Further, that demand has been made upon the respondent to disregard said referendum certificates and that the respondent has refused to comply with such demand, and unless compelled by this court to the contrary will notify the registrars and county clerks of the state in accordance with the law in effect prior to January 1, 1927, and will submit said act to the electors of the state for their approval or rejection at the next general election.

It is readily apparent that if the 5,000 signatures referred to in subdivision (b) of said paragraph VII of the petition and the 5,000 signatures referred to in subdivision (c) of said paragraph had been subject to proper rejection or had even been rejected arbitrarily, the said referendum petitions would have had more than the sufficient number of signatures, for there would still have been 67,425 good signatures appended to said petitions if the 25,000 names mentioned in subdivision (a) of paragraph VII of the petition were properly included. So that the vital point in the consideration of the petition herein is whether the allegations of said subdivision (a) state a cause of action against this respondent. In brief, it is alleged therein that in the case of not less than 25,000 of said signatures the signers did not affix to said petition the date of their signatures and that such dates were affixed thereto by persons other than the respective signers and that such dates were so affixed unlawfully and in fraud and deception of said county clerks and said registrars of voters. It thus appears from the pleading, by necessary inference, that dates were affixed to each of said 25,000 signatures, and it is not alleged that the dates so affixed do not represent the true dates of such signatures, but only that the said dates were so affixed by persons other than the signers and without the latter's authority.

The petition herein contains no sufficient allegations of fraud or misconduct on the part of the said county clerks or registrars of voters. It is not alleged that they or either or any of them inserted the dates opposite said names or knew anything about the time or manner of the insertion of said dates or by whom the same were affixed. It is also to be observed that no fraud or misconduct or dereliction of duty is charged against the respondent, secretary of state. From the allegations of the petition the conclusion is compelled that said referendum petitions came into the hands of said county clerks and registrars of voters regular in form. The substance of the allegations of fraud respecting said dates, therefore, is that the dates were affixed by persons unknown and other than by the signers themselves, and that this worked a fraud and deception on said county clerks and said registrars of voters and on the respondent, secretary of state. In other words, the petitioner's complaint is that, because the dates affixed to not less than 25,000 signatures to said referendum petition were affixed by persons unknown, and not by the signers, it is the official duty of the respondent, secretary of state, to disregard the certificates now in his hands and to proceed in accordance with said enactment notwithstanding the said referendum proceedings. The claim is based on the provisions of section 1083a of the Political Code as amended in 1915. This section of the Code was intended to supplement the constitutional regulations governing the circulation, filing, and examination of initiative, referendum, and recall petitions. It prescribes the qualifications of those entitled to sign such petitions by providing that only those who are registered qualified electors at the time of signing any such petition shall be entitled to sign the same. It also provides that whenever, by the Constitution or laws of this state, the county clerk or registrar of voters is required to determine from the records of registration what number of qualified electors has signed such a petition, he shall determine the fact with respect to the purported signature of any person from the affidavit of registration and the records relating thereto. As a statutory duty imposed on each signer the section provides as follows:

> "Such signer shall at the time of so signing such petition or paper affix thereto the date of such signing."

It is the alleged violation of the foregoing quoted requirement of the statute that forms the sole basis for the cause of action of the petitioner as to the said 25,000 signatures. It does not appear and it is not claimed that the dates to said signatures were not affixed thereto nor that said dates were not so affixed at the time the signatures were appended. The alleged violation, therefore, consists in that "such signer" did not affix the date at the time, but that the said date was affixed by some person other than the signer and unlawfully.

It is insisted by the petitioner that the provision of section 1083a of the Political Code relied upon is a valid regulation. This is not disputed by the respondent and need not now be questioned. Chester v. Hall, 55 Cal. App. 611, 616, 204 P. 237. And the requirement of affixing the dates to the signatures has been held to be mandatory to the extent that a failure to comply therewith is justification for the refusal of the proper officer to certify as sufficient the names of signers as to whose signatures the dates of "such signing" were not affixed. Chambers v. Glenn-Colusa Irr. Dist., 57 Cal. App. 155, 206 P. 773.

[1] It is the duty of the county clerk or the registrar of voters under the Constitution to examine the petition filed in his office and to "determine from the records of registration what number of qualified electors has signed the same." Const. § 1, art. 4. It may be assumed that it is also his duty to see that the petition filed with him meets the requirements of the Constitution and of section 1083a of the Political Code. But when, as in the case at bar, a petition has been filed in his office which is regular in form and substance and appears on its face to be in conformity with the law, and he has examined the same and has determined from the records of registration what number of qualified electors has signed the same, and has made and attached to the petition his certificate showing the result of his examination, and has transmitted the petition and his certificate to the secretary of state, his duties in the premises have been fulfilled. His duties are ministerial, and he has no authority to go beyond the face of the petition or to resort to extraneous evidence to determine the contents of the petition. Wright v. Engram, 186 Cal. 659, 201 P. 788; Williams v. Gill, 65 Cal. App. 132, 223 P. 559; Ratto v. Board of Trustees, 75 Cal. App. 724, 243 P. 466.

The constitutional duties of the clerk or registrar with reference to the petition here involved are set forth in section 1 of article 4, as follows:

> "Within twenty days after the filing of such petition in his office the said clerk, or registrar of voters, shall determine from the records of registration what number of qualified electors have signed the same. * * * The said clerk or registrar, upon the completion of such examination, shall forthwith attach to said petition, except the signatures thereto appended, his certificate, properly dated, showing the result of said examination and shall forthwith transmit said petition, together with his said certificate, to the secretary of state and also file a copy of said certificate in his office."

[2] Provision is then made in said section of the Constitution for the filing of a supplemental petition, and the same duties are enjoined on the clerk or registrar as are provided in the case of the original petition, except that his examination and certificate as to the supplemental petition must be made within ten days after the supplemental petition is filed in his office. In addition to the duties provided by the Constitution, said section 1083a of the Political Code enjoins upon the clerk or registrar the duty to determine the fact with respect to the purported signatures of any person "from the affidavit of registration, and records relating thereto, current and in effect at the date of such signing of such petition or paper." It appears from the petition herein that the clerks or registrars of the four counties in question have performed all of their duties in the premises, both constitutional and statutory. It must be noted that the duty of appending the dates of the signatures is not enjoined upon the clerk or registrar, but is enjoined on the signers of the petition. "The manifest purpose of the law requiring the signers to affix the date of signing is to guard against signatures by persons who are not qualified electors at the time of signing." Chester v. Hall, supra. Assuming that the clerk or registrar would be justified in rejecting the names of all persons as to whose signatures no dates of signing were affixed, it is clear that when, as here, dates of signing are actually affixed to the signatures of the 25,000 names in question, and the clerk or registrar has, upon an examination of said petition, determined that said 25,000 signatures were those of qualified electors entitled to sign the same, and has attached to said petition his certificate to that effect, and has transmitted said petition, except the signatures thereto attached, together with said certificate, to the secretary of state, the fact that some person or persons other than the signers affixed said dates may not be inquired into in a mandamus proceeding against the secretary of state.

A mandamus proceeding in this state is an independent proceeding, having for its purpose the compulsion of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station. Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc.; Sheehan v. Board of Police Com'rs, 188 Cal. 535, 206 P. 70; Perrin v. Honeycutt, 144 Cal. 87, 90, 77 P. 776.

[3] The duties of the secretary of state in the premises are prescribed by the Constitution. Const. § 1, art. 4. It is therein provided:

> "The second power reserved to the people shall be known as the referendum. No act passed by the Legislature shall go into effect until ninety days after the final adjournment of the session of the Legislature which passed such act [with certain exceptions hereinafter referred to]. * * * Upon the presentation to the secretary of state within ninety days after the final adjournment of the Legislature of a petition certified as herein provided, to have been signed by qualified electors equal in number to five per cent. of all the votes cast for all candidates for Governor at the last preceding general election at which a Governor was elected, asking that any act or section or part of any act of the Legislature be submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection, the secretary of state shall submit to the electors for their approval or rejection, such act, or section or part of such act, at the next succeeding general election. * * *"

The clause in the above-quoted constitutional provision, namely, "a petition certified as herein provided," refers to the certification by the county clerks or registrars of voters, as elsewhere provided in the same section of the Constitution, whereby it is made the duty of the county clerk or registrar, upon the completion of his examination of the said petition, forthwith to attach to the said petition, except the signatures thereto appended, his certificate showing the result of his examination. It thus appears that the secretary of state receives nothing from the county clerks or registrars of voters save and except a copy of the petition and a supplement thereto, if any, and the certificate showing the result of the examination thereof by the clerk or registrar, as the case may be. The papers bearing the signatures appended to the referendum petitions and the dates affixed thereto are not transmitted to him. Consequently he is presumed to know nothing, and it is of no concern to him in the discharge of his official duties, as to what names are signed to the original petitions, whether the signatures appended to the original petition were appended by persons who were qualified electors at the time the names were signed, whether each or any signer had added his place of residence, whether each or any signer had affixed to his signature the date of his signing, or whether the date affixed was appended by the signer or by some other person or persons. All of the matters enumerated are not within his province. They fall within the official cognizance of the clerks and registrars. When the secretary of state receives, as it here appears affirmatively and without question he has received, the certificates of county clerks and registrars of voters showing that a sufficient referendum petition has been filed and that the requisite number of qualified electors has signed said petition within the time prescribed by law, it becomes the constitutional duty of the secretary of state to submit the act named in the petition to the electors of the state for their approval or rejection. He is preparing to do this, and his duty in the premises is ministerial. When, upon his inspection of the certificates filed in his office, it is disclosed to him that a sufficient number of qualified electors has signed the referendum petition, then, upon the ascertainment of that fact, his duty is mandatory. See Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Commission, 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874.

The petitioner earnestly contends that because fraud is alleged on the part of signers of the petition the conclusiveness of the certificate should not apply. Assuming that equitable relief may be available to prevent the certification of a referendum petition containing forged signatures or otherwise fraudulently presented to the clerk or registrar of voters, it is enough to say that such is not the relief here sought. As was said in Wright v. Engram, supra, at page 660 (201 P. 788):

> "If it should happen that names were forged to the petition in sufficient number to reduce the lawful signatures to the petition below the statutory requirement, persons legally interested perhaps might have a remedy, the nature and character of which we need not here decide."

It is earnestly insisted by the petitioner that the respondent, secretary of state, occupies a position identical with that of the members of the various boards of trustees and city councils of the state who are charged by law with the calling of elections under referendum petitions and who have been subjected to judicial process to the end that the true facts be ascertained and appropriate action be taken, as disclosed by numerous cases cited by petitioner. It may be said that some similarity exists between the position of the local governing bodies charged with the duty of calling elections under referendum proceedings and the position of the secretary of state in submitting a statute subjected by proceedings in referendum to a vote of the people of the state at large. The similarity consists in this, that when the facts exist and the proceedings are regular the duty of each becomes mandatory. But their positions are not otherwise the same. The secretary of state is so far removed from the locus in quo and his duties in the premises are such as to render it imperative that all questions of alleged irregularity in the signatures appended to the referendum petitions, concerning which the secretary of state has no official cognizance, should be raised and tried out before the certificates reach his office. Those charged with fraud or irregularity may then be made parties to the proceeding and the ends of justice be accomplished. It may readily be seen what confusion would result if the secretary of state should be charged with or take upon himself the duty of supervising the duties of the clerks and registrars in the checking of such petitions. His activities in that respect might be state-wide and be entirely beyond his power to compete with the resources at his command and within the time required by law. The constitutional right of the people under the referendum may not thus be jeopardized. It may be that the secretary of state might be charged with that duty by proper legislative enactment, but it would be unreasonable to conclude that under present law he has anything to do with the checking of the names of the referendum petitions or with the form or substance of those portions of the petitions which bear the signatures of electors.

[4] Counsel appearing as amici curiæ in support of the petitioner's position make the further contention that by the amendment of section 6 of article 4 of the Constitution in 1926, the referendum provisions of section 1 of the same article do not apply to the legislative enactment in question. That portion of the amendment which forms the basis of the contention is the part which provides that if the Legislature should fail to reapportion the state as required by the section, a reapportionment commission, constituted as therein provided, should reapportion the assembly and senatorial districts according to the requirements of the section, and that such reapportionment should be effective the same as though the said act of reapportionment were an act of the Legislature, "subject, however, to the same provisions of referendum as apply to the acts of the Legislature." From the proviso just quoted it is argued that the referendum is thereby made to apply only to apportionment by the commission. There is no merit in the contention. Section 1 of the article, as above noted, provides that:

> "No act passed by the Legislature shall go into effect until ninety days after the final adjournment of the session of the Legislature which passed such act, except acts calling elections, acts providing for tax levies or appropriations for the usual current expenses of the state, and urgency measures. * * *"

The reapportionment act here in question does not fall within the classification of any of the specially excepted enactments, and the amendment of section 6 in 1926 does not except it. Not only is this so, but the said amendment, to make assurance doubly sure, provides that the apportionment by the commission shall be subject to the same provisions of referendum as apply to the acts of the Legislature, including, of course, the act here in question. The obvious meaning of the constitutional amendment is contrary to that placed upon it by these amici curiæ.

From the foregoing it necessarily follows that the demurrer should be sustained and the peremptory writ be denied.

It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. BALL. (Cr. 3131.)

Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑93—Superior court held without jurisdiction to render judgment under statute making taking of automobile to use temporarily misdemeanor (Pen. Code, § 499b).

Superior court has no power or jurisdiction to render judgment under Pen. Code, § 499b, providing any person who shall without permission of owner take an automobile for purpose of temporarily using same shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor.

2. Automobiles 🔑351—Information charging defendant with taking automobile temporarily, depriving owner of possession, did not charge offense under statute prohibiting taking to temporarily use or operate (Pen. Code, § 499b).

Information charging defendant with taking automobile for the purpose of temporarily depriving owner of possession of said vehicle charges entirely different "purpose" from that which is material element of offense defined in Pen. Code, § 499b, making it a misdemeanor for person to take automobile or other vehicle for purpose of temporarily using or operating same, and therefore fails to state any offense under said section.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Under act providing taking of automobile must be in absence of owner to constitute offense, information omitting this requirement held insufficient (Motor Vehicle Act, § 146; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Motor Vehicle Act, § 146 (St. 1923, p. 564), providing taking of or driving of automobile must be in absence of owner in order to constitute offense, information entirely omitting this requirement held insufficient and not cured by Const. art. 6, § 4½, since provision of statute is highly penal and should receive strict construction.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

George Ball was convicted of taking an automobile without the consent of the owner, and he appeals. Reversed. Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 265 P. 890.

Stahlman & Bennett, George Stahlman, and Sydney C. Bennett, all of Stockton, for appellant.

Guard C. Darrah, Dist. Atty., and H. C. Stanley, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Stockton, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of San Joaquin county, Cal., sentencing defendant to imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin, on his plea of guilty when arraigned on an information, the charging part of which is as follows:

> "The said George Ball is accused by the district attorney of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, by this information of the crime of taking an automobile without permission of the owner, a felony, committed as follows: The said George Ball did on or about the 11th day of November, A. D. 1927, prior to the filing of this information, at and in the county and state aforesaid, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take an automobile, to wit, a Buick roadster, Oregon license No. 193783, motor No. 412665, for the purpose of temporarily depriving the owner of the possession of said vehicle, and at the time of so taking said automobile the said defendant did not have permission or consent of the owner thereof, to wit, A. M. Parry, to so take said automobile."

Defendant claims that the foregoing statement of acts on the part of defendant set forth in the information does not describe any prescribed felony under the laws of the state of California, and because of this he asks a reversal of the judgment. The question presented by the appeal involves the construction of section 499b of the Penal Code and section 146 of the State Automobile Act, as enacted in 1923 (Cal. Stats. 1923, p. 564).

Section 499b of the Penal Code, which was adopted in 1905, is as follows:

> "Any person who shall, without the permission of the owner thereof, take any automobile, bicycle, motorcycle, or other vehicle, for the purpose of temporarily using or operating the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Section 146 of the State Automobile Act reads thus:

> "Driving vehicle without owner's consent. Any person who shall drive a vehicle not his own, without the consent of the owner thereof and in the absence of the owner, and with intent to either permanently or temporarily deprive the owner thereof of his title to or possession of such vehicle, whether with or without intent to steal the same, shall be deemed guilty of a felony. The consent of the owner of a vehicle to its taking or driving shall not in any case be presumed or implied because of such owner's consent on a previous occasion to the taking or driving of such vehicle by the same or a different person. Any person who assists in, or is a party or accessory to or an accomplice in, any such stealing or unauthorized taking or driving, shall also be deemed guilty of a felony."

[1, 2] It is not necessary for us to consider whether the information in this case charges the defendant with the offense defined by section 499b of the Penal Code. Such offense is a misdemeanor only, punishable by fine of not exceeding $200 or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or by both said fine and imprisonment, and therefore it is not within the jurisdiction of the superior court. Under such an information the superior court would be without power to render not only the judgment which was given against the defendant in this action, but it would have no authority to take jurisdiction of such offense, or to render any judgment whatever therein. We think, however, that there is a material variance between the statement of the offense charged in the information and that described in section 499b. The information charges the defendant with taking an automobile "for the purpose of temporarily depriving the owner of the possession of said vehicle," while section 499b makes it a misdemeanor for a person to take an automobile or other vehicle "for the purpose of temporarily using or operating the same." It is perfectly obvious that the "purpose" for which defendant took the automobile, as charged in the information, is an entirely different "purpose" from that which is made a material element of the offense defined in the Penal Code section. The information, therefore, fails to state any offense under said section of the Penal Code.

[3] The information is also fatally defective and fails to state the offense denounced in section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act. Conceding that to "take" an automobile is equivalent to "drive" an automobile, still the information fails to state one of the material elements of the offense defined by this section of the Motor Vehicle Act. This section provides that the taking or driving of the automobile must be "in the absence of the owner." The information omits entirely this requirement of the statute. Its omission renders the information insufficient to state the offense defined in section 146 of said statute. This provision of the statute is highly penal in its nature, and it should therefore receive a strict construction. Nor do we think section 4½ of article 6 of the State Constitution cures this defect, as the information as it now stands fails to state any offense whatever against the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Santa Monica against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward T. Bishop, J. A. Tucker, Everett W. Mattoon, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. In this action a hearing was granted by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, in order that the case might be considered with another one growing out of a similar controversy in which a decision had been rendered by the District Court of Appeal, and which latter decision was inharmonious with the decision in the instant case. West Glendale M. E. Church v. McClellan, L. A. No. 8432 (Cal. Sup.) 267 P. 705. A careful consideration of the arguments and opinions in both cases has convinced us of the correctness of the views announced in the decision of the District Court of Appeal, Craig, J., heretofore filed herein, and that decision is accordingly adopted as and for the opinion and decision of this court. It reads as follows:

This appeal is from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a second amended complaint, which alleged that the appellant is a religious corporation, owning two lots in the city of Santa Monica, Los Angeles county, upon which is situated a church building used solely and exclusively for religious worship, and that all of its real property here involved is required for the convenient use and occupation of said building. In the year 1924, the properly constituted authorities of Los Angeles county assessed and levied upon said property a tax amounting to $849.51, without the knowledge, acquiescence or consent of appellant, of which tax appellant learned on December 1, 1924, and upon said date paid it to the tax collector under protest. The amended complaint also alleges that the assessor and his deputy at all times mentioned had actual personal knowledge of the ownership and use of the property in question as therein stated, and that the same was exempt from taxation; further, that the assessor did not at any time during the year 1924 demand, exact, or notify the plaintiff to make, verify, or file a statement setting forth property owned by it or under its possession or control. It appears that after paying the tax appellant duly claimed the return thereof, which was refused, whereupon this action was begun to recover the amount paid, upon the claim that the property is exempt from taxation under section 1½ of article 13 of the Constitution, and section 3611 of the Political Code. In resisting the suit, respondent's sole contention is that the failure to file the affidavit required by section 3611 of the Political Code amounts to a waiver of such exemption, and that the amended complaint is fatally defective in that it contains no allegation that such affidavit was filed.

Appellant's contention is that this section is intended only to provide a method of supplying evidence of the fact that the property is exempt, and that it does not provide for a waiver of the exemption in case no affidavit be filed; further, that if it were construed as requiring the filing of an affidavit in order that exemption may be secured, such provision would be unconstitutional, because, it is said, it would conflict with section 1½ of article 13 of the Constitution of this state. Section 1½ reads as follows:

> "All buildings, and so much of the real property on which they are situated as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of said buildings, when the same are used solely and exclusively for religious worship shall be free from taxation; provided, that no building so used which may be rented for religious purposes and rent received by the owner therefor, shall be exempt from taxation."

The Political Code, section 3611, quoting and providing the method of procedure for acquiring exemption under the foregoing section of the Constitution, was enacted by the Legislature in the following language:

> "That any person claiming property to be exempt from taxation under this section shall make a return thereof to the assessor annually, the same as property is listed for taxation, and shall accompany the same by an affidavit showing that the building is used solely and exclusively for religious worship, and that the described portion of the real property claimed as exempt is required for the convenient use and occupation of such building, and that the same is not rented for religious purposes and rent received by the owner therefor."

[1-3] Respondent is correct in stating the issues to be, first, does the failure to comply with the provisions of section 3611 of the Political Code constitute a waiver of the exemption; and, second, so construed, is section 3611 constitutional? However, we find it unnecessary to decide the second question. We search the section in vain for any provision therein requiring that a failure to file an affidavit shall result in a waiver of the right to exemption. It contains no such express declaration. Nevertheless, respondent contends that it does not contain such provision. If so it must arise by implication. But an intention to legislate by implication is not to be presumed. Crowell v. Gilmore, 18 Cal. 370. No very definite reasons are assigned for believing that the Legislature meant to provide by implication that a failure to file the affidavit should result in a waiver of the right provided by the Constitution to tax exemptions. An analysis of section 3611 of the Political Code shows that the first provision of it is merely a quotation of section 1½ of article 13 of the Constitution. The appellant asserts, and the respondent concedes, that this section is self-executing. Since we think it unnecessary to a decision upon this appeal to pass upon that question, no opinion is expressed. It may be assumed, as argued by respondent, that even though a constitutional provision is self-executing, the Legislature may, and in many instances must, enact legislation to facilitate its operation, and to provide convenient remedies for the protection of the right established, and for the determination thereof and the regulation of claims thereto. Such legislation must be in furtherance of the purposes of the constitutional provisions, but, if so, it is valid and enforceable. The last provision of section 3611 is, we think, such a law. It is regulatory and places no unreasonable burden upon those entitled under section 1½ of article 13 of the Constitution to tax exemption. It creates no hardship to require of a property owner that he file an affidavit showing that the property claimed to be exempt is used solely for religious worship, that it is required for the convenient use and occupation of the building upon the premises, and that the same is not rented for such purposes and rent received by the owner therefor. If the person claiming exemption fails to make a return to the assessor by filing the affidavit contemplated, the latter acts entirely within the scope of his authority in assessing the property just as he would any other property. This is clearly intended by section 3611 of the Political Code. But respondent argues further that the language employed is mandatory, that any one claiming exemption must comply with the section, and that unless such a construction is placed upon it the provision amounts to nothing more than a request to the taxpayer that he file an affidavit in order that the assessor may be aided in his work.

It may be that the statute would be more effective if the legislators had provided it with teeth, and annexed a penalty merely to make the law more effective and to reduce the work of the assessor, or to avoid time wasting on the part of other public officials. Even though the construction placed upon the law by respondent is not adopted, it cannot be said that the claimant has no incentive to comply with the requirement that he file an affidavit. The result of his failure to make a return to the assessor is bound to be, as in the instant case, that his property is taxed and he is put to the trouble and expense of a proceeding before the board of supervisors for a cancellation of the assessment, after being required to secure from the district attorney the latter's consent, or else he must pay his taxes under protest and apply to the board of supervisors for their refund, or, upon the refusal of the supervisors to direct such refund, he is compelled to institute an action in the superior court. In either of such proceedings the taxpayer would be required to show that the property in question was used exclusively for religious purposes and that it was not rented for such purposes. It may reasonably have been the idea of the legislators in enacting this law that such inconvenience and the loss of money and time incidentally involved would provide sufficient incentive to inspire compliance with the sections of the Constitution and Political Code in question without adding the further penalty of a loss of the exemption itself. At any rate they omitted provision for such a penalty.

Aside from consideration of the language of a statute where any substantial doubt exists as to its meaning, it is of course proper to regard extrinsic aids. One which may reasonably be given weight in this case, and which must throw great light upon the legislative intent, is a comparison of other provisions of the same chapter of the Political Code, having to do with other related exemptions. Sections 3612 and 3613 of the Political Code respectively provide for the exemption from taxation of war veterans and of educational institutions. It will be noted that each of these sections, after providing for a showing to be made by one claiming exemption similarly to that called for by section 3611, expressly add that a failure to make a return shall be deemed to constitute a waiver of the right given by the Constitution. In People v. Buster, 11 Cal. 221, which is not distinguishable in principle, the Supreme Court said, at page 221: "The omission of this provision in the sections which touch cases like this is significant to show that a different intention existed." Surely, the fact that these parallel provisions for tax exemption, one immediately following the other, are distinctly dissimilar in this one provision, is indicative of the fact that the Legislature in making the difference did so intentionally and deliberately. We are satisfied that the provision of section 3611 of the Political Code requiring any person claiming property to be exempt from taxation under that section to make a return thereof to the assessor was intended to assist the assessor in determining what property should be omitted from assessment, but that it was not the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it to make a failure to comply therewith a waiver of the exemption provided in section 1½ of article 13 of the Constitution. Consequently, one entitled to such an exemption may still avail himself of it in a proper proceeding, and for that purpose the complaint filed in the instant cases states a cause of action.

The judgment is reversed.

WEST GLENDALE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Appellant, v. R. F. McCLELLAN et al., Defendants and Respondents. (L. A. 8432.)

Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1928.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Superseding opinion in District Court of Appeal, 258 P. 449.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Edward T. Bishop, and J. A. Tucker, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendants, entered after a demurrer to the complaint had been sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiff sought a writ of mandate directed to the supervisors, auditor, and tax collector of Los Angeles county, to compel the cancellation of a tax assessment for the year 1923, against property alleged to be used exclusively for religious worship by plaintiff and necessary for such use. It is also alleged that the district attorney had consented, in writing, that the petition for cancellation of the tax be granted, and that this petition was presented to the supervisors and to the auditor, and "that at all times since the said board of supervisors has refused to direct the auditor to cancel said assessment and tax, and have based their refusal solely on the ground that plaintiff failed to make a return and an affidavit as authorized by section 3611, Political Code," in the time prescribed thereby. It is also alleged that the tax collector is threatening to sell said property for said delinquent taxes. The complaint does not allege that the plaintiff has complied with the requirement of section 3611 of the Political Code. The trial court held that the failure of plaintiff to file with the assessor the report and affidavit required by that section was fatal to its cause of action. The correctness of that ruling is the sole matter to be determined in this appeal.

The legal question involved here has been determined this day by this court in a case involving a similar state of facts with reference to the 1924 tax upon church property. First Methodist Episcopal Church of Santa Monica v. County of Los Angeles, L. A. 9264, 267 P. 703. In that case it was decided that a noncompliance with section 3611, Political Code, does not waive the tax exemption. The holding of that case is conclusive here.

The judgment is reversed.

Judgment for defendant in action for profits plaintiff would have made, if not prevented by defendant from constructing two of four bungalows contracted for, held not to bar recovery of amount due for work done and materials used in construction of other buildings and enforcement of lien therefor against defendant's property, in view of Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court; Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by C. F. Agnifili against Antonio Lagna. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in District Court of Appeal, 260 P. 796.

Culver & Nourse and Paul Nourse, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest M. Torchia and Charles Matthews, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. On October 19, 1921, the defendant, Antonio Lagna, entered into a written contract with one J. J. Rue, whereby Rue agreed to erect and build for Lagna four bungalows at Eagle Rock, Los Angeles county, on lots 4, 5, 6, and 7, block 5 of a certain subdivision, for the sum of $2,400 each according to certain plans and specifications, to be paid as follows: $300 when each bungalow is ready for plastering, $300 when the outside is finished, and $1,800 when completed; the owner to do all painting, tinting, and paper hanging for the sum of $140, to be deducted from the contract price. This contract with the written consent of Lagna was assigned to the plaintiff. Plaintiff thereupon began work under said contract, and constructed a bungalow upon said lot 5 and at least partially constructed another upon said lot 6. At this juncture of their building venture a dispute arose between them, and plaintiff ceased to further carry out the contract, claiming that the defendant had failed to make certain payments called for under the contract, alleging that two of said houses had not been constructed; that he was ready, able, and willing to construct them according to the terms of the contract, and that defendant had refused to permit plaintiff to so construct said two houses. In this action against the defendant, plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $999.13. Nine hundred and fifty dollars of said amount he alleged was the profit he would have made by the construction of said two houses had not defendant prevented him from completing his contract, and $49.13 for depreciation in value of certain lumber and building materials, which he had ordered and delivered upon the ground for the purpose of constructing said two houses. In his complaint in said action plaintiff alleged defendant forbade him to proceed with the work under said contract, and, without just cause, refused to allow plaintiff to carry out the terms of said contract, and in an amendment to his complaint plaintiff alleged as a further ground in support of his action against defendant that plaintiff entered into the performance of his contract and continued in the performance thereof until on or about the 16th day of February, 1922, at which time the defendant failed and refused to make the payments due to plaintiff under said contract, and that by reason of such failure plaintiff was compelled to discontinue said work, and that he elected to treat the failure and refusal of defendant to make said payment as a breach of said contract on the part of the defendant. Defendant answered and denied in substance the material allegations of the complaint. The complaint in said action was filed March 14, 1922, and the action was numbered 103798 in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. Thereafter, and before the above-mentioned action had been tried, the plaintiff filed the present action in which he sought to foreclose a mechanic's lien for the reasonable value of the labor performed and materials furnished in the construction of the first two houses mentioned in said contract, that is, the houses to be constructed upon lots 5 and 6 respectively, mentioned in said contract. The complaint in this action was filed June 13, 1922, and this action is numbered 107330 in said superior court.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint in the present action that he had completed the construction of the bungalow upon said lot 5 and had performed work and furnished materials in the construction of the bungalow upon said lot 6 of the value of $1,493; that the value of the labor performed and materials furnished entering into the construction of said bungalow upon lot 5 was $2,260 (being the contract price less $140 deducted for painting, etc.); and that defendant had paid on account of the labor and materials entering into the construction of both of said houses the sum of $801 only, leaving a balance due plaintiff for the work and materials furnished on the two bungalows, which were either constructed or were partially constructed on lots 5 and

[1, 2] In holding that the judgment in action 103798 was res adjudicata in action 107330, and therefore a bar to plaintiff's cause of action therein, we think the trial court was in error. We will hereafter refer to action number 103798 as the first or prior action, and to action number 107330 as the second or subsequent action. In the first action the plaintiff sought to recover the profits which he claimed that he would have made had he not been prevented by defendant from constructing the two bungalows provided for in the contract. In the second action plaintiff sought to foreclose a lien for the reasonable value of the labor and materials entering into the construction of the other buildings mentioned in the contract, one of which was only partially constructed. The court found in the first action that the defendant had not breached his contract, nor prevented plaintiff from constructing the two bungalows described therein, and therefore plaintiff was not entitled to any profits that he might have made had he erected said buildings. The court found that defendant had made certain payments on account of said contract. These matters having been adjudicated in the first action, the judgment therein was conclusive as to them upon the parties to the second action. The court in the first action did not purport to find that defendant had paid plaintiff in full for the work done and materials furnished toward the construction of the two bungalows on lots 5 and 6. Therefore, the judgment in the first action was not a bar to the recovery by plaintiff of such amounts as might be due him for said work and materials, and to the enforcement of his lien for said amounts against the property of defendant. A judgment in an action is a bar in a subsequent suit between the same parties only to the extent of the matters litigated in the previous action and determined by the judgment therein or which were properly the subject of litigation therein. "In order that a judgment in one action may constitute an estoppel against the parties thereto in a subsequent action, it must be made to appear, either upon the face of the record or by extrinsic evidence, that the identical questions involved in the issues to be tried were determined in the former action. * * * By section 1908, subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the effect of a judgment is conclusive 'in respect to the matter directly adjudged,' and, by section 1911, 'that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former action which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto.'" Beronio v. Ventura County Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 232, 236, 61 P. 958, 959, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118.

[3, 4] The court in the first action found that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything from defendant by reason of the breach of said contract on account of the two buildings which were not constructed by him, and its judgment therein in so far as it is to be held an adjudication of the right of the parties thereto must be limited to those rights growing out of the contract to erect the two buildings which the court in the first action was considering. The contract between the parties is a severable contract. That is, it is susceptible of division into two or more parts. In fact, it in reality comprises four distinct contracts, each independent of the others, to construct for a definite amount four separate buildings (Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 117, 120, 85 P. 305; Pacific Wharf etc. Co. v. Dredging Co., 184 Cal. 21, 192 P. 847). While plaintiff may not recover for the two houses he did not construct, that fact, and its determination by the court in the first action, cannot be held to be any obstacle or bar to his right to recover for the two houses he did construct. It is true the court in the first action found that plaintiff "abandoned the said work and failed to comply with the terms of said contract." This finding, however, was not within the issues as made by the pleadings in said action. Therefore, the plaintiff was not concluded by the judgment in said action as to matters embraced within this finding, and said judgment was not res adjudicata as to said matters. Beronio v. Ventura County Lumber Co., supra.

GRIDLEY v. SELLECK. (Civ. 5041.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 21, 1928.

1. Pleading ⟹18—Complaint alleging amount due from third person for merchandise, and attempting to allege cause of action based on guaranty, held demurrable for uncertainty.

Complaint alleging amount due from third person for merchandise, and seeking recovery thereof, and also attempting to allege cause of action based on guaranty limited to an amount less than alleged to be due, held demurrable for uncertainty, as being ambiguous and unintelligible as to whether cause of action was based on principal obligation against third person or on alleged guaranty expressly limited by its terms to a smaller amount.

2. Pleading ⟹310—Exhibit attached to complaint cannot supply lack of essential allegations and averments.

Plaintiff cannot rely on exhibit attached to complaint to supply lack of essential allegations and averments therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by A. G. Gridley against Willard M. Selleck. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. C. Gridley and Harry A. Reese, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Fred L. Hamblin, of Riverside, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. A demurrer to the complaint in this action was sustained, and the plaintiff given ten days to amend her complaint, which she failed to do. After the entry of her default a motion to dismiss the action was made and granted, and judgment of dismissal subsequently entered. From that judgment plaintiff takes this appeal. The demurrer was general and special. The minute order simply recites:

> "This cause came on regularly to be heard on demurrer. Demurrer sustained. Ten days to amend."

The demurrer, among other matters, specifies:

> "That said complaint is uncertain in this: That it cannot be determined therefrom, nor from any part thereof, whether or not the said defendant is being sued upon the principal obligation of the Selleck Auto Company or upon the alleged written guarantee referred to in said complaint," and that the complaint is ambiguous and unintelligible in the same respects.

An examination of the complaint, and particularly paragraphs II, III, V, VI, VII, VIII, and XI, certainly sustains this contention. Paragraph III is as follows:

> "That on or about the 7th day of May, 1915, there was due from the said Selleck Auto Equipment Company, above mentioned, for tires, repair material, pneumatic and solid tires, rubber sundries, goods and material purchased from the said Seamless Rubber Company of New York and included the terms of said contract of guaranty, for the payment of which said contract, marked Exhibit "A" was entered into the sum of $20,552.27."

[1] Paragraphs VII, and VIII of the complaint allege the assignment to the plaintiff by the "Seamless Rubber Company, Inc.," of its "claim and account" against the Selleck Auto Equipment Company, and said Willard M. Selleck, and that there is now due from such company and said Willard M. Selleck the sum of $20,552.27 and interest (and incidentally the prayer of the complaint asks for judgment for that amount), whereas paragraph II of the complaint attempts to allege a cause of action based on a guaranty limited to $20,000; and it appears from the contract of guaranty, "Exhibit A," that the amount of liability is so limited. This alone is sufficiently uncertain, unintelligible, and ambiguous to justify the court in sustaining the demurrer and directing an amendment of the complaint, so that it may be made sufficiently clear and certain.

to defendant whether it means that he is to answer a cause of action based on the alleged guaranty which is expressly limited by its terms to $20,000, or a cause of action based upon goods, wares, and merchandise purchased by the corporation which the plaintiff designates as a cause of action upon a "claim and account" of the Seamless Rubber Company, Inc., against Willard M. Selleck, upon which it is claimed the whole amount of $20,552.27 and interest is due from defendant. Under the pleadings, and particularly paragraphs V, VI, VII, and VIII, the defendant might well assume that plaintiff was intending to allege the latter cause of action against him, but through inadvertence omitted his name in the paragraph which alleges that the goods were sold and delivered.

[2] There are other specifications in the demurrer which it is unnecessary to discuss. Appellant may not rely upon "Exhibit A" attached to the complaint to supply the lack of essential allegations and averments in the complaint. Panter v. Natl. Surety Co., 36 Cal. App. 44, 46, 171 P. 803. In Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 680, at 686, 130 P. 432, 434, the court says:

> "Recitals in a contract incorporated in a complaint will not supply the want of essential averments in the pleading."

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (Civ. 3469.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 14, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷484—Supersedeas acts only in staying hand of court and not in undoing anything which has been previously done.

A writ of supersedeas can only be issued to stay further action of court, and acts only in staying the hand of the court, and not in undoing anything which has previously been done.

2. Appeal and error ⚷470—Undertaking complying with statutes held to stay proceedings, notwithstanding trial court's refusal to approve undertaking (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 948).

Where defendant adjudged to pay alimony filed undertaking for stay of judgment in sum double amount which would accrue during period of three years from filing of notice of appeal as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 942, and no proceedings pursuant to section 948 for testing sufficiency of sureties was taken, held that undertaking operated as stay of all proceedings on judgment appealed from until its final determination, notwithstanding trial court refused to approve undertaking.

3. Appeal and error ⚷477—On application for supersedeas, court cannot direct discharge of defendant, committed for contempt pursuant to judgment entered before filing of undertaking.

Where, prior to filing of undertaking by defendant adjudged to pay alimony, trial court adjudged defendant guilty of contempt and entered order directing defendant's commitment, held that, on application for writ of supersedeas, appellate court cannot enter order requiring defendant's discharge, since it can take into consideration only order made after filing of undertaking which effects a stay of proceedings.

Application for writ of supersedeas by Sidney V. Smith, Jr., prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Yuba County, Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge, requiring said court to desist from further proceedings in an action by Elaine T. Smith against Sidney V. Smith, Jr., and for an order directing said court to release the applicant from custody of the sheriff. Relief in accordance with opinion.

Alden Ames, of San Francisco, and W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for appellant.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon the defendant's application for a writ of supersedeas, and also for an order directing the superior court of the county of Yuba to release the defendant from the custody of the sheriff of said county.

On the 21st day of October, 1927, the superior court of said county entered its order, and on the 24th day of October, 1927, entered a final decree of divorce in the above-entitled cause, by the terms of which order, and also by the terms of said final decree, the above-named defendant was required to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $175 per month as permanent alimony commencing on the 1st day of July, 1927, and continuing thereafter until the further order of said court, and also awarding the plaintiff the sum of $200 as and for counsel fees in said action. On the 3d day of November, 1927, an appeal was regularly taken by the above-named defendant from the order and final decree just referred to herein. The defendant not having paid the monthly alimony specified in the final decree of divorce entered in said cause, proceedings were taken and had for the purpose of punishing the defendant for contempt for failure to comply with said order and final decree, and on the 14th day of November, 1927, the trial court entered an order adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt in not having paid the alimony as required by the final decree entered in said cause and directing that, unless the defendant paid to the plaintiff the sum of $1,075 within five days thereafter, appellant should be committed to the sheriff of the county of Yuba until he should comply with said order. Thereafter proceedings were taken and had in this court for a review of the order of the trial court adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt, and the order of the court so doing was affirmed by this court and the remittitur from this court was filed with the clerk of the superior court of Yuba county on the 23d day of April, 1928. Thereupon, and on said 23d day of April, 1928, the superior court of the county of Yuba made and entered its order directing that the defendant be committed for contempt of said court as hereinbefore referred to. Thereafter, and on the same day, to wit, April 23, 1928, the defendant presented to said superior court a good and sufficient undertaking for a stay of judgment in the above-entitled cause, in the sum of $15,100, conditioned in all particulars as required by section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This undertaking is in double the amount of the sum already accrued, and which will accrue during a period of three years from and after the filing of the notice of appeal herein on November 3, 1927. Upon the presentation of said bond and undertaking to the judge of the superior court of the county for Yuba for approval, approval thereof by said judge was refused, on the ground that an order of arrest of said defendant had previously been issued. The bond and undertaking so tendered by the defendant was then filed with the clerk of said court. Upon the facts which we have briefly summarized, the defendant petitions this court for a writ of supersedeas and an order directing his discharge, as herein stated.

[1-3] As a writ of supersedeas can only be issued to stay further action of the court, and acts only in staying the hand of the court, and not in undoing anything which has previously been done by the court, we have really only one question to decide in the matter now before us, and that is whether the bond and undertaking as given by the defendant acts as a supersedeas in this cause. In the recent case of Smith v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 256 P. 419, an undertaking covering the costs and the amount of alimony allowed that would accrue during a period of three years from the date the appeal was filed in the superior court and the writ of supersedeas prayed for based upon such facts, the court there said:

> "The defendant's right to stay execution of an order such as we are considering here, pending the determination of the appeal involving the main issue, has been settled in this state since the elaborate consideration given to the subject in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 199, 7 P. 456, 635, 8 P. 709. McAneny v. Sup. Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 P. 1020, is to the same effect, as are the text and authorities noted in 1 Cal. Jur. 952, § 8."

Under these decisions it must be held upon this application that the bond tendered by the defendant and filed with the clerk of said court is sufficient to stay further proceedings in relation to the judgment herein referred to pending the appeal taken therefrom. Section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not require that an undertaking given to stay execution must be approved by the judge of the superior court from whose judgment the appeal is taken. Section 948 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides the procedure for testing the sufficiency of the sureties on such an undertaking. It does not appear that any such proceeding has been taken in this cause, and upon oral argument it was admitted that the undertaking herein is sufficient if the approval of a judge of the trial court is not required. We therefore hold that the undertaking filed in this cause operates as a stay of all proceedings upon the judgment appealed from until its final determination. However, as appears by the text, abundantly supported by authorities, in 2 Cal. Jur. 469, § 221, the stay of proceedings pending an appeal has no retrospective operation, and does not undo or render unlawful any action that has already been taken by the trial court before the supersedeas becomes effective. The action of the trial court adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt, and also the issuance of a commitment thereon preceded the filing of the undertaking herein, and as this court, upon an application for a writ of supersedeas, can only take into consideration orders of the court made after the filing of the bond which effects a stay of proceedings, no order can be made as prayed for requiring the trial court to direct the discharge of the defendant. Whether the filing of the undertaking, as herein referred to, works an abatement of the order committing the defendant under the principle enunciated in the case of Ex parte Overend, 122 Cal. 201, 54 P. 740, can only be decided when this court comes to consider the defendant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus which is now pending.

In view of what we have stated, we simply hold that the defendant herein has given and filed a good and sufficient undertaking staying all proceedings in the case of Smith v. Smith, appealed from as herein referred to, and the order will be that the trial court desist from all further proceedings in relation to said judgment, until the final determination thereof upon said appeal, and until the further order of this court.

PETRAY v. FIRST NAT. BANK IN BAKERSFIELD. (Civ. 5451.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 21, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑907(2)—Reviewing court must presume that evidence supports findings, and must construe findings in favor of judgment where evidence is not presented.

Where record on appeal contains none of evidence given at trial, reviewing court must presume that evidence supported the findings, and must construe the findings in favor of the judgment, resolving any uncertainties against the appellant.

2. Banks and banking 🔑117—Cashier of bank authorized to loan depositor's money on good security had no implied authority to himself borrow money on unsecured loan.

Where cashier of bank was authorized to loan depositor's money on good security, cashier had no implied authority from bank to withdraw depositor's money for purpose of making loan to himself, for which he gave only his note without security.

3. Principal and agent 🔑75—Transaction by which agent undertakes to deal with himself may be ratified by principal knowing facts.

Transaction by which agent undertakes to deal with himself in the matter of the agency without the intervention of the principal is merely voidable, and may be ratified by the principal on full knowledge of the facts.

4. Banks and banking 🔑112—Depositor's demand that bank cashier pay note which represented unauthorized loan to himself of depositor's money, and nine months' delay in demanding money from bank, constituted ratification of cashier's act, precluding recovery from bank (Civ. Code, §§ 2309, 2310).

Where bank cashier, authorized by depositor to loan her money on good security, without authority withdrew her money and borrowed the money himself without security and gave note, depositor's conduct in receiving the note with full knowledge of the facts and in demanding payment of principal and interest thereon and delaying nine months in asserting demand against bank constituted ratification of unauthorized act of cashier, precluding recovery against bank as depositor; Civ. Code, §§ 2309, 2310, permitting oral ratification under such circumstances.

5. Principal and agent 🔑175(3)—"Ratification" is equivalent to previous authorization and relates back to time when act ratified was done.

"Ratification" is equivalent to a previous authorization and relates back to time when act ratified was done, except where intervening rights of third persons are concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ratification.]

6. Banks and banking 🔑112—Unauthorized withdrawal by cashier of depositor's money constituted "payment," discharging bank's liability where withdrawal was subsequently ratified by depositor.

Where depositor ratified conduct of cashier of bank in withdrawing money from her account for purpose of loan to himself, the effect of the withdrawal was as if it had been done with depositor's authority, and withdrawal therefore constituted "payment" discharging bank's debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Payment.]

7. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—Express finding of payment in support of judgment was not indispensable where issue was raised by pleadings and payment was proved.

Where issue of payment was raised by answer and conclusion of payment necessarily resulted from evidence, express finding of payment in support of judgment was not required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by P. E. Petray against the First National Bank in Bakersfield. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment and enter a new judgment in her favor, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Wiley & Harvey and Harvey & Hurd, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1] The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order denying her motion that the judgment be vacated and a new judgment in her favor be entered upon the findings. The record upon which both appeals are presented contains the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions showing the proceedings upon the motion but none of the evidence given at the trial. We must therefore presume that the evidence supported the findings, and construe the latter as strongly as their language will permit in favor of the judgment, resolving any uncertainties therein against the appellant. The important facts are set forth in the following findings:

"II. That on the 14th day of September, 1922, there was deposited with defendant to the account and credit of plaintiff the sum of $1,800.

"III. That thereafter on the 8th day of November, 1922, one J. K. Russell, the cashier of defendant, without the knowledge of plaintiff, withdrew from defendant said sum of $1,800, which said sum was charged against plaintiff's account, and said Russell at said time drew and executed his promissory note for said sum in favor of plaintiff payable on demand, and placed said note in a sealed envelope with other papers of plaintiff being held by said defendant for plaintiff for safe-keeping.

"IV. That prior to said 8th day of November, 1922, plaintiff had authorized said J. K. Russell to loan said money of plaintiff 'on good security' for the purpose of making and collecting loans for her, and that at all of said times the said Russell was the duly elected and acting cashier of said defendant.

"V. That on or about the 7th day of March, 1924, plaintiff, at the banking room of defendant, discovered for the first time that there was no loan with security therefor, or that said sum of $1,800 was not to her credit with defendant, and then and there received from defendant said sealed note.

"VI. That thereafter said plaintiff demanded of said Russell payment to her of the interest as provided in said note, and thereafter demanded of said Russell the payment in full of said note and interest, but that no part of said principal sum nor interest thereon has been paid to plaintiff.

"VII. That on the 11th day of December, 1924, said plaintiff demanded of the defendant herein the sum of $1,800, which said sum said defendant has refused and neglected to pay to plaintiff."

Plaintiff argues, in support of her appeal, that by the deposit of her money in the defendant bank, the relation of debtor and creditor was created between her and the bank, that the facts stated in the findings do not amount to a novation by which Russell was substituted for the bank as her debtor, and that hence the bank remains liable to her for the amount of the deposit. We are inclined to regard the two premises of the argument as correct, but the conclusion stated does not follow therefrom. The liability of a debtor may be terminated in other ways than by a novation. Novation was not pleaded in the answer as a defense, and the findings do not indicate to us that the judgment was based thereon.

[2] From the findings it appears that Russell was authorized by plaintiff to loan her money on deposit with defendant "on good security." Nothing is said as to the means by which he was to obtain possession of the money for that purpose. Defendant claims that such authority carried with it the implied power to draw the money from the bank for the purpose of loaning it, and that when Russell withdrew the money this was in effect a payment to plaintiff's authorized agent; while plaintiff contends that, since Russell was defendant's cashier and acted for it in permitting the withdrawal of the money, it is chargeable with notice of all the facts known to him and these facts showed that he was exceeding his authority. But in the view we take of the case we do not find it necessary to pass on these contentions, except the point that Russell's acts were in excess of his authority. If he had any authority at all to withdraw plaintiff's money from her account it was necessarily limited to cases where he did so for the purpose of making a loan on good security. The transaction by which Russell took plaintiff's money from the bank and substituted his note in plaintiff's favor therefor was in form a loan to him in behalf of plaintiff, but it was in excess of his authority when made, for two reasons: First, that as plaintiff's agent he could not deal with himself; second, that the loan so made was not secured at all. He could, therefore have no implied power to withdraw plaintiff's money for that loan.

[3, 4] But such a transaction, by which an agent undertakes to deal with himself in the matter of the agency without the intervention of the principal, is not void, but merely voidable, and may be ratified by the principal, upon full knowledge of the facts. 2 Corpus Juris, 702; Burke v. Bours, 92 Cal. 108, 28 P. 57; Burke v. Bours, 98 Cal. 171, 32 P. 980; Sterling v. Smith, 97 Cal. 343, 32 P. 320; Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. A ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent may be express, but in the ordinary case it need not be so. Where an original authorization for the act ratified may be oral, a ratification can be made by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof. Civil Code, § 2310. In the case at bar an oral authorization would suffice (Civil Code, § 2309); hence the rule just stated applies to it. The findings show that on March 7, 1924, plaintiff was fully informed of Russell's unauthorized acts, and then received from defendant the note which Russell had made in plaintiff's favor to evidence the loan to himself; that she demanded of Russell payment of the interest and later of the principal of the note; and that, failing to obtain either, she then, nine months after she had received the note, demanded of defendant the sum which Russell had withdrawn from her account. We think from these facts the conclusion necessarily follows that she ratified Russell's acts in withdrawing the money and loaning it to himself. Within the meaning of the rule, the note of Russell must be regarded as a benefit. Of course, without the note plaintiff would be entitled, on a repudiation of the transaction as between herself and Russell, to recover the same amount of money from him; but the evidence to substantiate her case would not be so simple, or so easy to procure and present, and the statute of limitations would be shorter than that applicable to a suit on the note. She therefore obtained a benefit by taking and holding the note. The effect of this conduct on her part was intensified by the delay that ensued before she attempted to take a different position. The situation was one where defendant's interest called for prompt action by plaintiff. If she was satisfied to accept Russell's note and ratify the loan to him, defendant had no further concern with the matter; but if she repudiated the loan and held the defendant on the deposit, then the latter would have a claim against Russell for breach of duty as its cashier, and prompt action by defendant on this claim might be necessary for its protection.

[5, 6] A ratification is equivalent to a previous authorization, and relates back to the time when the act ratified was done, except in certain cases where the intervening rights of third persons are concerned; and hence the effect of the ratification here is that the withdrawal of the money in question from plaintiff's account, being made by her authority, amounted to payment, and so discharged defendant's debt to her.

[7] There is, it is true, no express finding of ratification or payment; but the issue of payment was raised by the answer, and since from the probative facts found the conclusion of ratification and payment necessarily results, this is equivalent to an express finding of payment, and is sufficient. Scott v. Symons, 191 Cal. 441, 456, 216 P. 604; Potts v. Paxton, 171 Cal. 493, 153 P. 957.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BLALOCK v. RIDGWAY et al. (Civ. 5954.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

1. Statutes 🔑181(1)—Primary rule of statutory construction is to determine Legislature's intent.

A primary rule of statutory construction, to which all others must yield, is to determine the intent of the Legislature, and when this intent is ascertained it will not be departed from if it is reasonably possible to avoid it.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑141(5)—Statute requiring written notice as condition precedent to discharge of probationary school teacher held mandatory and not merely directory (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Provision of Pol. Code, § 1609, that board of trustees of school district cannot discharge probationary teachers unless giving teacher notice in writing on or before 10th day of June, in any year, that services will not be required for ensuing school year, held mandatory and not merely directory.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑141(5)—Discharge of probationary school teacher held ineffective; written notice of discharge not having been served in time required by statute (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Where unregistered letter notifying probationary school teacher of dismissal by the board of trustees of the school district was not received by her until June 16, and registered letter to same effect was not deposited until June 23d, held, that provisions of Pol. Code, § 1609, requiring written notice on or before June 10, was not complied with, and dismissal was ineffective.

Valentine, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by Virginia L. Blalock against L. A. Ridgway and others, trustees of the Olive School District, and another. Judgment denying application, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Ugene U. Blalock, of Porterville, for appellant.

Leroy McCormick and Walter C. Haight, both of Visalia, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. The plaintiff filed a petition in the superior court seeking the writ of mandamus to compel the board of trustees of the Olive school district of Tulare county, Cal., to draw a warrant for certain salary alleged to be due plaintiff as a teacher in said school, and directing them to reinstate her as such teacher. Judgment was entered denying the peremptory writ, and this appeal is from that judgment.

The record discloses that appellant was a probationary teacher and acting as the sole teacher of the school during the school year of 1926–1927, ending about May 25, 1927, at a salary of $150 per month for the nine months of the school year. An attempt was made to terminate this employment and not to renew it for the succeeding year. As we view the proceeding, the sole question is whether the attempt was effective, or whether by the provisions of the law appellant was re-employed for the school year 1927–1928.

Section 1609 of the Political Code in its essential provisions provides:

> That boards of education "shall have power and it shall be their duty: * * * Second—to employ the teachers, as provided in part fifth of this section; * * * provided, that no board shall enter into any contract with such employees, other than teachers, to extend beyond the close of the next ensuing school year; except that teachers may be elected on or after May second for the next ensuing school year and each teacher so elected shall be deemed reelected from year to year except as hereinafter specified; * * * Fifth— * * * (d) To classify as probationary teachers those persons employed as teachers for the school year, and who have not been classified as permanent teachers, as hereinafter provided, such classification to be made at the time of employment, and thereafter in the month of July of each school year. * * * (i) To dismiss probationary teachers during the school year for cause only, as in the case of permanent teachers, except that on or before the tenth day of June in any year the governing board may give notice in writing to a probationary teacher that his services will not be required for the ensuing school year. Such notice shall be deemed sufficient and complete when delivered in person to the teacher by the clerk or secretary of the governing board of the school district or deposited in the United States registered mail with postage prepaid, addressed to such teacher at his last known place of address." (Italics ours.)

And there also follows a provision that in the case of permanent teachers they shall not be dismissed except for cause and then only after a hearing and investigation of the charges.

It appears from the testimony of J. H. Hayes, the clerk of the board of trustees, that on May 23, 1927, the board held a meeting, all members being present, at which it was resolved not to employ appellant for the following year; that on the morning of May 25, 1927, Mr. Hayes informed appellant at his home of this action of the board. During the ensuing two weeks appellant discussed this action of the board with Hayes, the clerk, and members of the board, and circulated a petition or paper among the parents stating that they wanted her; this, she says, was done by her upon the suggestion of a board member that if the parents did want her, that it could be taken care of. On June 8, 1927, a written notice was mailed to appellant in Porterville, where she then lived. Appellant testified she received this letter, and there is no contradiction of her testimony, on June 16, 1927. On June 23, 1927, a registered letter was deposited, directed to the appellant, notifying her to the same effect.

The respondents contend that the court was correct in its finding that the appellant had actual notice and that the provisions of the statute were substantially complied with; that the requirements therein contained for the dismissal of a probationary teacher are directory and not mandatory.

[1, 2] The primary rule of statutory construction to which all others must yield is to determine the intent of the Legislature. San Francisco v. Mooney, 106 Cal. 586, 39 P. 852, and Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 P. 120. When this intent is ascertained, it will not be departed from if it is reasonably possible to avoid it. People v. Merrill, 24 Cal. App. 210, 140 P. 1075.

In the case of Owens v. Board of Education, 68 Cal. App. 403, 229 P. 881, the court indicates the legislative intent of the act here under consideration, after stating that the statute is known as the Teachers' Tenure Act and quoting the provisions pertinent to that case, says:

> "Thus a 'probationary' teacher is re-elected and re-employed annually until entitled to classification as a 'permanent' teacher, and the board of education is required to report the employment of such teacher annually to the county superintendent. This, in itself, is sufficient to meet the terms of the statute and the teacher thereby becomes automatically classified as a permanent teacher at the end of two years of successful service." (Italics ours.)

Again, the opinion says:

> "This contract terminated with the school year of 1921–22, but was deemed continued in force unless, before the 10th of June the board should give the appellant notice in writing that her services would not be required for the following school year." (Italics ours.)

Also the court, after stating that the notice was given as required, says:

> "Nothing appearing from which it could be inferred that a contract under the tenure act arose. * * * " (Italics ours.)

It seems to us apparent from this authority and from the language of the act, that the legislative intent is manifest to give assurance to the teaching profession of some degree of certainty in their employment—something akin to civil service in other administrative branches of government. With this intent before us, having in mind that the statute provides that each teacher employed for one year shall be deemed reemployed, except discharged for cause after hearing, or in the case of a probationary teacher, by serving her with a notice in writing on or before June 10th, we conclude that the intent and meaning of the law is as though it read: Permanent teachers cannot be discharged except for good cause after hearing, and probationary teachers cannot be discharged except for good cause after hearing, or by serving them with a written notice on or before June 10th, that their services will not be required for the ensuing year. Service of the written notice shall be made personally or by mailing—and if by mail, shall be complete only when deposited in the mail, provided it is registered. It must be apparent that, except for good cause, the board of trustees could not discharge a probationary teacher on April 1st, let us say, so as to dispense with her services for the remainder of that school year. It must be equally clear that on June 11th they could not dispense with her services except for good cause, for the very obvious reason that the law, operating upon their inaction, has brought into being on that day a new contract for the ensuing year which is just as obligatory upon the board as the one which existed on April 1st. It would follow in logical sequence that the Legislature declared its intention to fix the 10th day of June as the dead line—to make the giving of a written notice before that time the essence of the thing to be done to effectuate the discharge. In such cases the requirements of the statute must be held to be mandatory and not merely directory. People ex rel. McKune v. Weller, 11 Cal. 49, 70 Am. Dec. 754. Another manner of phrasing the effect of the statute is to say that the Legislature has defined the limits of the power or jurisdiction of the board of trustees to discharge a probationary teacher, and this constrains us to declare that its provisions are mandatory. Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction, vol. 2 (2d Ed.) § 611; Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 217, 22 P. 551, 15 Am. St. Rep. 47. In the latter case the language of the court is this:

> "When a statute says an act cannot be done unless performed in a certain mode, the inhibition against performing it in any other way would seem to be, in view of the word 'cannot,' meaning an absence of power to be just as strong and complete as when the statute says that an act, unless done in a certain mode, shall not be valid for any purpose."

[3] This completely disposes of the argument that the provisions of the statute are directory merely, for the reason that the Legislature has said in effect that the board "cannot" discharge a probationary teacher except in the mode and manner specified. This they did not do. Oral—informal notice was not sufficient under the law; the written—unregistered notice was not served upon her until received by her on the 16th; and the registered notice was not mailed until after the contract of reemployment had been brought into being by operation of law.

Judgment reversed.

I concur: CRAIG, Acting P. J.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. I dissent. It is unthinkable that the Legislature should intend to enact any provision which would make the financial interests of a teacher paramount to the best interests, welfare, and proper education of the school children. The whole system of legislation regulating the educational machinery was based upon consideration of the welfare and best interests of the children as the original and fundamental purpose. The proper regulation of the tenure of office and other rights of the teachers was also properly considered and regulated—but the original purpose and fundamental idea was the consideration of the best interests and welfare of the scholars. In every act of the Legislature relating to education, where the intention is not clearly expressed, it must be assumed that the fundamental purpose and primary object of the Legislature was to consider first this welfare and best interests of the children. Every act of the Legislature attempting to regulate the machinery of the system of education must be construed with this elementary and fundamental purpose and intention in mind. No person incompetent, or an improper teacher, for any reason, should be permitted to teach the children. The Legislature has imposed the duty and responsibility of determining and deciding who are and who are not such qualified teachers upon the trustees of the school board. They have this right, duty, and responsibility, and their decision is final in this regard. It is true that the act under consideration is known as the Teachers' Tenure Act, and that the purpose of the Legislature undoubtedly was to protect the teachers and to fix clearly their rights as to their employment as such; but the teachers are employed as a part of the whole scheme and for the purpose of educating the school children. So that in the instant case we have this situation, if we accept the construction of the statute of the prevailing opinion, that after the board had decided that the appellant should not be reemployed as a probationary teacher, they neglected to register the written notice of such decision which was mailed to her on June 8th, two days before the date fixed in the act, and although she had actual verbal notice of this action of the board two days after it was taken, and on the last day of the school year, nevertheless the appellant may insist upon her right to teach and the school children must be taught for another year beginning the following September by a teacher who has been declared, at least by implication, an incompetent or improper person to teach them. It must not be understood that this implies in any way any reflection upon the appellant in this case personally. The record discloses only a local neighborhood controversy, important, no doubt, to the local persons and factions involved. But the court may not concern itself with such matters and must only consider the principles of law involved.

In the instant case the mandatory act was that the board of trustees must decide whether or not the appellant was qualified as a teacher and should be reemployed for another year. They decided she should not be so reemployed. The record does not disclose why, but the board had the responsibility, the duty, and the power to decide this, and their decision was final. This was the determination of the fundamental question involving the best interests and welfare of the children. After deciding this, the statute imposed on them a further duty—to consider the interests of the teacher by giving her notice of their decision that she was not to be reemployed for the succeeding year, so that she might have ample time to govern herself accordingly and make other arrangements. The Legislature provided two methods of giving this notice—either by written notice served personally, or by written notice sent by registered mail prior to June 10th.

In the instant case appellant had actual verbal notice two days after the action of the board, and a written notice mailed on the 8th of June, which, it must be admitted, would have been a sufficient compliance with the statute if it had been registered. So in the last analysis appellant's cause of complaint as to not having received a notice as prescribed by the statute is that the written notice, mailed to her on June 8th, was not registered. In what respect can she claim to have been misled or damaged? There is no such showing made here. The requirement for the return of a registry receipt would seem to be for the convenience of the board rather than the teacher. Buswell v. Supervisors, etc., 116 Cal. 351, at page 354, 48 P. 226. The case of Owens v. Board of Education, 68 Cal. App. 403, 229 P. 881, cited in the prevailing opinion, has, in my opinion, no application here. In that case no question as to the sufficiency of the notice of reemployment was raised. It was assumed that the notice was sufficient. In the instant case the question of the sufficiency of the notice is the main question involved.

The fundamental principle involved in cases of statutory construction, like the present, as the writer understands it, is: Who did the Legislature intend to protect? And so in the case of Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 217, 22 P. 551, 15 Am. St. Rep. 47, also cited in the prevailing opinion, the court justly and equitably held that the intention of the Legislature was to protect the wife in the enjoyment of her rights in the homestead. In the instant case, the school children are to be first protected in their right to have a competent, properly qualified teacher to teach them, and upon the board of trustees is imposed the right and the duty to decide who is so qualified as such a teacher. After they have discharged this duty, then, in justice to the teacher, they must give her such reasonable and timely notice if they decide she is not qualified (as stated above) as will enable her to make other arrangements. Appellant had such notice in the instant case. The arbitrary date of June 10th for this notice to be given has no significance as a particular date. The Legislature might have fixed June 15th, or June 20th, as an indication of the time which they considered would be reasonable.

The paragraph in the statute which provides the procedure for dismissal contains two sections. In the first sentence it is provided that the board may give notice by June 10th that the teacher's services will not be required. There is no question but that notice was given in due time to appellant. The next sentence of the paragraph provides a method for serving the notice which, if followed, will be deemed sufficient. It might well be argued that the statute does not provide that it is obligatory to give the notice in the manner suggested; nor is it provided that actual notice given in some other manner will not be sufficient, and that it "none the less fully served the purpose for which it was designed." Shorr v. City of Azusa, 38 Cal. App. at page 712, 177 P. 515.

The determination of the teacher's qualification to teach is the fundamental consideration, and this is mandatory; the giving of the notice of this determination is directory. In People v. Lake Co., 33 Cal. at page 492, the court says:

> "The books are teeming with cases in which the court has come to the aid of the Legislature, and by construing one provision of an act as mandatory and another as directory, so as to make them harmonize with the principal purpose of the act, have made its operation possible." McCrea v. Haraszthy, 51 Cal. at page 150; Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 148.

In People v. Cook, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) at page 290, the court says:

> "Whether these other provisions of the statute, which have not been strictly observed in this case, are to be regarded as directory, or mandatory or not, must depend upon a sound construction of the nature and object of the requirements."

The judgment should be affirmed.

Where contention of appellants in opening brief was abandoned in the closing brief, such contention will not be considered by the appellate court.

2. Injunction ⟹62(3)—Plaintiffs held not entitled to injunction against alleged violation of private residence restriction in deed, in view of finding showing occupation as residence of house containing five bedrooms.

In action to enjoin alleged violation of uniform building restrictions contained in deed, plaintiffs held not entitled to judgment restricting defendant's use of building to private residential purposes, in view of finding that house is occupied by defendant, his wife, and other members of his household, notwithstanding house contains five bedrooms, since it does not follow that because there are extra bedrooms same are going to be rented.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

KNIGHT, J. This suit was brought to enjoin an alleged violation of certain uniform building restrictions contained in a deed to a lot which formed a part of a tract of land, platted, subdivided, and sold pursuant to a general plan or scheme for the improvement and development of the whole tract. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

The building restrictions in question provided:

> "That the premises shall be used for residence purposes only; that no apartment house, double house, flat, lodging house, hotel, or any building or structure whatever other than a first-class private residence with the customary outbuildings, including a private stable or garage, shall be erected, placed, or permitted on said premises or any part thereof; that such residence shall cost and be fairly worth not less than $5,000. * * *"

The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone, and the main question presented is whether the findings are legally sufficient to support the judgment. The following are the facts as they are established by the findings: The defendant was about to have moved on to the lot acquired by him in said tract an old two-story structure which was in a dilapidated condition and not fairly worth the sum of $5,000, for the purpose of altering and rebuilding the same; and the plaintiffs, claiming that said structure when completed would not be worth $5,000 and would not be a first-class private residence either in construction, appearance, or otherwise, nor in keeping with the other type or character of buildings on said tract, protested in writing to defendant against the same being placed on said lot. The protest was ignored and thereupon plaintiffs commenced this suit, obtained a restraining order, and applied for a temporary injunction. At the time the application for a temporary injunction was heard, however, the trial court found that, notwithstanding said structure was not at that time a first-class dwelling house nor worth the sum of $5,000, it could be converted into a first-class dwelling house and be worth more than $5,000. Upon the grounds mentioned the application for a temporary injunction was denied and the restraining order vacated "without prejudice," however, the court declaring that:

> "Defendant's future work, construction, and alterations upon said lot in connection with said structure so moved onto said lot by them being at his peril should the building when completed not fully comply with the building restriction set up in the complaint herein."

The cause afterwards came on for trial on the merits, and the court found that defendant had altered said structure and prosecuted the construction work to a completion so that said structure at that time was reasonably worth in excess of $5,000, to wit, the sum of $7,500, and did not in any manner violate any of the building restrictions conditions, or reservations imposed by the terms of said deed, but, on the contrary, conformed thereto; and, therefore, judgment was entered in favor of defendant.

[1] Plaintiffs contended in their opening brief that, in the absence of a supplemental answer alleging compliance with the building restrictions between the time the case was at issue and the date of trial, the judgment in defendant's favor is not supported by the pleadings, but this contention was abandoned in the closing brief. Plaintiffs' second contention is that in any event, they were entitled to a judgment restricting defendant's use of the building to private residential purposes, the contention being based upon the following findings:

> "That on some occasions, for short periods, defendant has rented rooms in said structure, prior to removal, to relations and friends while defendant MacReady and his family has resided therein. That said building has five bedrooms." (Italics ours.)

[2] Assuming, as plaintiffs claim, that to rent the rooms in said house would constitute a violation of the "private residence" restriction contained in the deed, and would therefore entitle plaintiffs to injunctive relief there is nothing in the findings indicating that since moving said building on to the lot in question defendant rented or that he threatens or intends to rent any of the rooms therein. True, the building contains five bedrooms, but the findings show that the house is occupied by "the defendant MacReady, his wife, and other members of his household," and it may be inferred therefrom that all of said bedrooms are necessary for the convenient use and occupation of regular members of the family and the servants, or for the accommodation of house guests. At any rate, because a dwelling contains one or two extra bedrooms it does not follow that the same are going to be rented. Defendant therefore cannot be enjoined from doing something which he has not threatened to do, nor is in fact doing.

The court further found that the restriction limiting the use of said lots to "first-class" private residences was indefinite and therefore unenforceable, and plaintiffs attack the soundness of this finding. But whether the trial court was right or wrong in its conclusion on that issue becomes immaterial on this appeal, for the reason that, assuming, as plaintiffs contend, that the restriction is valid, the trial court nevertheless found that it was not violated, and therefore in no event were plaintiffs entitled to a judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MANCHELL. (Cr. 1464.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 17, 1928.

1. Larceny ⚷28(4)—Information stating time, place, and from whom money was stolen held not objectionable for not stating exactly what kind of grand theft was charged (Pen. Code, § 952, and § 950, subd. 2).

In prosecution for grand theft, where information stating time, place, and from whom money was stolen was objected to on appeal as not stating exactly what kind of grand theft was charged in compliance with Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2, held, that objection was without merit, since information complied with section 952, providing that in charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege defendant unlawfully took property of another.

2. Criminal law ⚷1169(2)—Admission of judicial record without establishing it to show flight held not prejudicial, if error, where it was cumulative with testimony (Code Civ. Proc. § 1905).

In prosecution for grand theft, where detective from another state testified to defendant's flight from that state, and judicial record of police court of foreign state was introduced without proving it, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1905, held that, since oral testimony to show flight and document were cumulative in character, document was not prejudicial, even if admission of it was error; all evidence of what occurred in foreign state being expressly limited by court's instructions to purpose of proving flight.

3. Criminal law ⚷720(8)—Comment of prosecutor on statements by defendant in larceny case held not prejudicial, being made to refute inference of innocence and based on evidence.

In prosecution for grand theft, where prosecutor in argument to jury when commenting on statements made by defendant stated that defendant believed he could talk himself out of it, and that he had lot of luck in some other parts of country talking, held, that comment was not prejudicial, being in refutation of any inference of innocence that might be drawn from voluntary character of statements made by defendant to police officers and district attorney based on evidence of activities of defendant elsewhere.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Lee Manchell was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Meyers, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Waldemar Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of grand theft. The appellant was employed by Harley S. Tyler and W. H. Rice, copartners, to manage a water circus which was a part of a Labor Day celebration for the firemen's benefit fund of Fresno in 1927. He was employed on a weekly salary, plus a percentage of profits. He was intrusted with funds for the purpose. At the conclusion of the affair the appellant left for his employer a brief statement of his accounts and a sum of money which purported to be the entire balance in his hands belonging to said Tyler and Rice. Then he left the city, giving a false address. The amount thus left proved to be several hundred dollars short. He was arrested ten days later in Wichita, Kan., on a telegraphic felony warrant from Fresno, but was there booked on a charge of vagrancy and released on a $1,000 bail bond. He forfeited the bail and departed. In October he was located in Birmingham, Ala., where he was arrested and returned to Fresno for trial. The evidence upon which appellant was convicted showed that the particular kind of grand theft of which he was guilty was embezzlement.

The charging part of the information upon which appellant was tried reads as follows:

> "The district attorney for the county of Fresno, state of California, hereby accuses Lee Manchell of a felony, to wit, grand theft, in that the said Lee Manchell on or about the sixth day of September, nineteen hundred and twenty-seven at and in the said county of Fresno, and state of California, unlawfully took the property of Harley S. Tyler and W. H. Rice, consisting of $373.72 in lawful money of the United States, of the value of $373.72 in gold coin of the United States."

[1] Appellant did not demur to the information, but he claims now on this appeal that the information is insufficient in not stating exactly with what kind of grand theft he was charged. He claims this must be done in order to comply with Penal Code, § 950, subd. 2.

The point is without merit. The information states the time, place, and from whom the money was stolen. As to the manner of stealing the money, it is provided in Penal Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, that "in charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant unlawfully took the property of another." Such an information has been held sufficient under the present code sections. People v. Plum (Cal. App.) 265 P. 322.

[2] For the purpose of proving flight of the defendant, the prosecution called as a witness J. E. Maness, a detective in the police force of Wichita, Kan. He testified that he saw the defendant strap a trunk on his automobile in front of his hotel, then have the gasoline tank filled and the tires tested at a gasoline station, and that on the following day when the defendant's case was called the defendant did not appear. There was also received in evidence at the trial a document made and signed by the judge of the police court at Wichita, Kan. The witness Maness testified that this document was an original paper which the judge was required to prepare, sign, and transmit to the city attorney for the purpose of enabling a suit to be commenced for judgment upon the defendant's bail bond. He testified to the genuineness of the signature of the judge, and stated that the paper was an original, not copied from anything. This exhibit appears to be a statement of the case of vagrancy against the defendant, showing the steps of the proceeding and that the bail bond had been declared forfeited. At the trial numerous objections were made to the admission of this document in evidence called Exhibit No. 9, but on this appeal appellant confines his argument to the point that the document is a judicial record of a sister state and as such could be proved only by the method stated in Code of Civil Procedure, § 1905. This section states that it may be proved by the attestation of the clerk and seal of such court, if there be a clerk and seal, together with a certificate of the presiding magistrate that such attestation is in due form. Appellant does not cite nor rely on cognate sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, which deal directly with judgments of justice courts of a sister state. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1921, 1922.

If the proceedings had before the police court in Kansas were required to be proved at the trial as an indispensable part of a cause of action, as where it is claimed to be a binding judgment definitely establishing rights between adverse parties, then this record would call for a decision as to whether the method of proof of a judicial proceeding of a sister state described in section 1905, Code of Civil Procedure, and other sections, is the exclusive method permitted. But this is not such a case. Here the important question is, Did the defendant flee in fear of facing the accusation of crime in California? not what the court did about it after he fled. It has been held that, where a judicial record is offered merely to show that it exists, it may be admitted upon any satisfactory evidence of its identity. Phelps v. Hunt, 43 Conn. 194. The facts and circumstances showing that defendant failed to appear at the trial and showing why he so failed to appear were things that could be testified to by any witness having knowledge of these facts. This was done at the trial by oral testimony independently of the document, Exhibit No. 9. This oral testimony tending to show flight of the accused is also clear enough to make the receipt in evidence of the document cumulative in character, and not prejudicial, even though it should be held to have been error. All the evidence of what occurred in Kansas was expressly limited by the court's instructions to the purpose of proving flight.

[3] The district attorney in his argument to the jury stated:

> "I made him [the defendant] no promise of any kind and he did talk freely. And why? Because he had confidence enough in his gift of gab to talk himself out of it. He had a lot of luck in some other parts of this country talking. When he was in Kansas, and when he was back in Alabama. * * *"

This remark was assigned as prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant. The context of the remark shows that it was made in refutation of any inference of innocence that might be drawn from the voluntary character of the statements made by the defendant to the police officers and district attorney. The evidence of the activities of the defendant in Kansas and Alabama made the remark of the district attorney come within the bounds of legitimate argument before the jury. The record also shows that no error occurred by reason of this remark because the assignment was not properly made.

The judgment is affirmed.

EGAN v. PACIFIC SOUTHWEST TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 5138.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑43(3)—Receipt and agreement to sell held not written authorization to broker, required by statute (Civ. Code, § 1624).

In action for real estate broker's commission where broker relied on receipt from broker for deposit given to owner, and on agreement by owner to sell, reciting terms, as constituting written authorization to sell, required by Civ. Code, § 1624, held, that such instruments did not comply with statute.

2. Brokers 🔑86(3)—Mere giving of check by purchaser to broker, who turned it over to vendor, did not evidence purchaser's acceptance of vendor's offer to sell.

In action for real estate broker's commission, construing memorandum as agreement on part of vendor to pay broker out of purchase price, mere giving of check by alleged purchaser to broker, who in turn gave it to vendor after indorsement, did not evidence acceptance by purchaser of vendor's offer to sell.

3. Brokers 🔑86(3)—Prospective purchaser held not to have contracted to purchase where only evidence was check, which was insufficient to establish acceptance.

In action for real estate broker's commission, where prospective purchaser testified she was ready, able, and willing to purchase property, but did not testify she ever promised to purchase it from vendor, and there was no evidence of such promise aside from check payable to broker and transferred by her to vendor, which check was never cashed, held, that since check was insufficient to establish that offer had been accepted, prospective purchaser had not entered into any contract which would have bound her to complete purchase.

4. Brokers ⚷86(3)—In action for broker's commission, admission of vendor that broker had sold property did not establish sale in absence of authority to make sale or evidence that sale or binding contract was made.

In action for real estate broker's commission, admission of vendor that broker had sold property for her held not sufficient to establish sale, in absence of authority to broker to make sale, and in absence of any evidence that sale was ever consummated or binding contract of sale ever made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by E. S. Egan against the Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, executor of the estate of Rose E. Davis, deceased, for real estate broker's commission. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed Martin M. Levering, Jesse F. Waterman, and A. W. Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, as executor of the will of Rose E. Davis, deceased, for the sum of $1,000 found to be due plaintiff for securing for said Davis a purchaser for certain real estate.

The defense is, first, that there was no agreement or memorandum in writing authorizing or employing plaintiff as agent or broker to sell the real estate for said Davis, and, second, that plaintiff did not procure a purchaser ready, able, or willing to purchase the real estate. Plaintiff relies upon two written instruments and certain corroborative evidence.

The instruments are as follows:

"L. A., Cal., Sept. 1, 1923.

"Received of Mrs. E. S. Egan $500.00 (five hundred dollars) deposit on flats 3804–3806 Wall St. Price to be $11,000.00 (eleven thousand dollars). Rose E. Davis."

"L. A., Cal., 1, 1923.

"I agree to sell flats located at 3806–3804 Wall St. Price to be $11,000.00 (eleven thousand dollars). $10,000.00 (ten thousand dollars) net to me. $1,000.00 (one thousand dollars) for Mrs. E. S. Egan, less escrow charges. Agreed $3,500.00 (thirty-five hundred dollars) down. $7,500.00 (seventy-five hundred dollars) first mortgage at 7 per cent. for three years.

"Rose E. Davis."

[1, 2] The first point discussed in appellant's opening brief is the construction of said written instruments, contending that they do not evidence employment of plaintiff as required by section 1624 of the Civil Code. The writings above set forth do not purport to authorize plaintiff to act for said Davis. That it was not so intended is corroborated by the fact that the prospective purchaser, Miss Tracie, was introduced to said Davis by plaintiff several days before the instruments were executed and at a time when it is not contended by respondent that she had any authority to represent said Davis, and any agreement for the sale, if any there was, appears to have been made on the same day as the alleged authority to plaintiff, and the prospective purchaser's check, although appearing to have been signed on the same day, was made prior to the signing of any writing by said Davis, as indicated by reference to it in the testimony in which it is referred to. Construing the memorandum as an agreement on the part of said Davis, it was at most only a memorandum of an agreement to pay plaintiff $1,000, less escrow charges, out of the sum of $11,000, the price for which said Davis had offered to sell the property. There is no evidence that the prospective purchaser ever accepted said proposition of Davis. A mere giving of a check for $500 by Miss. Tracie to plaintiff and plaintiff in turn turning it over to said Davis after indorsement by plaintiff was not sufficient evidence of acceptance by Miss Tracie of the offer of Davis to sell. Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 352, 33 P. 1105.

[3, 4] As to the second proposition, the prospective purchaser did not enter into any contract which would have bound her to complete the purchase. Although she says she went once or twice to the "escrow" office, she had no conversation or communication with said Davis about meeting her there. There is no evidence as to the fact of why the transaction was not consummated or whether said Davis ever refused to consummate it. Certain it is that said Davis did not make the sale, and she received no money in the transaction or any offer of performance on the part of the prospective purchaser.

There is no evidence as to whether an escrow was ever made or whether any certain escrow office had ever been selected to transact the business. Evidence that said Davis had admitted that plaintiff had sold the property for her is not sufficient to establish that fact in the absence of authority to plaintiff to make the sale or find a purchaser, and in the absence of any evidence that the sale was ever consummated and in the absence of any evidence that any binding contract of sale was ever made.

Although the prospective purchaser testified that she was ready, able, and willing to make the purchase of the property, she did not testify that she ever promised to purchase it from said Davis, and there was no evidence of such promise, aside from the said $500 check payable to plaintiff and transferred by her to said Davis, which check was never cashed and which check in itself was insufficient to establish that said Davis' offer of sale had ever been accepted. There is some indirect evidence that the check was destroyed, but no evidence that it was or was not presented for payment, but the evidence shows that it was never paid by the bank on which it was drawn.

As was said in Gunn v. Bank of California, supra:

> "An agent authorized to sell real estate does not earn his commission by procuring a person to proceed so far as paying a part of the agreed price, but who entered into no obligatory contract of purchase."

See Hicks v. Christeson, 174 Cal. 717, 718, 164 P. 395.

It is corroborated by judicial history that paragraph sixth of section 1624 of the Civil Code was enacted "to prevent the assertion of false claims for compensation by brokers and agents against owners of real estate, which could be done with facility under the former rule." Toomy v. Dunphy, 86 Cal. 639, 642, 25 P. 130, 131.

When a law has been enacted for the purpose of protection against the assertion of unfounded claims, it should be so construed as to effect the object of the enactment. The cases of Patterson v. Torrey, 18 Cal. App. 346, 123 P. 224; Irwin v. Klimper, 56 Cal. App. 434, 205 P. 714; Gunn v. Bank of California, supra; Lindley v. Fay, 119 Cal. 239, 51 P. 333; Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 P. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87—lend support to both of appellant's contentions.

The judgment is reversed.

HERLIHY v. REILLY. (Civ. 5135.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1928.

1. Malicious prosecution 🔑15, 26—To recover for malicious prosecution, plaintiff must show criminal action was instigated through malice and without probable cause.

In order to prevail in actions for damages based on "malicious prosecution," it is incumbent on plaintiff to allege and prove that criminal action, which it is claimed was maliciously prosecuted, was instigated through malice and without probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malicious Prosecution.]

2. Trial 🔑295(1)—In determining effect of given instruction, it must be considered with other instructions.

In determining effect of given instruction, it must be considered with all other instructions given by trial court; and, if on reading the whole body of instructions, law is fairly stated without conflict, fact that one instruction fails to contain complete statement of law applicable to case does not present such condition as necessarily to indicate reversible error.

3. Trial 🔑296(2)—Instruction that plaintiff should recover if no probable cause existed for prosecution of criminal action held not misleading because omitting element of malice, in view of other instructions.

Instruction in malicious prosecution action in effect that, if no probable cause existed for prosecution of criminal action against plaintiff, verdict should be for plaintiff, held not misleading because omitting element of malice, in view of other instructions that, before plaintiff could recover, it must appear in bringing criminal action against plaintiff that defendant was actuated by malice and without probable cause.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1067—Refusing instruction in action for malicious prosecution that fact that plaintiff was not tried was no evidence of want of probable cause held not prejudicial, where facts regarding plaintiff's guilt of crime changed were introduced.

In action for malicious prosecution, refusing instruction that fact that plaintiff was not tried on charge of disturbing peace and that charge was dismissed against her was no evidence of want of probable cause for prosecution held not prejudicial, where all facts with reference to whether defendant in criminal action had actually conducted herself as charged in criminal complaint were introduced in evidence.

5. Malicious prosecution 🔑55—In action for malicious prosecution, under general allegation of damages, plaintiff may recover for injured feelings.

In action for malicious prosecution, under general allegation of damages, plaintiff may be entitled to recover damages for injured feelings.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1)—Unless verdict appears to have been given under influence of passion and prejudice, it cannot be set aside.

Unless verdict appears to have been given under influence of passion and prejudice, it cannot be set aside on appeal.

7. Malicious prosecution 🔑69—$1,000 in action for malicious prosecution for alleged disturbance of peace held not excessive.

Verdict for $1,000 to plaintiff, in action for malicious prosecution of criminal action, in which plaintiff was charged with crime of disturbing the peace by loud and abusive language, quarreling, and traducing to quarrel, and other offensive conduct, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action for damages for malicious prosecution by Katherine Herlihy against Juliet Reilly, sometimes known as Juliet Shelby, and also known as Mary Miles Minter. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil, James C. Sheppard, Jr., and John R. Girling, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against her for damages in an action based upon her alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff in a criminal action in which plaintiff was charged with "the crime of disturbing the peace," in that she did "willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously disturb the peace and quiet of the complainant [this defendant] by loud and abusive language, quarreling, and traducing to quarrel, and other offensive conduct."

The first point presented by appellant is that the trial court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction:

> "If from the evidence in this case you believe that, prior to the filing of the criminal complaint in the justice's court of Pasadena township, plaintiff herein had not used loud or abusive language, or quarreled or traduced defendant, Juliet Reilly, sometimes known as Juliet Shelby and Mary Miles Minter, to quarrel, and was not guilty of any other offensive conduct; and if you further believe that said defendant did not fairly present the facts regarding the conduct of plaintiff herein to J. Russell Morton, the justice of the peace of Pasadena township, then I instruct you, as a matter of law, that the defendant did not have, under such circumstances, probable cause for the filing of such complaint, and your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[1] Appellant first complains of that part of the instruction by which in effect the jury was told that, if no probable cause existed for the prosecution of the criminal action against plaintiff, a verdict should be rendered in her favor. In order to prevail in actions for damages based upon malicious prosecution, the law appears well settled that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that the action which it is claimed was maliciously prosecuted was instigated through malice and without probable cause. Appellant directs attention to the fact that the questioned instruction omitted the essential element of a finding of malice on the part of defendant, and consequently was an authorization by the trial court for the return of a verdict in favor of plaintiff on a finding of a lack in defendant of probable cause only for the institution of the criminal action.

[2, 3] It is a universal rule of law that in determining the effect of a given instruction it must be considered in connection with all other instructions given by the trial court. In other words, by no one instruction is the entire law of the case required to be stated; but, if upon a reading of the whole body of instructions the law is fairly stated without conflict, the fact that one instruction fails to contain a complete statement of the law applicable to the case does not present such a condition as necessarily to indicate reversible error. 24 Cal. Jur. p. 857 et seq. From the record herein it appears that by at least six separate instructions the jury was told that before plaintiff would be entitled to recover in the action it must appear that, in the bringing of the criminal action against plaintiff, defendant was actuated by malice and without probable cause. In addition thereto, the jury was repeatedly instructed in effect that unless the evidence established the fact that in instigating the criminal action against plaintiff defendant was actuated by wrong motives, that is, by some "evil and sinister purpose"—constituting malice—a verdict must be reached in favor of defendant. It therefore becomes clear that, while the instruction under attack was defective in that in itself it did not contain all the foundational elements necessary to the support of a verdict in favor of plaintiff, nevertheless, when such instruction is read together or in connection with either or all of the other instructions relating to the requisites of a valid verdict in favor of plaintiff, it cannot be said to be so far wrong as to have misled the jury to the injury of the defendant in the action.

The case of Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 P. 618, is illustrative of the principle here involved. Therein the plaintiff recovered damages for personal injuries sustained by her by reason of the negligence of the defendant. The contributory negligence of the plaintiff was an issue at the trial. On the appeal it was urged by the appellant that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in giving to the jury the following instruction:

> "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence as charged in the complaint, and that the plaintiff was injured thereby, your verdict should be for the plaintiff, and that whether such negligence appears or is proved by the testimony on the part of the plaintiff or by defendant's own witnesses."

In discussing the effect of the obvious defect in such instruction in its failure to take into consideration the possible contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the court said:

> "* * * This instruction entirely ignores the question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and is, therefore, not in itself a complete and correct statement of the law, and the defendant insists that the judgment should be reversed for this reason. In answer to this contention it is sufficient to say that the rule is well settled here that instructions are to be read and considered as a whole, and the fact that, when taken separately, some of them may fail to enunciate in precise terms, and with legal accuracy, propositions of law does not necessarily render them erroneous. 'It is sufficient if all the instructions taken together, and not being inconsistent with each other or confusing, shall give to the jury a fair and just notion of the law upon the point discussed.' [Citing cases.] Tested by this rule, we do not think the particular instruction complained of could possibly have misled the jury."

And, again, after directing attention to other instructions given by the court in which the principle of contributory negligence applicable to the case was announced, the opinion of the Supreme Court continues:

> "It will thus be seen that the jury were over and over again instructed in clear and explicit language that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless she was at the time of the accident herself exercising ordinary care to avoid the injury of which she complained, and it is not reasonable to suppose that the jury was misled to the prejudice of appellant because the first instruction omitted to say anything upon the subject of the effect of contributory negligence upon plaintiff's right of recovery."

The syllabus in McFaul v. Madera F. & T. Co., 134 Cal. 313, 66 P. 308, contains the following:

> "An instruction directing the minds of the jury to an inherent defect in the machinery, which the defendant might have discovered by reasonable diligence, and of which the plaintiff was ignorant, and could not discover in the ordinary course of his employment, and predicating recovery thereon, is not misleading, because not comprising every element of recovery, where all of the elements essential to a recovery by the plaintiff were fully set forth in other portions of the charge, which must be construed together with such instruction."

And see, generally, 24 Cal. Jur. p. 861, where the California authorities are cited.

Among other things, it may be noted that the criticized instruction contains the statement that, if from the evidence the jury should find that on the occasion in question the defendant in the criminal action had not used loud or abusive language, or quarreled with or traduced the complaining witness therein to quarrel, or was not guilty of any other offensive conduct, etc., no probable cause existed for instigating the charge against the defendant in the criminal action. The verdict is tantamount to a finding that the defendant in the criminal action was not guilty of any or either of the several charges of misconduct on her part as specified in the instruction. But while such a finding in itself probably would be insufficient as a basis for a conclusion that the criminal action was instigated from malice by the defendant against the plaintiff, when such implied finding is considered in connection with an instruction given by the trial court to the jury that malice might be inferred from the fact (if the jury so found) that the prosecution of the defendant in the criminal action was sought by the prosecutrix, not from a desire on her part that peace and order be preserved, but to satisfy some personal grudge, the conclusion is strengthened that in the verdict the finding is written, at least between the lines, that malice in fact was present in the mind of the prosecutrix in instigating the criminal action which was the basis for the case at bar. In any event, it is most manifest that, had the instruction of which complaint is made contained the specific additional requirement of malice necessary to the maintenance of the action and the support of a verdict for plaintiff herein, no different result would have been reached.

Appellant presents further criticism of the instruction in question, in that the verdict in favor of plaintiff is predicated upon what the jurors believed as to whether prior to the issuance of the criminal complaint defendant fairly presented the facts regarding plaintiff's conduct to the justice of the peace before whom defendant appeared and swore to the complaint in the criminal action, rather than what was the honest and reasonable belief of defendant regarding the alleged criminal conduct of plaintiff. But while from a strict literal construction such instruction may convey the meaning which appellant would attribute to it, when read with other instructions given to the jury its purport is entirely in harmony with appellant's contention of what constitutes the law with reference to the subject-matter of the instruction. At any rate, as heretofore suggested, the point to which appellant refers is so thoroughly and exhaustively covered by other instructions given by the trial court to the jury that, if by any stretch the point in the abstract might be considered as well taken, by reason of such other declarations of the law its force is spent and it becomes of no avail in the premises.

A third objection to the instruction raised by appellant is that by the language contained therein the jury, in accordance with its "belief," was authorized to determine whether the defendant in the criminal action had so conducted herself that in effect she had committed "no breach of the peace." In the main, such objection is subject to the same criticisms as heretofore have been indulged with reference to the other points presented by appellant relating to the alleged frailties of such instruction. But, in addition thereto, the point is not available to appellant because, taken in connection with the whole of such instruction, its apparent meaning is that, if from the evidence the jury believed that as a matter of fact on the occasion in question the defendant in the criminal action did not use loud or abusive language, etc., notwithstanding which the prosecutrix intentionally misrepresented to the justice of the peace that she had done so, no probable cause existed for the issuance of the criminal complaint.

[4] Appellant predicates error on the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury an instruction requested by defendant that:

> "The fact that plaintiff, Herlihy, was not tried on the charge of disturbing the peace and that the charge was dismissed against her is no evidence of want of probable cause for the prosecution."

While the authorities are in conflict, their weight probably is to the effect that such an instruction should be given. However, as the evidence in the instant case discloses the fact that the criminal action was dismissed "upon the motion of the complaining witness," it would seem that, in accordance with the special rule announced in some of the authorities, in such circumstances at least, a dismissal of the action was some evidence going to the merits of the question of probable cause; but in any event, in view of the fact that all the facts with reference to whether the defendant in the criminal action had actually conducted herself as charged in the criminal complaint were introduced in evidence, it is clear that, assuming, without deciding, that the instruction should have been given to the jury, the effect of its refusal could not have been that thereby the plaintiff was awarded a verdict when otherwise the verdict would be in favor of the defendant. In other words, in the circumstances, the refusal of the instruction was not prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant.

It is also urged by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. It would serve no useful purpose to herein set forth the evidence adduced on the trial of the action. Suffice it to say that, after an examination of the evidence, this court is convinced that it sufficiently meets the requirements of the law to justify the conclusion reached by the jury in its verdict and by the trial court in its judgment thereon.

[5-7] Finally, appellant complains that the verdict in the sum of $1,000 was excessive. Attention is directed to the fact that plaintiff's damage for loss of time only was the sum of $16; but it is clear that such an item would fail to take into consideration possible injury to the feelings of plaintiff occasioned through and by the alleged malicious prosecution. In the case of Shatto v. Crocker, 87 Cal. 629, 25 P. 921, it is ruled that in an action of the nature of that here in question, under a general allegation of damages, the plaintiff may be entitled to recover for injured feelings. In any event, if nothing was allowed by the jury on account of the humiliation suffered by plaintiff by reason of her malicious prosecution, the rule is well established that, unless the verdict appears to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice, it cannot be set aside. Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 366, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007. Taking into consideration the circumstances present at the time and immediately following the arrest of plaintiff, it cannot be said that the verdict was excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

92 Cal. App. 52

VEDDER v. BIRELEY et al. (Civ. 3506.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1928.

1. Evidence ⚷557—Excluding testimony of expert witness, where his answers to questions regarding speed of automobile at time of accident were evasive and unsatisfactory, held not abuse of discretion.

In action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by automobile, excluding testimony offered by plaintiff concerning experiments made by an expert in an attempt to show rate of speed at which automobile driven by defendant was traveling at time of accident, where answers of expert to other questions were evasive and unsatisfactory, held not abuse of discretion warranting reversal.

2. Evidence ⚷553(1)—Excluding expert's answer to hypothetical question whether brakes were properly adjusted on car leaving skid marks continuous on one side and intermittent on other held error.

In action by pedestrian for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by automobile, excluding testimony of expert witness in answer to hypothetical question based on conditions indicated and calling for an answer as to whether brakes on such a car leaving such marks were properly adjusted held error, since evidence was pertinent and material on question of condition and adequacy of brakes.

3. Automobiles ⚷246(41)—Instructions in action by pedestrian struck by automobile regarding statutory duty to provide adequate brakes held improperly refused under evidence (Motor Vehicle Act).

In action by pedestrian for personal injuries sustained when struck by automobile, refusing instructions regarding duty to provide adequate brakes and that failure to use reasonable care to comply with Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) provision regarding brakes would be negligence, as matter of law, held error, under evidence showing that car traveled some 93 feet from time brakes were applied until it stopped after hitting tree, and that tires on curb side were flattened out, and that rim of front wheels cut gashes in concrete curb.

4. Automobiles 🔑246(4)—Refusing instruction that greater amount of care was required of motorist than of pedestrian struck held error.

In action by pedestrian for personal injuries sustained when struck by automobile, refusing instruction that defendant and plaintiff were both chargeable with only exercise of reasonable care, but that greater amount of such care was required of defendant at time of accident by reason of fact that he was driving and operating an automobile which was capable of inflicting death or injury upon others on highway held error, since motorist was charged by law with higher degree of care than pedestrian.

5. Automobiles 🔑246(4)—Refusing instruction that motorist, striking pedestrian, using busy thoroughfare, was bound to use reasonable care to anticipate presence of others held error.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by automobile, refusing instruction that defendant was bound to use reasonable care to anticipate presence on street in question of other persons having equal rights with himself to be there and that failure on his part to use such reasonable care would be negligence held error, where street in question was a busy city thoroughfare and street car had just stopped to permit plaintiff to alight therefrom.

6. Automobiles 🔑246(6)—Instruction that, until motorist saw child struck, he could assume that no one would appear behind street car held erroneous.

In action by pedestrian struck by automobile, instruction that, until defendant saw child, he had right to assume that no one would appear behind street car and that he was not called upon to act until he actually saw that there was somebody there held erroneous.

7. Automobiles 🔑164(1)—Motorist seeing street car stop must anticipate some one might appear from behind car and have automobile under requisite control.

Motorist seeing street car stop had duty to anticipate that some one might appear from behind street car and to have his automobile under requisite control, so that if situation demanded it he could slow down or stop within reasonable limits.

8. Automobiles 🔑246(6)—Instruction in effect that, regardless of motorist's negligence before seeing pedestrian, if from that time on he acted with reasonable care, pedestrian struck could not recover held erroneous.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by automobile, instruction in effect that no matter how reckless or negligent defendant may have been prior to time he saw plaintiff, if from that time on he acted with reasonable care, plaintiff could not recover held erroneous.

9. Automobiles 🔑159—Where emergency is created by motorist through his negligence, he cannot avoid liability on ground his acts were done in stress of emergency.

Where emergency is created by motorist or where he brought about perilous situation by his own negligence, he cannot avoid liability on ground that his acts were done in stress of emergency.

10. Automobiles 🔑243(7)—Length of skid marks could be considered by jury in determining rate of automobile's speed.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by automobile, length of skid marks could be considered by jury in determining rate of speed.

11. Automobiles 🔑243(7)—Distance car traveled after brakes were applied could be considered by jury in determining rate of speed.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by automobile, fact that car traveled some 90 feet after brakes were applied could be considered by jury as basis for computing rate of speed and amount of control exercised by driver.

12. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction that there was no evidence that automobile striking pedestrian was going more than 20 miles an hour held erroneous as charging jury regarding matters of fact (Const. art. 6, § 19).

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by automobile, instruction that there was no evidence that automobile was going at more than 20 miles an hour at time of accident, where evidence showed that wheels skidded for 63 feet and that car stopped only after colliding with tree, and other facts showing greater speed held erroneous as charging jury with respect to matters of fact, in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Genevieve Vedder, by her guardian ad litem, D. G. Vedder, against Frank W. Bireley and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward Winterer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiff, a minor of the age of 7 years, to recover for personal injuries received by her when she was struck by an automobile owned by defendant Bireley and operated by defendant Becker. Trial was had before a jury, and the verdict was for defendants. The appeal is from the judgment rendered upon the verdict.

The accident occurred on the south side of Third street, in the city of Los Angeles, between Norton avenue and Westminster. At the scene of the accident, Third street is approximately 56 feet in width, from curb to curb, and has thereon two sets of car tracks. It is also admitted that Third street, at the point of the occurrence, is a busy thoroughfare, where traffic is restricted to 20 miles per hour.

At Third street there is a jog in Norton avenue, the west curb of the portion of Norton avenue which runs north of Third street being offset approximately 10 feet to the east of the east curb of Norton avenue as it runs south from Third street.

The accident occurred at a point approximately 95 feet east of the east line of Norton avenue as it runs north from Third street.

Just prior to the accident the plaintiff had been a passenger on a street car of the Los Angeles Railway Company, which was west bound on Third street and which had come to a stop to allow the plaintiff, and a little boy escorting her, to alight, with its rear end at a point approximately 90 feet east of the easterly line of Norton avenue as it runs north, and just opposite a driveway, which is shown on Defendant's Exhibit I and on Plaintiff's Exhibits I, II, and III as the second driveway east of Norton avenue. The plaintiff and the boy accompanying her alighted from the rear of the street car, and passed around the rear of the car and south across Third street. At this time the defendant Frank R. Becker was driving the truck in question east on Third street. When the plaintiff got between the two sets of car tracks, she broke away from the boy with her and ran directly across the street and towards the most easterly of the two driveways.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to where the defendant's truck was at the time the plaintiff started to run, but in any event the defendant Becker applied his brakes when at a point opposite the center of the sidewalk running along the east side of Norton avenue as it runs north from Third street, and kept them applied until the truck came to a stop with its front end against a tree which was 93 feet east of the point at which the brakes were first applied. The plaintiff's course was practically due south across Third street to a point in the driveway between the sidewalk and the curb at the south side of Third street. The defendant's course was a diagonal one from a point on or near the west-bound car track to the point of impact, which was in the driveway and just south of the southerly curbed line of Third street.

As a result of the accident plaintiff sustained a fracture of the femur of the right leg and a fracture of the tibia of the left leg, and the soft tissues were torn from the jawbone from the center of the chin along the left side of the jawbone, and sustained a long, disfiguring scar leading from the left-hand corner of her mouth for about 2½ inches diagonally toward the left ear, which scar is permanent.

Appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment upon the ground of errors arising out of the rulings in the matter of evidence, and upon instructions given and refused. We will take these up in the order in which they are presented by appellant.

[1] The court sustained objections to the admission of certain testimony offered by plaintiff concerning experiments made by an expert in an attempt to show the rate of speed at which the automobile of defendants was traveling at the time of the accident. These experiments were made with an automobile similar to the one which caused the injury. The answers of the expert to other questions were evasive and unsatisfactory, and when he was asked by the court as to the ultimate fact in dispute (the distance a Ford car can be stopped in, after brakes are applied and while going 20 miles per hour) he replied, "That depends on the condition of the brakes and condition of the tires." This really was an answer to the question, but, aside from that, the admission of such evidence is largely committed to the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be reversed on appeal, in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of that discretion. There is no such showing here. Maris v. Crummey, 55 Cal. App. 573, 204 P. 259. This assignment of error is without merit.

[2] There was evidence that the automobile of defendants left skid marks some 63 feet in length, from the time the brakes were applied until it struck plaintiff. The mark made by the right wheel was solid and distinct, while the marks made by the left wheel were intermittent. It was claimed by appellant that these marks indicated that the brakes were not adequate to promptly check the speed and bring the motor vehicle to a stop. Cal. Motor Vehicle Act 1923, § 94 (St. 1923, p. 545). Witness Langbein, for plaintiff, qualified as an expert in the matter of automobile brakes. He was asked a hypothetical question, based upon the conditions indicated, and calling for an answer as to whether the brakes on such a car, leaving such marks, were properly adjusted. The court rejected the said testimony upon the sole ground that it was immaterial. This was error. The evidence was pertinent and material upon a vital fact in the case, viz., the condition and adequacy of the brakes. The witness had qualified as an expert upon the matter in question, and his peculiar skill and knowledge of such matters, not common to men in general, enabled him to draw an inference as to the condition of the brakes which may have materially aided the jury in an attempt to correctly solve the question before them. Vallejo R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 P. 238.

[3] The court refused to give the following instruction, which was requested by plaintiff:

"You are further instructed that the Vehicle Act of the state of California in force and effect at the time of the accident in question further provided in part as follows:

" 'Every motor vehicle operated upon a public highway shall be provided at all times with brakes which shall be adequate to properly check the speed of and to stop such motor vehicle.'

"And you are further instructed that the failure to use reasonable care to comply with said provision of the law would be negligence as a matter of law, and therefore, if you find from a preponderance of all of the evidence that the defendants failed to use reasonable care to have said motor vehicle, operated by them, provided at the time of the accident with brakes which were adequate to promptly check the speed of and to stop said vehicle, and that such failure was a proximate cause of the accident in question, then your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff, unless you should further find from a preponderance of all of the evidence, and under the instructions of the court, that the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the accident in question.

"Refused except as given in the instructions of court."

Respondents seek to justify the refusal to give said instruction upon the ground that there was no evidence before the jury upon the question involved therein, to wit, the condition of the brakes upon defendants' automobile. We cannot agree with respondents in their construction of the record in the case. There was evidence that the car traveled some 93 feet from the time the brakes were applied until it stopped, and it only stopped then because it hit a tree. The two tires on the curb side of the car were flattened out, and the rim of the front wheels cut large gashes in the concrete curb, which was struck and jumped before the tree ended the journey. Certainly the jury could very reasonably have drawn the inference from these facts that the brakes on the car were not properly adjusted, and that defendants were therefore negligent in failing to comply with the said provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. The court, in refusing to submit this issue to the jury, committed error, from which prejudice must inevitably have resulted.

[4] The court refused, on request of plaintiff, to give the following instruction:

"The defendant Becker and the plaintiff were both chargeable with only the exercise of reasonable care, but a greater amount of such care was required of the defendant Becker at the time of the accident in question by reason of the fact that he was driving and operating an automobile, which was capable of inflicting death or injury upon others on the highway.

"Refused except as given in instructions of court."

We believe the learned trial judge erred in failing to give the foregoing instruction. The driver of a motor vehicle is in charge and control of a dangerous instrumentality, capable of inflicting serious and often fatal injuries, and for that reason he is charged by the law with a higher degree or greater amount of care than the pedestrian. Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743; Weihe v. Rathjen Co., 34 Cal. App. 302, 167 P. 287; 42 C. J. 1035, § 780.

[5-7] The court refused to give the following instruction at request of plaintiff:

"You are instructed that the defendant Frank R. Becker was bound to use reasonable care to anticipate the presence on Third street of other persons having equal rights with himself to be there, and that a failure on his part to use such reasonable care would be negligence."

And on the subject-matter gave the following instruction:

"Now, the defendant had a perfect right to travel where he was traveling. If you find that he was traveling on the south track, he had a perfect right to travel there. There was not the slightest negligence in his traveling there on that track, and until he saw the child he had a right to assume that no one would appear behind that street car. He was not called upon to act until he actually saw that there was somebody there. Until he did see, I say he had a right to assume that there would not anybody come from behind that street car."

In our opinion, the court erred in both refusing the instruction offered and in giving the one in lieu thereof. It is unquestionably the rule that the driver of a motor vehicle, particularly when he is using a busy city thoroughfare, must keep a vigilant watch ahead for pedestrians, and particularly at places where the conditions are such that there are special reasons for anticipating the presence of pedestrians. 42 C. J. 909, § 624. The street car had just stopped, in the instant case, to permit plaintiff to alight therefrom. The driver of the automobile saw the street car stop. Under these circumstances, the court, instead of telling the jury that the driver had the right to assume that no one would appear from behind the street car, should have instructed them that it was the duty of the driver to anticipate that someone might appear from behind said car, and to have his automobile under the requisite control, so that, if the situation demanded it, he could slow down or stop within reasonable limits. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125; Zarzana v. Neve Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066.

[8, 9] Several instructions were given upon the question of imminent peril. They were all to the effect that if the driver of the automobile, after he first saw plaintiff, acted as a reasonable and prudent man would act under the circumstances, he was not guilty of negligence. In effect, the jury were told that no matter how reckless or negligent said driver may have been, prior to the time he saw the little girl, if from that time on he acted with reasonable care, plaintiff could not recover. Such is not the law. There are certain conditions under which one is excused from adopting cautionary measures which should otherwise have been taken, and where actions, which under ordinary circumstances would constitute negligence, may be held to be those which a reasonably prudent man would take, under similar circumstances. This is the doctrine of "imminent peril." It is simply stating, in another way, the familiar test as to what conduct will constitute negligence, to wit, Did the party charged with negligence omit to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or did he do something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do, under similar circumstances? "One who, without negligence upon his part, is suddenly confronted with imminent danger or seeming imminent danger, is not required to exercise that degree of care and skill which is required in the commission of an act after careful deliberation; he is required to act only as a reasonably prudent man would act, under similar circumstances." 19 Cal. Jur. 598, § 36. The imminent peril must arise from a sudden emergency, but where that emergency is created by the automobilist, or where he brought about the perilous situation, through his own negligence, he cannot avoid liability upon the ground that his acts were done in the stress of emergency. 42 C. J. 891; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066.

One cannot shield himself behind an emergency created by his own negligence. The rule can be invoked only by those who are without fault. The vice of these instructions is that they are not predicated upon the further premise that the driver of the car was free from negligence when he first saw the plaintiff. If his brakes were faulty at the time he first saw her, and he was negligent in that respect, and for that reason he struck her, these instructions would permit him to virtually take advantage of his own wrong and secure immunity from liability upon the ground that he was confronted with a "sudden peril." The same reasoning would apply if the driver had been going at an excessive rate of speed, when he first saw plaintiff. These observations must be read in the light of the fact that there was evidence before the jury that the automobile was traveling at an excessive rate of speed, and that the brakes thereon were not properly adjusted. The instructions should not have been given.

[10-12] The court instructed the jury that there was no evidence that the automobile was going at more than 20 miles an hour (the legal limit) at the time of the accident. This was the testimony of the driver of the car, and it was adopted by the court as an undisputed fact in the case. But there was substantial evidence in the record which would have justified the jury in finding that the driver was going at a far greater speed than 20 miles an hour. For 63 feet the wheels of his Ford car skidded over a pavement which was level and not wet, and the course of his vehicle was only brought to a conclusion by contact with a tree which was inside the curb. The curb was badly dented by the wheel rims, as the tires flattened out. The length of the skid marks could be considered by the jury in determining the rate of speed. Briley v. Nussbaum, 122 Kan. 438, 252 P. 223; Tischler v. Steinholtz, 99 N. J. Law, 149, 122 A. 880. In addition thereto, were the other facts and circumstances pointed out. The fact that the car traveled some 90 feet after the brakes were applied, could also have been considered by the jury as the basis for computing the rate of speed and the amount of control exercised by the driver. Ortmann v. Leath Co., 187 Wis. 616, 205 N. W. 397. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has very aptly stated, in this connection:

> "Nor do we see that the court erred * * * in permitting the jury to take into consideration, in judging of the speed of the car, the distance which the machine traveled before it came to a stop, after Mr. Lorah was struck. That was an element very properly to be considered. The very purpose in running slowly is to enable the driver to bring the automobile quickly to a halt in case of emergency. The test of control is the ability to stop quickly and easily. When this result is not accomplished, the inference is obvious that the car was running too fast, or that proper effort to control it was not made." Lorah v. Rinehart, 243 Pa. 231, 89 A. 967.

The giving of this instruction was in direct violation of the provisions of our Constitution, which expressly forbids the judge from charging the jury with respect to matters of fact. Const. Cal. art. 6, § 19.

It is obvious and patent that if the foregoing errors had not been committed the outcome of the trial might have been otherwise. Plaintiff was entitled to a fair trial upon the merits of the controversy, and we believe that she was deprived of this.

The judgment is reversed.

JUDGE v. WARDEN.

(Civ. 6142.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1928.

1. Taxation 🔑734(1)—Error, if any, in sale for tax in excess of amount authorized, held not actionable in proceeding to register lands (Land Title Act).

In proceedings under the Land Title Act (2 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 3611), for registration of land, where defendant contended that property had been sold for excessive tax, where it appeared that amount collected exceeded amount authorized because allowance for delinquency was too liberal, held that error, if any, was not actionable.

2. Taxation 🔑734(7)—Explanatory note appended to delinquent notice held no part of delinquent notice (Pol. Code, § 3764).

In proceeding to register lands, where defendant contended that land was sold for taxes and there was no designation of amount included in sale price in delinquent notice because of contents of explanatory note which tax collector appended to delinquent notice, held that explanatory note was no part of delinquent notice as required by Pol. Code, § 3764.

3. Taxation 🔑734(7)—Misrecital of date in explanatory note appended to delinquent notice held not misleading, where correct date appeared several places in notice, since notice was to be read as whole (Land Title Act).

In proceedings to register title to lands under Land Title Act (2 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 3611), where defendant contended that delinquent notice was void because of mistaken date in explanatory note appended to delinquent list, although correct date was used in several places on face of notice as published, held that misrecital contained could have misled no one, since notice was to be read as whole.

4. Records 🔑9(4)—Petitioner held entitled to registration under statute, although he did not have title by adverse possession, where his predecessors did (Land Title Act, § 8).

In proceedings under Land Title Act (2 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 3611) to register title to certain lands, petitioner, who did not have title by adverse possession, held entitled to registration under section 8, where his predecessors in interest did have title by adverse possession.

5. Records 🔑9(4)—Petitioner, holding under tax deed conveying fee, held entitled to registration without reference to adverse possession (Land Title Act).

In proceeding under Land Title Act (2 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 3611), for registration of certain lands, where petitioner held fee title under tax deed, held that he was entitled to registration without reference to adverse possession.

6. Taxation 🔑658(3)—Addenda notice, stating date and hour at which land would be sold by tax collector, which complied with every statutory requirement, held effective (St. 1913, p. 556).

Addenda notice, which quite definitely stated that in tax collector's office, in certain county, on certain day, and at certain hour, tax collector would sell property, which complied with statute in force at that time (St. 1913, p. 556), held effective.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

In the matter of the application of C. D. Rogers and others, for registration of certain land under Land Title Act; Barney Judge, petitioner, opposed by Grace P. Warden. From a judgment for the petitioner, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Catherine A. McKenna and J. Irving McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Barney Judge filed a petition to register certain lands under the Land Title Act (2 Deering's General Laws 1923, p. 3611). The defendant, Grace P. Warden, appeared and answered. A trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the petitioner. From a judgment entered thereon, the defendant, Grace P. Warden, has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The plaintiff Barney Judge holds a purported tax title. If the tax deed under which he claims is valid, the judgment should be affirmed, otherwise it should be reversed.

[1] The defendant contends that the property was sold for an excessive tax. In making this point, she called to our attention that, for the purpose of aiding the holding of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, certain amendments to the Constitution were made and certain statutes were enacted authorizing the raising of the sum of $1,250,000 for the fiscal year 1913 by the levy of a direct tax; that prior to making the levy the state board of equalization forwarded its order to the board of supervisors, fixing the rate of 2 mills on each $100 of taxable property of Los Angeles county; that said fraction was adopted by the board of supervisors in computing the rate for state and county taxes for the year 1913, and that thereafter the tax was levied and collected as so computed; that the amount that should have been collected pursuant to the Constitution and the statutes was $1,250,000; that the amount that was actually collected was $1,270,000, and that there was therefore collected $20,000 in excess of the amount required. Dividing $20,000 by the amount of the combined assessment rolls of the state, the defendant ascertains her multiple, and, by multiplying the assessed valuation of the lands in suit by that multiple, she obtains what she claims to be an excessive tax. Thereupon she cites and relies on Boston Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie, 67 Cal. 485, 8 P. 22; Knox v. Higby, 76 Cal. 264, 18 P. 381; Bucknall v. Story, 36 Cal. 67. The cases are not in point. Each one involved an instance where one of the public officers made an error in computing a tax or in setting down on the tax records the amount of the computation. The record before us shows no error. The tax was levied in all respects as required by law so far as this record shows. However, it transpired that the allowance made for delinquency was too liberal, and more money was actually collected than the public officers were attempting to collect. No authority has been called to our attention which supports the contention of the defendant. If the point is good, it probably applies to a majority of the funds for which each annual levy is made. This is so because it can be seen at once that the computation of the body making the levy of an ad valorem tax must at all times be an approximation. It may result in collecting a few dollars too much or a few dollars too little. But the error, if any, is not actionable.

[2] The defendant also contends there was "no designation of the amount in the notice included in the sale price in the delinquent notice of sale for penalties, costs, and interest." The defendant does not contend that the minimum amount set opposite the description is not the correct total of all taxes, penalties, and costs; but her point is based on the contents of the explanatory note which the tax collector appended to the delinquent notice before publishing it in 1914. That explanatory note is no part of the delinquent notice as required by section 3764 of the Political Code. The explanatory note was inserted ex industria by the tax collector for the purpose of showing that certain figures were used to designate money—dollars or cents, as the fact might be. In the case of Bussenius v. Warden, 71 Cal. App. 717, 236 P. 371, the facts before the court showed that the notice of delinquent tax sale did not conform to Political Code, § 3764, but was in violation thereof in this, that it recited that the sale would be made for taxes and costs and did not state that it would be made for "penalties." That error is not presented by the record in the case before us.

[3] The same explanatory note so appended to the delinquent list contained a recital "in the foregoing delinquent tax list for 1912 of the county of Los Angeles." The defendant calls attention to the misrecital of 1912 instead of the true date 1913, and thereupon she claims that the notice was void. The plaintiff replies that the misrecital was but a typographical error, and that the typographical error appeared on the face of the notice itself. The reply is a sufficient answer. Excerpts from the delinquent notice for 1913 are set forth in the transcript. The correct date is used in several different places on the face of the notice as published. The misrecital contained in the explanatory note, which was also on the face of the notice as published, could not have misled any one. The notice was to be read as a whole. Stuart v. Smith (Cal. App.) 262 P. 348.

[4, 5] The defendant contends that the plaintiff did not have title by adverse possession and that therefore he was not entitled to registration under section 8 of the Land Title Act. However, there is evidence in the record showing that the plaintiff's predecessors in interest did have title by adverse possession. Furthermore, the plaintiff also argues that his tax deed conveyed to him a fee-simple title, and that one who holds a fee-simple title has the right of registration without reference to adverse possession, and he cites and relies on In re Cox, 63 Cal. App. 175, 218 P. 441. That case fully supports him.

[6] In her closing brief, the defendant quotes the caption to the "addenda" notice, and claims the notice was ineffective. Numitor Gold Mining Co. v. Katzer (Cal. App.) 256 P. 464. The point is not well taken. The addenda notice in the instant case is set forth in the transcript. It is worded very differently from the notice which was under consideration in the Numitor Case. Quite definitely it stated that in the tax collector's office in the county of Los Angeles, commencing on July 3, 1919, at 9 a. m., the tax collector would sell the property. Furthermore, it complied in every respect with every call of the statute (Pol. Code, § 3764), as the statute was worded at that time (Stats. 1913, c. 299, p. 556).

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

COLLINS v. CALIFORNIA STREET CABLE R. CO. (Civ. 6082.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷930(1)—Where evidence was conflicting, but verdict favored plaintiff, reviewing court must take facts appearing in testimony most favorable to plaintiff.

Where evidence was conflicting, but jury's verdict favored plaintiff, reviewing court was required, on defendant's appeal, to take facts as they appeared in the testimony most favorable to plaintiff.

2. Street railroads ⚷117(23)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian struck by street car, and shown to have looked in both directions before crossing street, held for jury.

Contributory negligence of pedestrian struck by street car, and shown to have looked in both directions before he crossed the street, and to have taken a position which he assumed to be free from danger, held for jury.

3. Negligence ⚷136(9)—As general rule, when reasonable minds might differ on contributory negligence, it is for jury.

The general rule is that, when the question of contributory negligence is one on which reasonable minds might differ, it is one of fact which must be left to the jury, and not one of law for the court.

4. Street railroads ⚷103(2)—Last clear chance doctrine held applicable, where pedestrian was struck by street car whose motorman saw pedestrian in position of danger at point 125 feet distant.

In action for injuries by pedestrian struck by street car, evidence showing that pedestrian assumed a position between the tracks which he kept without change until struck down by street car, and that motorman saw pedestrian in such position, and recognized his danger at a point 125 feet distant, held to render last clear chance doctrine applicable.

5. Trial ⚷89—Striking motorman's testimony as to what he thought injured pedestrian was going to do held not error, where testimony was inconsistent with his other testimony.

In action for personal injury by pedestrian struck by street car, ruling striking out motorman's answer to question as to what he thought injured person was going to do when he saw pedestrian in his perilous position held not error, where admission thereof would merely have created an inconsistency with motorman's other positive testimony of what he saw and knew relative to pedestrian's peril.

6. Trial ⚷89—In action by pedestrian for injury by street car, striking testimony of frequency of pedestrians safely standing between cars held not error.

In action for personal injury by pedestrian struck by street car while standing between passing cars, ruling striking out testimony of witnesses as to frequency of pedestrians safely standing between passing cars held not error, where such was not an issue, and evidence clearly disclosed that injured person was not standing in such position of safety, but that he was standing in the path of the car.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by William W. Kirkham against the California Street Cable Railroad Company, in which, on plaintiff's death, Ethel Collins, as executrix of the last will and testament of William K. Kirkham, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wright & Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco (Randell Larson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for damages for personal injuries caused by his being struck by a cable car operated by the defendant. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,335. From the judgment following the verdict, the defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] Testimony of the eyewitnesses to the accident is somewhat conflicting, but, the verdict of the jury having favored the plaintiff, it is necessary on this appeal to take the facts as they appear in the testimony most favorable to him. Pursuing this course, we find the plaintiff, a man of 71 years of age, was attempting to cross California street at its intersection with Van Ness avenue at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, passing from the northwesterly to the southwesterly corner; that, before leaving the sidewalk on the northwesterly corner of this intersection, he looked in both directions, and saw an eastbound cable car approaching on the southerly track but did not see any car approaching on the northerly track from the east; that, as he approached the northerly rail of the double tracks of the company, he again looked in both directions, but saw no car approaching from the east. The east-bound car had then stopped at the intersection with Van Ness avenue, and plaintiff walked over to a point between the two lines of track, and stopped approximately at the middle of the standing car, as he was unable to pass behind it, because an automobile which had been following behind this car blocked his passage. Plaintiff stood in this position in a space between the two sets of rails of six feet one inch, but which was narrowed to two feet one inch when cars were passing each other on the two sets of rails. While standing in this position the east-bound car started on its way, and plaintiff turned his position slightly to the west in order to observe the automobile which was closely following this car. While standing in this position, he was struck by a west-bound car, and thrown violently to the pavement causing the injuries for which he sued.

The theory of the plaintiff is that he thus stood in a position of danger because of the east-bound car having stopped at the intersection and because of the automobile closely following it, and that, while in this position of danger, the defendant's agent operating the west-bound car, though he observed plaintiff's perilous position before he started to cross Van Ness avenue (a distance of 125 feet), nevertheless continued on his way without stopping until after the plaintiff had been struck. It is the theory of the defendant that its agent was not negligent in the operation of his car, and that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, but, in answer to this, the plaintiff argues that the defendant's agent could have avoided the accident if he had endeavored to do so, and that the last clear chance doctrine must be applied.

[2, 3] It is true, as pointed out by appellant, that from the time that the motorman observed respondent he sounded the gong upon his car, and that, as he continued to proceed over Van Ness avenue, he started shouting at the respondent, and continued an "extra loud ringing of the gong." It is in the testimony of appellant's witnesses that the respondent either stepped back or fell back against the west-bound car, but this is contradicted by the testimony of a passenger on this same car who was called by the appellant. It is argued that the respondent must have been struck by the running board of the east-bound car, and thus thrown back in the path of the west-bound car, but there is no evidence in the record to support the argument. On the other hand, the physical facts would show to the contrary as the bruises suffered by the respondent were upon the left side of his left leg and ankle, whereas, if he had been struck by the east-bound car, some bruise would have appeared on his right side. Upon the issue of contributory negligence, the respondent is shown to have looked in both directions before he crossed the street and to have taken a position which he assumed to be free from danger, and the court cannot say that it was his duty to look in any particular direction at any particular moment or that, if he had so looked, he could have escaped from the danger which was approaching. Cases of this kind which depend so much upon the surrounding circumstances are properly left to the jury for the determination whether in view of all those circumstances the party has exercised the care which a reasonable man would have exercised in the same position. The general rule is that, when the question of contributory negligence is one upon which reasonable minds might differ, it is one of fact which must be left to the jury, and not one of law for the court. Erdevig v. Market Street Railway Co. (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 252; Du Val v. Boos Bros. Cafeteria Co., 45 Cal. App. 377, 380, 187 P. 767.

[4] But the respondent argues that, assuming his contributory negligence, the appellant is nevertheless liable under the last clear chance doctrine. The evidence is that respondent had assumed a position between the tracks which he kept without change until struck down by the west-bound car of appellant, and that appellant's motorman saw respondent in this position, and recognized his danger at a point 125 feet distant. It is a fair inference from all the evidence that the motorman realized that the respondent was not aware of his danger, because, in addition to the usual sounding of the gong on his car, he continued to shout to the respondent to warn him of this danger. The unbroken line of authorities supports respondent's position that the last clear chance doctrine applies "where the injured party by his own negligence has placed himself in a position of danger from which he cannot extricate himself, or of which he is obviously unconscious, and the defendant, seeing or knowing his peril or seeing or knowing facts from which a reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, and being able by the use of ordinary care to avoid injuring the plaintiff in his perilous position, fails to use such care and thereby causes the injury." Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 4, 164 P. 798, 800; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 521, 74 P. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Atkins v. Bouchet (Cal. App.) 260 P. 828; Darling v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 197 Cal. 702, 707, 242 P. 703; Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 700, 218 P. 36; Berguin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 220.

[5, 6] The appellant assigns as error the ruling of the trial court in striking out the answer of the motorman of the west-bound car as to what he thought the respondent was going to do when he saw him standing between the rails, and also the answers of this and another witness that it was a matter of frequent occurrence to see pedestrians standing in safety between the tracks as cars passed going in opposite directions. We see no error in these rulings. The fact that the motorman of the west-bound car gave such vociferous warnings of his approach supported the inference that he knew the respondent was in a perilous position, and likely to be struck by his approaching car, while his statement that he thought that the respondent was intending to board the east-bound car merely created an inconsistency with his positive testimony of what he saw and knew. The frequency or infrequency of pedestrians safely standing between the passing cars was, of course, not an issue in the case. The evidence clearly disclosed that the respondent was not standing in this position of safety, but that he was standing in the path of the west-bound car.

Criticism is made of the action of the trial court in modifying proposed instructions and in refusing to give an instruction proposed by the appellant covering the degree of care required by the respondent in crossing this street. We have examined all these instructions given, as well as those proposed by the appellant and refused, and are satisfied that the jury was fully and fairly instructed, and that there is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LINTON. (Cr. 1543.) *

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 22, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

Criminal law ⚷730(1)—Improper remarks and questions of district attorney held not ground for reversal, where objections were sustained and objectionable matters withdrawn from jury.

Misconduct of district attorney in making improper statements and asking improper questions held not ground for reversal, where in each instance trial judge promptly sustained defendant's objection and instructed jury to disregard the question or remark.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Samuel Guy Linton was convicted of first degree robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Light & Lane and J. E. Light, all of Glendale, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Defendant was found guilty of robbery in the first degree. On his appeal, he urges but one point, and that is the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in making improper statements and asking improper questions on both direct and cross examination.

We have carefully read the record in the case, and have noted particularly the statements and questions criticized. We are agreed with appellant that some of the remarks made by the district attorney, as well as many of his questions, were improper. However, we do not feel that this conduct of the district attorney constitutes reversible error. In every instance where the questions asked or remarks made by the district attorney were objectionable, the learned trial judge promptly sustained the defendant's objection and instructed the jury to disregard the question or remark. In several instances the questions asked or remarks made were invited by the answers of the witness or the questions propounded in direct examination. On the whole, we are satisfied that the emphatic manner of the trial judge in promptly striking out the objectionable matters and concisely instructing the jury to give no heed to them eliminated any element of injury that the defendant might otherwise have suffered. We are justified in assuming that the jury heeded the court's instructions.

It is to be regretted that prosecutors are so often led to such a departure from the proper methods of conduct in the trial of cases that this court is called upon to occupy its time with a review of criticized conduct of this character.

However, we do not feel that the improper conduct of the district attorney in the instant case affected the substantial rights of the defendant. Hence a reversal of the judgment is not warranted.

Judgment affirmed.

WEINTRAUB v. SUPERIOR COURT WITHIN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 6035.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1928.

1. Attachment ⚷12—In action for price of goods sold and equitable relief, right to writ of attachment held not defeated because of application of equitable principles to reach property belonging to sole owner of corporations.

Where in action to recover sum agreed to be paid for goods, wares, and merchandise and for equitable relief, creditor sought to attach property belonging to sole owner of corporations alleging fraud and writ of attachment was issued, held that, since goods sold and delivered are subject of actions at law and writs of attachment are available as means of securing property of debtors, incidental application of equitable principles as means of retrieving property subject to attachment did not defeat right of writ itself.

2. Prohibition ⚷3(5)—Prohibition held proper remedy to restrain issuance of order releasing attachment, notwithstanding right of appeal which was inadequate.

Where petitioner sought writ of prohibition to restrain issuance of order releasing writ of attachment and it was contended that he had right of appeal and consequently prohibition was not available, held that, since release of subject-matter of attachment pending appeal would strip proceeding of assurance of adequate results, prohibition would be granted.

3. Prohibition ⚿10(2)—Order to release attachment lawfully levied held in "excess of jurisdiction," warranting issuance of writ of prohibition (Code Civ. Proc. § 1102).

Granting of motion to release attachment lawfully levied, and to which plaintiff was entitled legally under statutes, held "excess of jurisdiction," within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, warranting issuance of writ of prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Excess of Jurisdiction.]

Petition by Moe Weintraub for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, to restrain the issuance of an order releasing the writ of attachment. Writ granted.

Harry K. Cohen and Eugene L. Wolver, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Pritchard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner in this proceeding commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county by filing a complaint, which was amended, and, as amended, is made a part of the petition herein, against the California Surety Company, a California corporation; California Surety Company, a Nevada corporation; Fred A. Brun; and unknown defendants designated by fictitious names. The complaint consists of five separate and distinct alleged causes of action. The first count alleges that on or about December 7, 1927, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendants certain goods, wares, and merchandise for which they agreed to pay the sum of $392.80, no part of which has been paid. In the second count it is alleged that on said date there was an account stated, that the sum of $392.80 was then found to be due the plaintiff, and that the defendants agreed to pay the same. In the third count the plaintiff avers upon information and belief that the California corporation and the Nevada corporation both comprise the same stockholders, directors, and officers, as to personnel, position, and shareholdings; that they are identical and the same as to business management and all other functions, with the same interests and no separate or other capital. It is also alleged in the third count that the plaintiff at all times believed he was doing business with the Nevada corporation; that Brun, its manager, led him to believe that it was legally doing business in California; that the fact that this was untrue came to plaintiff's knowledge subsequently to the sale and delivery of the merchandise; and that plaintiff has no speedy and adequate remedy at law.

The fourth count alleges upon information and belief that the stockholders of the two corporations have no equity or interest in any stocks of which they are the nominal holders, but that the defendant Brun is the sole and exclusive owner and holder of all of their assets; that Brun is the sole owner of both corporations, that they are insolvent, and the plaintiff is unable to collect the amount due from the Nevada corporation by process of law, but that Brun is solvent and able to pay the same; that in truth and in fact both corporations are the same, and that their obligations are equitably the same.

By the fifth count two promissory notes of "the California Surety Company [Signed] Fred A. Brun," for $100 each, dated, respectively, September 30, 1927, and October 31, 1927, payable to the order of Moe's Printing & Stationery Company, which were assigned to the plaintiff, are set forth in hæc verba. It is further alleged that Brun is the sole owner of both corporations, and the only one at whose individual special instance and request the indebtedness was incurred; that he incurred them in the name of the California Surety Company, and is in fact the person obligated therefor; "that plaintiff was inadvertently made a victim of said fraud practiced upon him by said Fred A. Brun in leading plaintiff to believe that the California Surety Company was a Nevada corporation owning large assets, and that the said defendant Fred A. Brun there and then knew that the said statements so made to plaintiff were false, and that they were made with the intention to defraud plaintiff of the sums complained of."

Judgment is prayed (1) for $392.80; (2) that the California corporation and the Nevada corporation be declared the same, and "that the court pierce the corporate veil of said corporations and declare the obligation of each and all binding upon the other"; (3) "that the said corporations are in truth and in fact the property of Fred A. Brun, and a subterfuge used by him to do business, and that the obligations of said corporations are binding upon him"; (4) for the sum of $200; and (5) for costs and for general relief.

A writ of attachment was issued in said action and levied upon certain property of the defendants, whereupon motion was made to release it upon the ground that the suit was based upon fraud, and was therefore in equity, and that in such event an attachment would not lie. The trial court, after argument and presentation of authorities, announced that the motion would be granted, and the petitioner institutes this proceeding in prohibition, praying that a writ issue restraining the entry and enforcement of an order pursuant to such announcement.

Respondent demurred to the petition for writ of prohibition, assigning as grounds therefor that upon the facts presented by the record the petition does not state a sufficient foundation for the relief sought, and again insisting, in this court, that the original suit is one in equity wherein a writ of attachment cannot legally be issued.

The petitioner relies principally upon the authority of Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., 180 Cal. 348, 181 P. 780. It there appeared that a California corporation, entitled the Maryland Dairy Lunch Company, became indebted to the plaintiff hotel company for rent, that it was solvent, and apparently meeting its ordinary and current liabilities; that in January, 1916, its directors conceived the fraudulent scheme of organizing a Nevada corporation, authorized to do business in California, and to which all of the places of business and leasehold rights of the original corporation were sold and transferred, except that for which rent was due to the plaintiff. It was alleged that one M. Schwind was the sole owner and held all of the stock, with the exception of one share each standing in the names of dummy directors; that after said transfer the California corporation was dissolved, so that Schwind then owned and operated the restaurant business maintained and conducted upon the plaintiff's property, but was not a party to the lease, the original lessee was extinct, and both Schwind and the Nevada corporation denied any liability for the obligation upon which suit was brought. The hotel company commenced an action by complaint setting forth these facts, among others, and alleging that said transfer was without consideration, that the purpose of the transfer was to effectuate the continuation of the business of the original corporation under a new name which was in substance and effect but a continuation of the old business, owned substantially by the same persons, for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff. The prayer of the complaint demanded a temporary injunction restraining the new corporation from disposing of its assets, that the transfer to it of the properties of the California corporation be declared void, that the defendant be charged as holding all of the property subject to the payment of the plaintiff's claim for $3,617.60 therefrom, and that the property be sold for the plaintiff's claim and its costs. A writ of attachment was levied in that action upon said property, and the defendant, without answering, moved to dissolve the attachment upon the ground that the cause of action was not one in which a writ of attachment could issue. It being claimed that the cause of action alleged was one ex delicto for fraud, it was there argued, as here, that the suit was in equity, and that property could not be attached therein. The Supreme Court, in passing upon this question, said:

> "The question here is whether this action is one within the purview of subdivision 1 of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That subdivision does not contemplate the right of attachment in an action ex delicto for fraud. This statement is in accord with Hallidie v. Enginger [175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1] supra. The action must be one upon contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money. If a recovery upon such a contract is the purpose of the suit, so far as the right of attachment is concerned it is immaterial whether the action be regarded as strictly legal or strictly equitable, or partly legal and partly equitable. The subdivision does not in terms prescribe that the action must be one in law, or that it may not be one in equity, or that it may not be one of either law or equity, or of both. Hence it is not necessary in order to uphold the writ of attachment to establish the proposition that the action is either legal or equitable. What must be established is that the action is based upon contract, either express or implied, for the direct payment of money. It is clear that this action addresses itself to both the legal and the equitable powers of the court. But that circumstance will not operate to deny the plaintiff a writ of attachment if he is seeking recovery upon the breach of such contract. It is to be kept in mind that there is no suggestion that fraud entered into the making of the contract. The respective obligations of the parties thereunder were for a time performed and then one of them committed a breach of the contract. So the basis and essence of the action is an executed contract for the direct payment of money, and in order to have satisfied any judgment that may be recovered for such breach the plaintiff sues out a writ of attachment. In order to establish the proposition that the property attached should be responsive to such a judgment the plaintiff invokes certain well-recognized equitable principles. But this does not have the effect of converting the action on the express contract for the direct payment of money into one ex delicto for fraud. Consequently, even if such an action may properly be regarded as partially legal and partially equitable, it will make no difference. The plaintiff is nevertheless entitled to a writ of attachment by virtue of the fact that he is suing for a recovery upon the contract which is the gravamen of the action."

[1] Respondents assert with much force and citation of authority various theories which, were it not for the rule announced in Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., supra, would require more extended discussion than we deem necessary. They assume that since a suit to "pierce the corporate veils" is an equitable proceeding, that the court had no jurisdiction over accompanying money counts apart from the equity counts, and from this it is argued that "the gravamen of the action is equity, and attachment will not lie." From this it does not follow that to invoke equity principles in an action which addresses itself both to the legal and to the equitable powers of the court alters or restricts the statutory procedure afforded in an action the basis and essence of which is an executed contract for the direct payment of money. Goods sold and delivered, accounts stated, and promissory notes are subjects of actions at law, and writs of attachment are unquestionably available and proper as means of securing to litigants the property of debtors which may be responsive to any judgments recovered in such cases. To hold that incidentally peering through fraud as a means of discovering and retrieving camouflaged property subject to attachment, defeats the right to the writ itself, would deny the substantial relief intended, and fortify subterfuges against legal recourse. The suggestion of such an injustice furnishes its own refutation, which cannot better be expressed than as stated in Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., supra.

[2] It is contended that petitioner had a right of appeal from an order dissolving a writ of attachment, and so was afforded a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and that prohibition is not available in such cases. It is plain that the release of the subject-matter of an attachment suit pending appeal would immediately strip the proceeding of any assurance of adequate results, since the relinquishment of the security might, and in many cases would, render the judgment worthless, even though it should be affirmed upon appeal. This proposition is settled by the following decisions of our appellate courts: Kirby v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 604, 1 P. 119; Primm v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. App. 208, 84 P. 786; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 P. 450; Gloyd v. Superior Court, 44 Cal. App. 39, 185 P. 995.

[3] The only other point which we deem requires decision is the contention that since prohibition is available only to arrest proceedings which are without or in excess of jurisdiction, and will not be invoked to restrain mere error, this court has no authority to pass upon the petition herein. The respondents, however, fail to cite any authority, and we know of none, holding that the granting of a motion to release an attachment, lawfully levied, and to which one is entitled legally under our statutes, would not constitute an excess of jurisdiction. As was said in Broom v. Douglass, 175 Ala. 268, 57 So. 860, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 164, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1155:

> "By 'excess of jurisdiction,' as distinguished from the entire absence of jurisdiction, we understand and mean that the act, though within the general power of the judge, is not authorized, and therefore void, with respect to the particular case because the conditions which alone authorize the exercise of his general power in that particular case are wanting; and hence the judicial power is not in fact lawfully invoked."

Petitioner was entitled to a writ of attachment. Hence, having that right, to deprive him thereof by an order dissolving or releasing it, would be a judicial act in excess of the court's jurisdiction, although it may have had general jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter of the cause. "When an asserted power is inconsistent with an established right, the power must be denied." Ex parte Alabama Marble Co., 216 Ala. 272, 113 So. 240. Section 1102 of our Code of Civil Procedure provides for writs of prohibition in such cases.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

MATTOCKS v. CLASS A MOTOR CO. et al.

(Civ. 5509.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 22, 1928.

1. Fraud 🔑58(2)—Evidence that automobile used in making demonstrations had to be repainted warranted jury's finding that car was not new, in purchaser's action for misrepresentations.

In action for fraud in sale of car, where defendant's answer disclosed that the car had been used for demonstration and evidence showed that it had been used in making demonstrations to such extent as to call for repainting, jury was justified in finding that the car was not a new car as represented.

2. Trial 🔑253(7)—Instruction in action for damages for fraud, submitting issues of defendant's representation and plaintiff's reliance thereon, held not erroneous for failure to cover all issues.

Instruction in action for damages for fraud in sale of car, submitting issues as to defendant's representation that car was new and as to plaintiff's reliance upon the representation, held not to violate rule requiring instruction which purports to state conditions necessary to verdict to state all of those conditions.

3. Trial 🔑191(1)—Instruction that plaintiff had offered evidence to establish enumerated facts held not misleading as assuming facts.

Instruction that plaintiff had offered evidence to establish matters which court enumerated held not erroneous as misleading on ground that jury might assume facts referred to were established.

4. Fraud 🔑62—$725 damages for fraudulent misrepresentations that automobile sold was new held not excessive under evidence.

In purchaser's action for damages for alleged misrepresentations that car purchased was a new car, evidence of reasonable value of car at time of purchase and amount paid therefor held to justify award of $725 damages and implied finding as to value of car at time of purchase.

5. Evidence 🔑89—Buyer suing seller for misrepresentations held entitled to prove that sons, present at sale, were ill in another county at time of trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061).

Buyer of automobile suing for damages for seller's false representations was entitled to prove that his sons, who were with him at time the car was purchased, were ill in another county, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, requiring consideration of evidence according to power of one side to produce and the other to contradict.

6. Fraud ⚷65(4)—Where purchaser had no previous experience with car, instruction that equal availability of means of knowledge as to car's condition precluded his recovery for fraud held properly refused.

In buyer's action for seller's misrepresentations in sale of automobile that car was new, refusal of instruction denying recovery in case means of knowledge were equally available to both parties held proper, where plaintiff had no previous experience with the car and defendants were familiar with its history and previous use.

7. Trial ⚷260(1), 261—Refusal of instructions sufficiently covered by instructions given and which contained erroneous statements held not ground for reversal.

Refusal of instructions requested held not ground for reversal, where all essential points were presented to jury by instructions given and where the instructions requested contained erroneous statements.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Charles T. Mattocks against the Class A Motor Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff purchased a Buick automobile from the defendants on May 11, 1925, for which he paid them in cash the total sum of $925 and "turned in" another automobile for the agreed price of $500. He commenced this action for damages, alleging in his complaint that defendants had made false representations to him at the time of the purchase of the car. He set forth that defendants represented to him that the car was new and unused and in the condition that it was in when shipped by the manufacturer; that these representations were untrue; that the car had been repainted, a bow of the top broken, the upholstery torn, old tubes inserted in the casings, and a radiator installed which was not designed for the car in question. Defendants filed an answer in which they denied that false representations were made. They alleged that the car had been "used as a demonstration car for the said defendants herein" and that plaintiff was informed of the true condition of the car at the time of the purchase. The case was tried with a jury and a verdict rendered in plaintiff's favor fixing the damages at $925. Upon motion for a new trial plaintiff consented to a reduction of the judgment to the sum of $725.

[1] Defendants contend that "in a reading of all the transcript and all the testimony there cannot be found any evidence, that plaintiff introduced, to show 'that said car was not a new car but that in truth and fact it was a used car.'" A careful reading of their answer discloses that defendants did not deny the allegation that the car was not a new car. We find, however, that the answer contains this admission: "That said automobile has (had) been used as a demonstration car for the said defendants herein." Sufficient evidence was introduced by plaintiff to establish all of his allegations on the subject of the defective condition of the car. It cannot be said that a car which had been used in making demonstrations to such an extent as to call for repainting is a new car.

[2] The trial court gave the following instruction:

> "You are instructed, therefore, that the following issues must be determined by you, to wit: (1) Whether or not the said defendants represented and warranted to plaintiff, prior to or at the time of the purchase, that the car was a new or unused car. (2) Whether or not the plaintiff relied upon such representations and by reason of his reliance upon such representations purchased said car as a new one."

It is now contended that some of the issues were not covered in this instruction, resulting in a violation of the rule that if an instruction purports to state the conditions necessary to a verdict, it must state all of those conditions. The instruction under discussion does not purport to cover all the issues; nor does it tell the jury to find in favor of either party in the event they should find any certain facts to be true. The rule mentioned is not violated.

In presenting their next point defendants state in their brief:

> "* * * The court in advising the jury as to what facts the defendants have denied, very improperly omitted to advise the jury that we had denied that the car was a used car, while the court advised the jury that the plaintiff had 'offered evidence' to prove that the car was not a new car."

As above pointed out, defendants did not deny in their answer that the car was a used car. On the contrary, the following appears therein:

> "At said time plaintiff was told that said car had been repainted. * * * Said plaintiff was fully aware of the fact that said car was not in the same condition that it had been received by defendants from the factory."

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[3] In its instructions to the jury the trial court used this language:

> "You are instructed that in this action the plaintiff in the case, Charles T. Mattocks, has offered evidence to establish the following matters."

Then follows an enumeration of several points on which plaintiff introduced evidence. Defendants now contend that "the jury might assume that the evidence of plaintiff as offered would establish those facts set forth in the instruction, whether they actually did or not." While the form of the instruction is not to be commended, is cannot be said that it was inaccurate. The court in effect told the jury nothing more than that evidence had been offered on certain points. This was done for the purpose of stating the issues to the jury. It is not probable that the jury misunderstood the instruction.

[4] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify damages in the sum of $725. Plaintiff testified that the reasonable value of the car at the time he purchased it was "around six or seven hundred dollars." He paid $1,425 for it in cash and property. It cannot be said that the implied finding that the car was of the value of $700 at the time of its purchase is not sustained by the evidence.

[5] Two sons of the plaintiff were with him at the time the car was purchased. Plaintiff testified that at the time of the trial they were ill in a county other than the one in which the trial was conducted. The court did not err in admitting this testimony. Section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, makes it the duty of the court to instruct the jury on proper occasion "that evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and of the other to contradict." Plaintiff had the right to prove that the boys were unable to be present in order to answer the argument that might possibly be presented that he had the power to produce stronger evidence than he actually produced.

[6] Defendants complain of the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury the following instruction:

> "You are instructed, that the plaintiff in this action cannot recover unless he was deceived by the alleged representations, and if the means of knowledge are at hand equally available to both parties, and the subject of purchase is alike available to both parties, and the subject of the purchase is alike open to their inspection, if the purchaser does not avail himself of these means and opportunities he will not be heard to say he has been deceived, unless he was induced by the trick or misrepresentation of defendant not to make such inspection."

The court did not err in refusing this instruction. It cannot be reasonably argued that "the means of knowledge" concerning the condition of the car were "equally available to both parties." Plaintiff had had no previous experience with the car, but defendants were familiar with its history and knew that it had been used for demonstration purposes and had been repainted. He could discover that old tubes had been placed within the casings only by removing the tires from the wheels. It would be unreasonable to require him to do so.

[7] Defendants complain of the refusal of the trial court to give several other instructions. All the essential points of law governing the case were presented to the jury by the instructions given in a manner as favorable to defendants' contentions as they could rightfully demand. Moreover, the court was justified in refusing these instructions on the ground that certain correct statements of the law were coupled with statements which were clearly erroneous.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUNSET LUMBER CO. v. SMITH et al.

(Civ. 6087.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Sureties on bond guaranteeing contractor's performance of contract, requiring him to furnish labor and material, held liable on all claims for labor or materials.

Where contract required contractor to furnish labor and material, and to complete work free from liens, bond guaranteeing that contractor would perform all obligations of contract made obligators thereon liable in full for claims of all persons performing labor on, or furnishing material to be used in, work.

2. Mechanics' liens 🔑313—Contractor's bond becomes part of the contract, and sureties become parties thereto.

Building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of building contract, becomes part of contract to which sureties on bond become parties.

3. Mechanics' liens 🔑313—Building contractor's bond must be considered with contract as constituting indivisible contract.

Building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of all conditions of contract, must be construed as indivisible part of contract.

4. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of contract free of liens, held to inure to benefit of parties providing materials and furnishing labor (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of all conditions of building contract free of liens, inured to benefit of third parties providing materials and furnishing labor, even if it did not by its terms state it was for benefit of such persons, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183.

5. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Sureties on building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of contract free of liens, held liable to extent thereof for labor and materials.

Sureties on building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of all obligations of contract free of liens, were liable to extent of bond for payment for labor and materials used in construction.

6. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Purpose of building contractor's bond is not alone to protect owner of property, but to protect persons providing labor and furnishing material.

Purpose of building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of contract free of liens, is not alone to protect rights of owner of property on which buildings are being erected, but also to protect rights of, or serve as indemnity to, persons providing materials and furnishing labor.

7. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Persons furnishing contractor with materials or labor held entitled to proceed on contractor's bond (Civ. Code, § 1559).

Under Civ. Code, § 1559, permitting person for whose benefit contract is expressly made to enforce it, persons furnishing contractor materials or labor which were not paid for were entitled to proceed on bond guaranteeing performance of all obligations of contract free from liens.

8. Mechanics' liens 🔑315—Liability of sureties on contractor's bond is limited to amount of bond.

Liability of sureties on bond of building contractor, guaranteeing performance of all obligations of contract free of liens, is limited to amount of bond.

9. Mechanics' liens 🔑313—Statute held not to require building contractor's bond to recite that persons furnishing labor and materials may sue thereon (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183; Civ. Code, § 1559).

In view of Civ. Code, § 1559, providing that contract made expressly for benefit of third person may be enforced by him, Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that contractor's bond shall by its terms be made to inure to benefit of those performing labor or furnishing materials, does not require that bond itself shall recite that persons furnishing contractor with labor or material may sue thereon, but only states legal effect of bond.

10. Mechanics' liens 🔑313—Contractor's bond held substantially to comply with statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Building contractor's bond, guaranteeing performance of all obligations of contract filed by owners, held substantially to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, and to make owners liable to those furnishing material and labor to contractor only to extent of amount due from owners to contractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by the Sunset Lumber Company against E. Porter Smith, consolidated with seven other actions of similar character. From a judgment for plaintiff limiting its lien on certain property, it appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San Jose, for appellant.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PRESTON, P. Justice pro tem. The appellant, Sunset Lumber Company, a corporation, brought this action to foreclose a lien upon the property of respondents, Charles Locke Paddon and Evalynne D. Paddon, for building materials furnished by it and used in the construction of a dwelling house owned by said respondents in the city of Watsonville.

This action was consolidated with seven other actions of a similar character, and tried by the court without a jury, and the court rendered judgment in favor of appellant and against the contractor, E. Porter Smith, for $4,345.26, the full amount of appellant's claim, but limited the lien of appellant to $2,484.02, upon the ground that there remained unpaid from said respondents Paddon and wife, the owners of the property, to E. Porter Smith, the contractor, only $4,202.05, and that, as the owners had filed a bond with the contract, the liability of said owners to appellant was limited to its proportion of the $4,202.05, due from the owners to the contractor. Appellant appeals from the said judgment limiting its lien to $2,484.02, and claims that it is entitled to a lien for the full amount of its claim, to wit, $4,345.26, for the reason that the bond furnished and filed with the original contract is not the bond required by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Therefore, the sole question presented by this appeal is whether the bond in question meets the requirements of the statute.

The bond in question was made a part of the original contract between the owner and contractor, and filed with the contract in the office of the county recorder of the county of Santa Cruz, and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"As a part of the same transaction with the foregoing contract, we, the undersigned, hereby undertake and guarantee that E. Porter Smith, the contractor named therein, will fully and faithfully keep and perform all the obligations thereof in his part to be performed, and will deliver said building fully completed within the time therein specified, free from all liens and claims of any persons performing labor thereon or furnishing materials therefor, or both. The liability of the surety is hereby fixed in the sum of four thousand seven hundred and ninety-five and no/100 ($4,795.00) dollars."

[1] It is first contended that this bond is not conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work. The contract provides that the contractor will furnish necessary labor and material, and will perform and complete certain work, free from all liens, and the sureties guarantee that the contractor will perform all of the obligations of the contract, including the one just mentioned. From these provisions of the contract and bond appellant argues that it does not follow that the contractor must pay in full the claims of all persons furnishing material to be used in said work. We think this contention untenable.

It is true that neither the bond itself, nor the contract, says the contractor will pay for all labor and materials required to construct said building, but said contract does provide that:

> *"The contractor agrees to furnish labor and material * * * required and perform and complete in a workmanlike manner, free from any and all liens and claims of artisans, material men, subcontractors and laborers thereon.* * * *"

The contract also provides that, in the event said contractor, at any time during the progress of the work, fails, refuses, or neglects for a period of five days to furnish and provide material and workmen to finish the work, the owner shall have power to furnish same and deduct the expenses from the amount of the contract price, and the bond, which is a part of the contract, provides:

> "We, the undersigned, hereby undertake and guarantee that E. Porter Smith, the contractor named therein, will fully and faithfully keep and perform all the obligations thereof in his part to be performed."

Therefore it is perfectly clear to us that the language of the contract sufficiently implies that the obligation was imposed upon the contractor, E. Porter Smith to pay for all material enumerated in the contract, and furnish all labor necessary to do the work, and, when the bondsmen guaranteed that the contractor "will fully and faithfully perform all the obligations of the contract," they guaranteed that the contractor would pay for the labor and materials that were used in the construction of said building, and would furthermore perform the other things required of him under the contract. Certainly, this interpretation was the intent and purpose of all the parties to the contract and bond. It would be an unreasonable and strained construction to place upon a contract, such as this, to say that the contractor agreed to furnish all labor and material and construct a dwelling house for the owners for $9,585, and to furnish the owners a bond guaranteeing to do all this, and then say, "This does not mean that the contractor was to pay for the labor and materials." If the interpretation as contended for by appellant be correct, then what was the contractor to do for the $9,585?

When a contractor agrees to furnish all labor and material and build a house for $9,585 within a given time, free of all liens, it certainly means that the contractor, and not the owner, is to pay for all labor and material; otherwise, in this case, the owners would be paying the contractor $9,585 for absolutely nothing.

Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 129 P. 978, 981, was an action brought by the owner against the sureties of the contractor to recover moneys paid out to discharge claims for labor and materials after abandonment by the contractor, and it was there definitely decided that a similar clause in a building contract obligated the contractor not merely to furnish, but to pay for, the labor done and materials furnished.

The case of Fickling v. Jackman et al. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 810, involved a similar contract, and there the following language was used in a contract: "The contractor will furnish all labor and materials necessary for the erection and completion of the buildings," which is almost the identical language used in the contract in the case at bar, and the court held that this was an obligation on the part of the contractor to pay for all materials used and labor done in the erection of the buildings. See, also, Fuller v. Alturas School District, 28 Cal. App. 609, 153 P. 743.

[2-4] Appellant next contends that said bond is not by its terms made to inure to the benefit of persons who furnished materials to be used in the work described in the contract, nor does said bond by its terms give the claimant a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose its lien. These contentions are based upon certain provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides when a bond is given it shall "by its terms be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in said contract so as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for in this chapter or in a separate suit brought on said bond. * * *"

It is argued that the bond in the case at bar does not comply with the foregoing statutory provisions, and is only a bond to indemnify and hold harmless the owners against liens. It is elementary that a bond such as the one under consideration, given to guarantee the execution of a contract, according to its terms, becomes a part of such contract, and to that contract the sureties become parties, the same as though they had actually made and executed the contract itself. Therefore, in interpreting the language of the bond, we must do so by treating the contract and the bond as constituting an indivisible contract. Fuller v. Alturas School District, supra. Construing the bond in question by this rule, there is no escape from the conclusion that the same was not given for the sole benefit of the owners, but that it was intended to inure as well to the benefit of third parties providing materials and furnishing labor to be used in the construction of said building.

[5] We have already determined that the contract imposed the obligation upon the contractor to pay for all labor and materials that went into the construction of said building, and the liability of the sureties, being coextensive with that of the contractor, the sureties are likewise liable to the extent of their bond for the payment of labor and materials that were used in the construction of said building.

[6] As stated in Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., supra, the very purpose of such a bond is not alone to protect the rights of the owner of the property upon which buildings are being erected under building contracts, but also to protect the rights of or serve as indemnity to persons providing materials and furnishing labor in the construction of such buildings.

[7] Section 1559 of the Civil Code provides:

> "A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it."

It follows, therefore, that the appellant, or any other person who furnished to the contractor materials or labor which have not been paid for, are entitled to proceed against the sureties on said bond for the recovery of the amounts due them.

[8, 9] The liability of such sureties is, of course, limited in said bond to $4,795. Said bond does in legal effect, therefore, by its terms, actually inure to the benefit of persons who furnished material or performed labor in the construction of said building, and also entitles them to sue the sureties direct. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not provide that said bond itself recite that fact; it only states the legal effect of such a bond.

The appellant cites the case of Terry v. Southwestern Building Co., 43 Cal. App. 366, 185 P. 212. That case is of no assistance; the bond in that case contained an express provision that "no right of action shall accrue upon or by reason hereof to or for the use or benefit of any one other than the obligee herein named, and that the obligation of the company is and shall be construed strictly as one of suretyship only."

[10] We think the bond, which is a part of the contract, is in substantial compliance with section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the trial court was correct in limiting the lien of appellant's judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERTSON v. WEINGART et al.★
(Civ. 3510.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 11, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 9, 1928.

1. Innkeepers 🔑10—It is hotel keeper's duty to keep premises in condition reasonably safe for guests.

The general rule is that it is hotel keeper's duty to keep his buildings and premises in a condition reasonably safe for his guests.

2. Innkeepers 🔑10—Evidence held to support finding that hotel keeper failed to maintain stairway railing and air shaft gate in reasonably safe condition.

Evidence that gate, opening on deep air shaft with concrete bottom, and constituting part of hotel stairway handrail, would not catch or remain closed, held to support trial court's finding, in action for death of guest falling into shaft, that hotel keeper failed to maintain railing and gate in condition reasonably safe for guests.

3. Evidence 🔑58—Trial judge could presume, in absence of contrary evidence, that hotel guest, killed by fall into air shaft, was in ordinary health, and not subject to fits.

In action against hotel keeper for death of guest falling into air shaft opening off stairway, trial judge had right to presume, in absence of evidence to contrary, that decedent was normal person, in ordinary health, and full possession of senses and faculties, and not suffering from fits or any other physical infirmity or disability.

4. Innkeepers 🔑10—Evidence held to support finding that air shaft gate gave way because of insufficient locking device, causing death of guest relying thereon as part of stairway handrail.

In action against hotel keeper for death of guest, evidence held to warrant finding that decedent grasped or relied on gate of air shaft opening off stairway as part of handrail to assist her in ascending, and that such gate, because of insufficient locking device, gave way, causing her to fall into shaft.

5. Innkeepers 🔑10—Negligence of hotel guest, killed by fall into air shaft, in relying on insecurely fastened gate as part of stairway handrail, cannot be presumed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

It cannot be presumed that hotel guest, killed by fall into air shaft opening off stairway, was negligent in grasping or relying on gate, which was insecurely locked, as part of handrail, in view of presumption, under Code Civ.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Proc. § 1963, subd. 4, that she used due and ordinary care to avoid injury.

6. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Evidence must be reviewed in light most favorable to support judgment and all reasonable inferences favorable to appellee indulged, where appellant's theories are but opposing inferences.

Where appellant's theories as to cause of death sued for are at most but opposing inferences, evidence must be reviewed in light most favorable to support judgment, and all inferences reasonably possible therefrom favorable to appellee must be indulged by appellate court.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Evidence 🔑597—Circumstantial evidence need not exclude every other reasonable conclusion to sustain finding which will be set aside only on clear showing of no sufficient substantial evidence to support it on any hypothesis.

Circumstantial evidence in civil cases need not exclude every reasonable conclusion other than that arrived at by jury in order to sustain finding, but, to set aside verdict for insufficiency of such evidence, it must clearly appear that there is no sufficient substantial evidence to support it on any hypothesis.

8. Negligence 🔑134(2)—Connection between negligence and injury may be shown by circumstantial evidence.

The connection between negligence and injury need not be made by an eyewitness or direct testimony, nor actually demonstrated, but may be shown by circumstantial evidence, like any other facts.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Trial court's fact finding on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed, where supported by substantial evidence.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence as to whether decedent was intoxicated at time of injury cannot be disturbed by appellate court, where supported by substantial evidence.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1039(13)—That hotel guest's death might have been caused by air shaft gate remaining open held not to warrant reversal for variance between pleading and proof, where court found on substantial evidence that gate was maintained in defective condition as alleged in complaint.

That death of hotel guest, falling into airshaft opening off stairway, might have been caused by gate remaining open, held not to warrant reversal of judgment against hotel keeper on ground of variance between pleading and proof, where there was substantial evidence to support trial court's finding that defendants negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully maintained stairway railing, air shaft gate, and locking device in defective condition, as alleged in complaint.

11. Trial 🔑396(1)—Court's findings need not follow precise language of pleading.

It is not essential that the court's findings follow the precise language of the pleading; the question being whether the truth or falsity of material allegations can be demonstrated therefrom.

12. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Appellate court must liberally construe trial court's findings in support of judgment.

The trial court's findings must be given a liberal construction in support of the judgment by the appellate court.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Court's failure to find that decedent brushed lightly against air shaft gate as alleged held harmless, in view of finding that she relied on gate as part of stairway railing.

That court failed to find in precise language of complaint, that hotel guest, killed by fall into air shaft when gate gave way, "brushed lightly against the gate," held harmless to defendant, where court found that decedent relied on stairway railing and gate which was part thereof in passing along stairway; such reliance being ultimate fact found.

14. Death 🔑57—Testimony as to wife's earnings held admissible under general allegation of damages in husband's action for her death.

In husband's action for death of wife, testimony as to decedent's earnings was admissible under general allegation of damages as proof of loss of her services; being element of damages naturally and necessarily resulting from act complained of.

15. Appeal and error 🔑1032(2)—Appellant must show that erroneous admission of testimony was prejudicial, unless prejudice necessarily results.

Appellant, seeking reversal on ground of erroneous admission of testimony, must not only convince reviewing court that trial court erred, but must show that ruling complained of was prejudicial in its effect and result, unless prejudice necessarily results from nature of evidence itself.

16. Trial 🔑165—Every favorable inference and presumption from evidence must be considered in plaintiff's favor on motion for nonsuit.

Every favorable inference fairly deducible, and every favorable presumption fairly arising, from evidence produced, must be considered in favor of plaintiff on motion for nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by William R. Robertson against Ben Weingart and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Kidd, W. O. Schell, Harold Larson, and Ingall W. Bull, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John B. Haas and John D. Home, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for the death of his wife through the negligence of defendant. The case was tried before the court, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The appeal is taken, under the "alternative method," from said judgment.

For some time prior to March 2, 1924, the decedent had been a duly registered guest at a hotel in Los Angeles, then operated and leased by Ben Weingart, sole appellant herein. As such guest she occupied a room on the fourth floor of the hotel. Plaintiff was her husband, and, while he did not live at the hotel, he visited her frequently, and often stayed overnight there. The elevator in the building was not in running order at the times herein mentioned, and could not be used, so the only access decedent had to her room was by means of a stairway. Prior to her death decedent suffered from a physical defect, in that her right ankle was stiff, due to a prior accident. She walked with an impediment, up and down stairs. She always wanted support going up and down stairs, on account of her stiff ankle. The stairway has a number of turns as it ascends. At such turns the treads of stairs are V-shaped. Upon the one turn with which we are here concerned there is located an air shaft, some 27 inches wide, and extending back 36 inches. Across the open side of this shaft is a handrailing and gate. The top of the gate is a continuation of the said handrail. This shaft is some 17 feet deep, and it opens directly upon the stairway, and extends to the ceiling. The gate opens inward and toward the air shaft, and is hung on ordinary hinges. A small spring "catch" was attached to the gate, for the purpose of keeping it closed.

On Sunday, March 2, 1924, decedent had been in company with her husband for practically the entire day. She returned to the hotel at about 11:30 p. m.; her husband leaving her at the door. She called at the hotel office, and conversed with the woman in charge there, and used the telephone located in a booth in said office. She then proceeded to ascend the stairway already described, on her way to her room on the fourth floor. She failed to appear on Monday, and a search for her was instituted by her husband. Two days were spent in an endeavor to locate her. On Wednesday one of the employees of the hotel suggested to plaintiff that he examine the said air shaft. The body of decedent was found at the bottom of said shaft. She had been dead several days. Her skull was fractured, and her injuries were such as would cause instantaneous death. Her injuries could have been caused by the body falling against a hard object.

The complaint alleged that decedent was a guest at said hotel; that the only means of access to and egress from her said room was by said stairway. It then described the stairway, air shaft, and gate in detail. The negligence of defendant is charged in the following language:

> "That on said 2d day of March, 1924, and at all times herein mentioned, said gate did not automatically close in a locked position, but swung in a partially closed position without locking and without being fastened in any manner whatsoever; that said spring catch was small, weak, and ineffectual to securely lock said gate in place, and was ineffectual to prevent the gate from swinging open upon pressure being applied to said gate from the stairway side; that at all times herein mentioned the said defendants and each of them, and their agents and servants, negligently, carelessly, recklessly, and wrongfully maintained the said railing, gate, and locking device in said condition, all of which was unknown to the said Rose Robertson."
> "VI. That on the 2d day of March, 1924, at or near the hour of 12 o'clock p. m. on said day, and while the said Rose Robertson was a guest in said hotel, the said Rose Robertson, relying upon the said railing, gate, and locking device, as aforesaid, as a protection against falling over off and from the said stairway into the said air shaft, while passing along said stairway, brushed lightly against the said railing and gate, and that thereupon, and by reason of the small, weak, and ineffectual locking device on said gate, and by reason of the defective condition of the railing, gate, and locking device, and by reason of the careless, negligent, reckless, and wrongful conduct of the said defendant, and each of them in so maintaining the said railing, gate and locking device, and not otherwise, the said gate gave way, thereby precipitating and causing the said Rose Robertson to fall off the said stairway and through the said gateway and down the said air shaft to the bottom of the said air shaft, a distance of about 17½ feet, and causing the said Rose Robertson to strike the cement floor at the foot of the air shaft."

The findings of the trial court followed the language of the complaint, except that there was no finding made that "while passing along said stairway (decedent) brushed lightly against the said railing and gate." The finding on these facts reads as follows:

> "Said Rose Robertson (decedent) relying upon said railing and gate therein, a part of said railing, as protection against falling off and over into said air shaft from said stairway, passed along and on said stairway; that said gate gave way and opened into said air shaft because of the negligent manner in which the railing, gate, locking device and spring hinges were maintained by the said defendant, Ben Weingart, thereby precipitating and causing the said Rose Robertson to fall off the said stairway and through the said gateway and down the said air shaft to the bottom of said air shaft, a distance of approximately 17½ feet, and caused said Rose Robertson to strike a cement floor at the foot of the said air shaft and causing said Rose Robertson to suffer severe and painful injuries —and that from said injuries the said Rose Robertson died on the 2d day of March, 1924."

The principal ground of appeal relied upon by appellant is the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings which we have just quoted.

[1, 2] The cause of action in this case is predicated upon the negligent manner in which defendant maintained the railing and gate in question. We are satisfied that there was substantial evidence to support this finding. Edwin L. Oker, detective lieutenant and witness for plaintiff, testified that he examined the gate on the day the body was found (some three days after decedent disappeared); that the gate looked to be closed. As he arrived at the gate, he leaned lightly against it; it went open; that he found the gate would not close, unless it was slammed exceedingly hard; the catch wouldn't catch; he procured a strap, and strapped the gate tight, so it couldn't come open any more. The gate would always come to and even with the balcony, but the catch would not catch. It would come into position and become closed, but it would only be hanging on the hinges. Officer W. H. Thompson, witness for plaintiff, testified that, when he went to the hotel to take the body out, on March 5th, the gate was unlatched; it would not catch good; would not catch when he slammed the gate; it would not catch good, so that left the gate so that it was liable to come unhooked any time; he examined the gate just to try to catch it so anybody else would not fall through it. In view of the fact that the top of this gate was a continuation of the handrail for use of those who needed assistance in ascending, and that the gate opened directly off the stairway upon a shaft 17 feet deep, and concreted at the bottom, the duty devolved upon the defendant to keep said gate in a reasonably safe condition. Was the trial court justified in concluding that, under the circumstances narrated, defendant was guilty of negligence? The answer to this question depends upon the degree of care which a hotel keeper owes to one who is his guest. The general rule is, that it is the duty of a hotel keeper to keep his buildings and premises in a condition reasonably safe for his guests. 32 C. J. p. 562. See, also, Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462. Applying the principle stated, the finding of the trial court was based upon substantial evidence to support it. A gate which would not "catch" or remain closed, and which opened upon a pit 17 feet deep, with a concrete bottom, and which gate was a part of the hand rail on the stairway, was a veritable death trap, and the maintenance of the premises in this condition could very well be held a breach of the duty which the hotel keeper owed decedent.

[3-6] Conceding that the finding of the court upon the question of negligence might find support in the record, appellant earnestly contends that there is an entire absence of any evidence showing a causal connection between such negligence and the death of plaintiff's wife. He enumerates some eight other theories as to how the decedent might have met her death, all of which he states are more probable than the one advanced in the complaint. The case of Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Company, 132 Cal. 363, 64 P. 480, is relied upon by appellant as sustaining his position in respect to the failure to show that defendant's negligence caused the injury alleged. In that case a man was found dead one morning upon the tracks of the defendant railroad company. There was no question but what he had been mutilated by a train. It was proved that on a previous morning a train of defendant backed over the place where the body was found, and there was no red light upon the rear of the train. A verdict for plaintiff was reversed; the court holding that there was an entire lack of causal connection between the negligence of defendant and the death of decedent. The verdict, the court stated, rested upon a foundation created by a mere guess. Applying the language of the case last cited to this one, appellant contends that, "for aught it appears, deceased may have fallen in a fit," and thus precipitated herself down the air shaft. The trial judge had a right to presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that decedent was a normal person in ordinary health and in full possession of all the senses and faculties with which the Creator endowed her. It must be presumed that decedent, in passing along the stairway, used due and ordinary care and precaution to avoid injury to herself. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4; Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 191 P. 703. While no one saw her when she fell to her death, the court may reasonably and justly have inferred that, on the night in question, as she passed along the stairway, she grasped or relied upon the gate as part of the handrail to assist her in ascending or descending, and that the gate, by reason of the insufficient locking device, gave way and sent her to her death. We must bear in mind that there was evidence that deceased had a stiff ankle, and required support going up or down stairs. Every alternative theory brought forward by appellant as to the cause of death is based either upon the assumption and presumption that decedent was either negligent or suffering from some physical disability. There is no proof in the record to sustain these contentions. Negligence is never presumed under such circumstances, nor can it be presumed that decedent was suffering from "fits," or any other physical infirmity or disability. The various theories advanced by appellant upon the cause of death are at most but opposing inferences, and the evidence under such circumstances must be reviewed in the light most favorable to support the judgment, and all inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to plaintiff must be indulged in by this court. Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123.

[7, 8] Where certain findings of the trial court in a civil case are based upon circumstantial evidence, what rule shall a reviewing court on appeal follow, when an attack is made upon the sufficiency of such evidence to sustain such findings? Appellant contends the rule to be that:

> "If other conclusions may reasonably be drawn as to the cause of the injury from the facts in evidence than those contended for, the evidence does not support the conclusion sought to be drawn from it"—citing Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital, 27 Cal. App. 755, 151 P. 155.

The same rule is declared in Estate of Wallace, 64 Cal. App. 107, 220 P. 682, with reference to which the Supreme Court, in denying a rehearing, expressed its disapproval, and referred to the correct rule as stated in a number of other cases decided by that court. The rule referred to by the Supreme Court was applied in the case of Chalmers v. Hawkins, 78 Cal. App. 733, 248 P. 727, and we quote it:

> "As the rule is stated in other jurisdictions, circumstantial evidence in civil cases, in order to be sufficient to sustain the verdict, need not rise to that degree of certainty which will exclude every reasonable conclusion other than that arrived at by the jury."

Our Supreme Court has stated the rule to be that, before the verdict can be set aside upon appeal, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence which is circumstantial in its nature, it must be clearly made to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusions reached by the court below. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389. The principle contended for by appellant is more applicable as a rule to guide a jury in its deliberations upon the facts than it is a rule to guide the appellate court in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence. Peters v. McKay, 136 Cal. 73, 68 P. 478. The connection between negligence and injury is not one that is required to be made by an eyewitness or by direct testimony, nor must actual demonstration of such connection be made. The connection may be shown by circumstantial evidence in the same way that any other fact may be proved. Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 191 P. 703. Reviewing the evidence in the light of the correct rule which we have stated, and conceding that the evidence may not exclude every supposition or theory to the contrary, we nevertheless hold that the conclusions reached by the trial court in respect to the manner of death find reasonable support in the evidence, and that our inquiry is there terminated. Taylor v. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co. (Cal. App.) 260 P. 898; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111.

[9] It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that decedent was not intoxicated at the time of the injury. Her husband testified that she had been with him all the day preceding the night when she disappeared, and that she was not intoxicated when he left her at 11:30 p. m., when she entered the hotel. An employee of appellant testified that, when she saw decedent a few minutes afterward, in the office of the hotel, decedent was intoxicated. This is merely conflicting evidence, and the conflict was resolved in favor of respondent. There was substantial evidence to support this finding, and we are precluded from disturbing the same.

[10] Appellant complains that the proof does not conform to the facts pleaded in the complaint. On the question of negligence there was ample evidence to justify the court in finding that the gate and railing were maintained in a defective condition. Here again appellant indulges in several theories of his own to show that the injury might have been caused by the gate remaining open; hence there was a variance between pleading and proof. The answer to this is that the court upon substantial evidence found otherwise, and, as we have indicated, such conclusions cannot be disturbed. The cases cited by appellant on this question are those where there is an entire absence of any testimony to support the negligence where specific acts are pleaded. In the instant case, it is charged in the complaint that "defendants negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully maintained said railing, gate, and locking device in said condition." There was substantial evidence to support a finding as to the truth of this allegation, and we are not called upon to analyze the various theories suggested by counsel. The fact that there was other evidence which, if it had been adopted by the court in its finding, might have occasioned a variance between pleading and proof, is of no concern. We see no merit in this contention.

[11-13] The complaint alleged that decedent brushed lightly against the gate. No finding is made in this precise language, but the court finds, in the language of the complaint, that decedent, relying upon the railing and the gate, which was a part thereof, passed along the stairway and said gate gave way. It is not essential that findings follow the precise language of the pleading. The question is, Can the truth or falsity of the material allegations be demonstrated therefrom? Frascona v. L. A. Ry. Corp., 48 Cal. App. 135, 191 P. 968. The ultimate fact to be found was, Did decedent rely upon said gate and railing in passing along the stairway? There was no direct evidence that she brushed against the gate, but there were facts from which the court could infer that she relied upon the gate. The cases cited by appellant, including the Frascona decision mentioned, supra, involve the findings in respect to negligence, and they refer to the injustice done the opposing party where some particular act of negligence is alleged, and some entirely different act is attempted to be proved. That prejudice may result from such a situation, we have no doubt. In the instant case the allegation thus omitted from the findings is not on the question of negligence, but is merely a probative fact connected with the details of the occurrence. The ultimate fact found by the court was that plaintiff relied upon the gate and railing. The findings must be given a liberal construction, in support of the judgment, by an appellate court, and it is inconceivable, that any harm could have been done to defendant by reason of the failure of the court to follow the precise language of the pleading.

[14] Error is urged in the admission of testimony by plaintiff as to the earnings of his wife. Such evidence was clearly admissible under a general allegation of damages, as proof of the loss of services of the deceased wife. It was an element of damages which naturally and necessarily resulted and flowed from the act complained of (8 Cal. Jur. p. 887), and was not required to be specially pleaded.

[15] Numerous other assignments of error are made with reference to the admission of testimony. We have examined them with care, but can find no valid objection to the rulings made thereon by the learned trial judge. Moreover, appellant has neglected and failed to point out wherein he was prejudiced by such rulings. If an appellant seeks a reversal upon such grounds, not only must he convince the reviewing court that the trial court erred, but he must go further, and show that the ruling complained of was prejudicial in its effect and result. While there may be occasions where, from the nature of the evidence itself, prejudice in its admission must necessarily result, the record here does not permit of the application of that principle.

[16] As to the order denying the motion for nonsuit, the action of the court was proper, in the light of the testimony of plaintiff as summarized, supra. There was substantial evidence tending to prove the facts necessary to make out plaintiff's case. Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered in favor of plaintiff upon such a motion. Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 P. 25.

The judgment is affirmed.

VALLEY BANK v. HILLSIDE PACKING CO. (Civ. 4758).

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages ⊂⇒136—Rights of mortgagor's creditors and subsequent purchasers are superior to mortgage lien on crop removed through mortgagee's consent or lack of diligence (Civ. Code, § 2955 et seq., and § 2972, modifying St. 1850, p. 267, § 17, as amended by St. 1856, p. 87).

Under Civ. Code, § 2972, modifying St. 1850, p. 267, § 17, as amended by St. 1856, p. 87, and Civ. Code, § 2955 et seq., lien of crop mortgage is not lost through tortious removal of crop without mortgagee's act, permission, or carelessness, nor when possession thereof uninterruptedly succeeds period of protection by recordation, but rights of mortgagor's creditors and purchasers subsequent to removal are not inferior to mortgage lien if crop is removed through mortgagee's consent or lack of reasonable diligence to protect his rights after harvest.

2. Chattel mortgages ⊂⇒157(2)—Burden was on crop mortgagee to rebut presumption of extinguishment of lien by showing that crop was removed without its consent (Civ. Code, § 2972).

Removal of crop from land constituted prima facie extinguishment of lien of mortgage thereon, under Civ. Code, § 2972, and burden was on mortgagee to rebut such presumption by showing that removal was without his knowledge and consent, and hence tortious.

3. Chattel mortgages ⊂⇒219—Removal of crop, with mortgagee's consent, to packing house of company, and sale thereof extinguished mortgage lien (Civ. Code, § 2972).

Removal of fruit crop from land with consent of mortgagee bank, which took no steps to protect its lien, to packing house of company which applied proceeds of sale thereof, with mortgagor's consent, to extinguishment of loan made by such company for purpose of packing and hauling crop, freed crop and proceeds from mortgage lien, except as between original parties to loan, under Civ. Code, § 2972.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Valley Bank against the Hillside Packing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Avery J. Howe, of Lindsay, for appellant.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This action was tried before the court without a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. To the appeal plaintiff has not seen fit to respond, either orally or by brief.

Anna R. Close and Hattie N. Peckham borrowed $1,000 from plaintiff on a promissory note and secured such note with a mortgage on an orange crop. This was duly recorded. The mortgagors subsequently received advances from the defendant (appellant here) in different sums, amounting in all to $504.43. Concerning these advances appellant's secretary and bookkeeper testified:

> "We loaned Mr. and Mrs. Close the sums of money in order to pick and haul their crop. We advanced altogether $504.43. * * * We did not know that there was any crop mortgage upon this fruit, and it was with that understanding that the fruit was delivered to the house. * * * My understanding at that time was that the crop was clear, and that the advances would be made as a first lien."

We are not informed as to the nature of this claimed lien, nor of facts which would enable us to determine whether it was a lien at all. The fruit was delivered to defendant's packing house and sold, bringing a net return of $727.29; $505.48 of this was applied in cancellation of the sums advanced, leaving the sum of $221.81 subject to the order of court. It appears indisputably from the evidence that the respondent bank, after loaning the money, authorized the delivery of the crop to any packing house, leaving the selection thereof and the circumstances of the handling of the fruit with the mortgagors.

Appellant contends that the crop mortgage lost its vitality when the crop was removed from the premises, and that, therefore, the judgment is wrong and should be reversed.

[1] As this subject has been fruitful of much litigation and lack of clear understanding, it is perhaps justifiable that the history of the crop mortgage law should be sketched here.

The first Legislature of the state enacted the following:

> "No mortgage of personal property hereafter made shall be valid against any other persons than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee." Stats. 1850, c. 114, § 17.

Under this statute no crop mortgage was good save between the parties thereto, unless legal title to the land upon which the crop was growing was transferred to the mortgagee.

The statute was amended in 1856 (St. 1856, p. 87) by adding to the original section a proviso as follows:

> "Provided, that a mortgage upon growing crops, executed, acknowledged and recorded, like mortgages upon real estate, shall be valid as against third parties without such delivery of possession, but the lien of such mortgage shall cease as against subsequent purchasers, unless possession of such crops, when harvested, be delivered to the mortgagee, as required in other cases of mortgage of personal property."

Thus the requirement of possession by mortgagee is modified by the substitution of a recorded mortgage until the harvest of the crop.

In 1872 the subject of crop mortgages was carried into the Code (section 2955 et seq., Civ. Code), and all mortgages were thereafter void, except as between the parties, unless recorded.

In 1878 section 2972 of the Civil Code was enacted:

> "The lien of a mortgage on a growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as the same remains on the land of mortgagor."

It will be seen that this section broadens the effectiveness of the lien. Under it a crop lien complying to Code requirements is good as against the world, so long as the crop remains on the land (the farm) on which it was grown—even after harvest or conversion to other products. It follows logically that if the crop happen to be removed through no act or permission or carelessness of the mortgagee it has been removed tortiously, and therefore no legal rights should be gained or lost through such act. Accordingly, in Martin v. Thompson, 63 Cal. 3, and Wilson v. Prouty, 70 Cal. 196, 11 P. 608, the Supreme Court took this step by deciding that the lien under section 2972, Civil Code, is not lost through a tortious removal of the crop.

Again, it follows that the rights of creditors of the mortgagor and purchasers subsequent to removal should not be inferior to the lien if the crop has been removed through consent or lack of reasonable diligence of the mortgagee to protect his rights after harvest. Accordingly, as in the case of Horgan v. Zanetta, 107 Cal. 27, 40 P. 22, the court said that when the crop was removed from the premises the "mortgage had prima facie been extinguished," and, in determining that it had actually been extinguished in the cited case, the court remarked:

> "It does not appear that the mortgagee used any care or diligence in looking after the crop when harvested, or paid any attention to the grain until after it had been attached, which was about a month and a half after Murphy commenced to harvest it, and nearly a month after [the owner] had removed it from his land."

To the same effect is Ramsey v. California Packing Corporation, 51 Cal. App. 517, 201 P. 481. This case is surprisingly like the instant case.

Another contingency has arisen which also has been met by the courts. When the crop is harvested it must be cared for, and few farms are equipped to care for crops in the interim from harvest to use or sale. The mortgagor's removal without consent of the mortgagee would be tortious. Consent that he may do so would extinguish the mortgage lien. But originally possession of a chattel was required to be and remain in the mortgagee or become extinguished. Recordation of the mortgage was substituted for possession so long as the crop remained on the ground, and no longer. When met with this situation the courts, through sound reason, decided that when the possession of the chattel uninterruptedly succeeds the period of protection by recordation, the lien is not to be extinguished. See Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 76 P. 243, and Crosby v. Fresno Fruit Growers' Co., 30 Cal. App. 308, 158 P. 1070.

[2, 3] In the instant case the removal of the crop from the land constituted a prima facie extinguishment of the lien of the mortgage, and, as stated in Ramsey v. California Packing Corporation, supra:

> "It rested upon the mortgagee, if he would still enjoy the benefit of his mortgage security, to rebut that presumption by showing that the crops were removed without his knowledge and consent and that it was, therefore, a tortious removal."

Or, as stated in the same case on the next succeeding page:

> "This agreement [in the instant case the consent to remove to any packing house] amounted in practical effect to a substitution of the personal obligation of the mortgagors for the security of the mortgage."

Here the money was advanced by appellant and the debt incurred while the fruit was on the ground. So far the mortgage, being recorded, was ahead of it. However, the fruit was removed and sold by the mortgagor under permission of the mortgagee, but not under the name or direction of the mortgagee, and the receipts were paid to appellant, who, with the mortgagor's consent, applied sufficient thereof to extinguish the loan made for the purpose of picking and hauling the crop. It is clear that the application of the money to appellant's loan was after the fruit had left the lands upon which it had grown, and that this removal, being with the consent of the mortgagee bank and without its having taken any steps to protect its mortgage lien, freed the fruit from the mortgage incumbrance. It follows that the money received therefor was released from the operation of the lien as well, except as between the original parties to the loan.

Judgment reversed.

McCAIN v. BURCH. (Civ. 3504.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1928.

Judgment 🔑256(7)—Portion of judgment requiring payment of attorney's fees as condition precedent to cancellation of void note and mortgage held void as without issues.

In action by wife against attorney to cancel mortgage where court found that note and mortgage were fraudulent and void and given without consideration, held, that portion of judgment that plaintiff's husband employed defendant as attorney and that there was due from plaintiff to defendant certain sum as attorney's fees, and requiring plaintiff to pay such fees as condition precedent to cancellation of note and mortgage, was void as being without support in the finding and as an attempt to adjudicate matter which was not embraced within the issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action to cancel mortgage by Belle McCain against Charles E. Burch, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From portion of judgment in her favor containing certain conditions, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

W. Jefferson Davis and Schoonover & Winnek, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is a suit brought to cancel a certain mortgage given by appellant and her husband to respondent, and covering the separate property of appellant. Judgment was rendered canceling said mortgage, upon certain conditions being complied with. The appeal is from that portion of said judgment which contains said conditions, and is based upon the judgment roll.

The following allegations appear in the complaint: That respondent was the attorney for the husband of appellant George McCain, now deceased; that said McCain was in financial difficulties, and said attorney advised appellant that in order to protect her real property from her husband's creditors, she mortgage the same to him; that at this time appellant was the sole owner of certain real property which is described in the mortgage; that pursuant to said advice of said attorney, appellant executed the mortgage in question to him. The amount of said mortgage was $15,000, and it was given to secure the payment of a note dated August 11, 1922; that said note and mortgage were obtained by respondent through undue influence and without consideration; and that the execution of said documents was procured by respondent wrongfully and fraudulently and with intent to defraud appellant. Cancellation of said instruments is prayed for.

Respondent filed an answer admitting the execution of said instruments, but denying all the other allegations of the complaint. He also filed a cross-complaint, praying for a foreclosure of said mortgage. The answer alleged that the note and mortgage were given as security for the amount due respondent on account of legal services, and costs advanced in connection therewith.

The court found that the note and mortgage were obtained without consideration and under undue influence. It further found, however, that appellant's husband employed respondent, during the month the said instruments were executed, as his attorney, and that there was due from appellant to respondent the sum of $3,500 as an attorney fee and $235 costs advanced by him, making a total of $3,735. As conclusions of law, the court "decides" that appellant is entitled to judgment against respondent, requiring him to surrender to appellant the said note, and is entitled to have the said mortgage released of record, "and that as a condition precedent to the surrendering up of said note and the releasing of said mortgage, said plaintiff and cross-defendant shall pay to the said Burch, within 60 days of date of judgment herein, the sum of $3,500 attorney's fees, and the further sum of $235 disbursements made by the said defendant and cross-complainant Charles E. Burch for and on behalf of said plaintiff and cross-defendant Belle McCain, making a total sum of $3,735, without interest and without costs."

Judgment was thereupon entered as follows:

> "Now, therefore, by reason of the premises, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff and cross-defendant, Belle McCain, is entitled to a judgment against the defendant and cross-complainant, Charles E. Burch, requiring the said defendant and cross-complainant, Charles E. Burch, to surrender unto said plaintiff and cross-defendant the promissory note and mortgage described in the findings of fact and conclusions of law herein, and is entitled to have the said mortgage released of record in the county recorder's office of San Diego county, Cal., provided, however, that as a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to have the said note and mortgage surrendered, canceled, and released, the said plaintiff and cross-defendant, Belle McCain, shall pay to the said defendant and cross-complainant, Charles E. Burch, within 60 days from the date of the entry of judgment herein, the sum of $3,500 as attorney's fees due from the said Belle McCain to the said Charles E. Burch, and the further sum of $235 disbursements made by the said Charles E. Burch for and on behalf of the said Belle McCain, or a total of $3,735 without interest; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that if said sum of $3,735 be not so paid to the defendant and cross-complainant within 60 days from the time of the entry of judgment herein, that said amount, to wit, $3,735 shall be and is hereby adjudged to be a lien upon all the right, title, and interest of the said Belle McCain in and to the following described property situated in the city of San Diego, county of San Diego, state of California, to wit: Lots 1, 2, and 3 in block 4 of Nutt's addition to the city of San Diego according to the map thereof on file in the county recorder's office of San Diego, California—and if not so paid, that execution issue therefor.
> "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that in the event the said sum of $3,735 is paid to the said Charles E. Burch within 60 days from the entry of the judgment herein, that he shall be forever debarred from foreclosing the said mortgage as prayed for in his cross-complaint herein."

The portion of the judgment appealed from commences with the words "provided, however," and continues to the end thereof.

No appearance on this appeal is made by respondent. Appellant contends that the judgment is not supported by the findings. We are in accord with this view. The court found expressly that the note and mortgage were fraudulent and void and then proceeded to treat them as valid when, in the judgment, they are used by respondent as a weapon to force appellant to pay the debt of her husband to the attorney who was found guilty of such fraud. The court found that the husband employed said attorney. This is a very unusual situation, where the court finds the attorney secured the note and mortgage through fraud practiced upon appellant, and yet refuses to give her a cancellation to which it found she was entitled, until she paid a certain obligation which arose out of matters which were not in issue in the case. The attorney fee could not have been part of the consideration for the note, because the court found the note was given without consideration. It will be noted that the judgment only forbids foreclosure in the event the said attorney's fee is paid within 60 days from the entry thereof. In other words, if appellant did not pay said sum within said time, respondent could proceed to force payment of a mortgage which the court had found void, and which was procured through his own fraud.

Indulging in every intendment in favor of upholding the judgment, the pleadings do not disclose any allegations which could give rise to the issue on the question of the attorney fee rendered under an employment with appellant's husband, who was deceased when the complaint was filed herein. It might have been litigated under the guise of a consideration for the mortgage, but the court expressly found that the note and mortgage were executed without consideration. This carries with it an implied finding that respondent was not entitled to an attorney fee in connection with the transaction in question, for he expressly alleges in his answer that the said attorney fee and costs were due him as a consideration for the execution of said mortgage.

The question as to the effect of a provision in the judgment which is not within the legal issues, is clearly discussed by Preston, J., in the case of Baar v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 827, where it is held that so much of the judgment as attempts to adjudicate such issues is null and void. That case is also authority upon the question as to the extent the trial court is bound and limited by the pleadings, in rendering its judgment. The language of the learned justice in the case last cited is peculiarly appropriate to the matter under consideration here, and we quote therefrom:

> "If such provisions [in the judgment] could be sustained, pleadings could be dispensed with altogether. A litigant under such laxity could receive benefits or injuries that he could not expect or anticipate until the chancellor, without restraint of any kind, announced the length of his own foot."

The portion of the said judgment referred to is without support in the findings. Los Angeles Brewing Co. v. Klinge, 7 Cal. App.

550, 95 P. 44. It also attempts to adjudicate a matter which was not embraced within the issues. Baar v. Smith, supra.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom that portion thereof appealed from, appellant to recover her costs on appeal.

PODRAT et al. v. OBERNDORFF et al.★ (Civ. 6166.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 18, 1928.

Rehearing Granted June 15, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages ⚷249—Assignee of chattel mortgage had option after default to sell mortgaged property under power of sale or foreclose in usual manner (Civ. Code, §§ 2986–3011, and §§ 2967, 3011).

Assignee of chattel mortgage on default had option to proceed to sell mortgaged property as a pledge under power of sale, pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 2986–3011, or to foreclose chattel mortgage in the usual manner in a court of equity in accordance with sections 2967, 3011, notwithstanding only power conferred by chattel mortgage in event of default was power of sale.

2. Chattel mortgages ⚷249—Mortgages ⚷390—Lien creditor may disregard power of sale conveyed by mortgage or trust deed and elect to foreclose mortgage in manner provided by law.

Where a power of sale is conferred by a mortgage or trust deed, the authorized power of sale is not the only method of satisfying the lien which is created, for such power of sale is merely cumulative remedy, and lien creditor may disregard power of sale and elect to foreclose mortgage in a court of equity in manner provided by law.

3. Contracts ⚷127(1)—Attempt on part of contracting parties to deprive court of general jurisdiction to foreclose mortgage is utterly void.

Any effort on part of contracting parties to deprive a court of equity of its general jurisdiction to foreclose mortgages by means of incorporating in instrument terms to that effect is utterly void, as an unwarranted interference with ordinary course of judicial procedure.

4. Chattel mortgages ⚷283—Mortgages ⚷486—Failure of decree foreclosing chattel mortgage and trust deed to preserve equity of redemption held not error (Civ. Code, § 2903).

Failure of decree foreclosing chattel mortgage and trust deed to preserve right of redemption held not error, since under Civ. Code, § 2903, when a sale is duly consummated pursuant to power conferred in chattel mortgage or transfer duly made pursuant to terms of trust deed, all equity of redemption is foreclosed and grantor or mortgagor is thereby divested of entire interest in title.

5. Appeal and error ⚷843(2)—Right to foreclose chattel mortgage or trust deed by procedure in equity becomes moot after payment of judgment.

Question relative to right to foreclose chattel mortgage or trust deed containing specific power of sale pursuant to law of pledges by means of ordinary procedure in equity became moot after judgment was fully paid and satisfied, except as to items of attorney's fees and taxes.

6. Appeal and error ⚷843(1)—Court will not consider points raised on appeal which have been settled and become moot.

Where certain points raised on appeal are settled and have become moot, court will not consider them, but will devote its attention to remaining points in controversy.

7. Chattel mortgages ⚷290—Attorney's fees held improperly allowed, where agreement therefor in chattel mortgage did not contemplate services for foreclosing mortgage in court of equity (Code Civ. Proc. § 1021).

Where agreement contained in chattel mortgage with power of sale relative to payment of counsel fees did not contemplate services for foreclosing mortgage in court of equity, such fees were improperly allowed, since allowance of attorney's fees, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1021, depends entirely on contract between parties.

8. Chattel mortgages ⚷290—Mortgages ⚷581(5)—Reasonable attorney's fees may be allowed, where provision therefor is stipulated, but amount left blank.

Where a provision in mortgage for attorney's fees is stipulated, but amount is left blank, a reasonable fee may be allowed; but, in absence of stipulation for payment thereof, there can be no recovery.

9. Chattel mortgages ⚷283—Mortgages ⚷490—Amount paid by mortgagee as taxes held erroneously allowed on foreclosure, where complaint failed to allege any sum was so paid.

Where complaint in action to foreclose chattel mortgage and trust deed failed to allege that any sum for taxes was paid by plaintiffs, allowance in decree of item paid for taxes was erroneous, since question of taxes did not become an issue in trial of case.

10. Appeal and error ⚷1170(1)—Constitutional provision eliminating reversal for defect of pleadings, except when it accomplishes miscarriage of justice, did not dispense with pleadings or evidence on material issue (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Const. art 6, § 4½, providing that judgment shall not be reversed for any defect of pleading, except when such defect accomplishes a miscarriage of justice, held not to dispense with either pleadings or evidence on a material issue, as being only intended to remedy defective pleadings and improper admission or rejection of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Abner Podrat and others against Oscar Oberndorff, Carrie Belle Watson, Findlay Watson, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants Carrie Belle and Findlay Watson appeal. Modified and, as modified, affirmed.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a decree foreclosing a chattel mortgage and also a trust deed given to secure a loan.

October 1, 1923, for value, the defendant Oberndorff executed his note for $8,000 in favor of the appellants Carrie Belle and Findlay Watson, payable in installments of $200 each month. This note was secured by chattel mortgage on the furniture of the Plaza Hotel at Whittier Cal. November 17, 1923, this note and chattel mortgage were assigned to the respondents. The appellants, who were husband and wife, at the same time executed and delivered to the respondents their promissory note for $7,800 secured by a trust deed on lot 18, block 29, of the original city of Whittier, as collateral security for the payment of the note and chattel mortgage first mentioned. As a part of the same transaction the appellants and respondents executed an agreement imposing certain conditions with respect to the obligations incurred by the foregoing instruments, for the default of which the foreclosure of both the chattel mortgage and trust deed heretofore mentioned were authorized. In the event of foreclosure, the agreement specified that appellants would refund any taxes which the respondents were compelled to pay pursuant to said transaction. The appellants defaulted in the payment of several installments of the first-mentioned note. After demand, this action was commenced in a court of equity to foreclose the chattel mortgage and the trust deed. Judgment was rendered in favor of the respondents for $5,900 and interest, together with $517.67 attorney's fees and $140.04 taxes.

The appellants contend that (1) the respondents had no authority to foreclose the chattel mortgage in the ordinary equitable proceeding, since the only power conferred by the chattel mortgage, in the event of default, was for the mortgagee to seize the property and sell it pursuant to division 3, pt. 4, tit. 14, c. 3, of the Civil Code, as a pledge; that (2) the trial court erred in allowing attorney's fees and taxes, and that (3) the decree failed to preserve appellants' right of redemption.

[1-4] The chattel mortgage provided that:

> "If the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment as * * * provided, then the mortgagee may take possession of the property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount of said note specified, and all costs of sale, including counsel fees not to exceed ——— per cent. upon the amount due. * * *"

In the event of default, a power of sale may be conferred by the mortgage upon the mortgagee or upon any other person. Section 2932, Civ. Code. This power of sale conferred upon a mortgagee is deemed to be a part of the security for which the mortgage is given, and may be transferred to another by assignment. Section 858, Civ. Code. Upon default in the payment of any installment of the note, as assignee of the chattel mortgage, the respondents had the option to proceed to sell the mortgaged furniture as a pledge under the power of sale pursuant to division 3, pt. 4, tit. 14, c. 3, of the Civil Code, or to foreclose the chattel mortgage in the usual manner in a court of equity. Section 2967 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "A mortgagee of personal property * * * may foreclose the mortgagor's right of redemption by a sale of the property, made in the manner and upon the notice prescribed by the title on 'pledge,' or by proceedings under the Code of Civil Procedure."

And with respect to the foreclosure of the right of redemption of a pledge, section 3011 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Instead of selling property pledged, as hereinbefore provided, a pledgee may foreclose the right of redemption by a judicial sale, under the direction of a competent court. * * *" Donohoe v. Gamble, 38 Cal. 340, 99 Am. Dec. 399.

So, also, where a power of sale is conferred by a mortgage or trust deed, the authorized power of sale is not the only method of satisfying the lien which is created, for this power of sale is merely a cumulative remedy. The lien creditor may disregard the power of sale and elect to foreclose the mortgage in a court of equity in the manner provided by law. 3 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) 745, § 2234; also page 802, § 2295; Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 116; Fighiera v. Radis, 180 Cal. 660, 664, 182 P. 418; Cortelyou v. Vogel, 51 Cal. App. 785, 788, 197 P. 968; 5 Cal. Jur. 112, § 53. Any effort on the part of the contracting parties to deprive a court of equity of its general jurisdiction to foreclose mortgages by means of incorporating in the instrument terms to that effect is utterly void as an unwarranted interference with the ordinary course of judicial procedure. Guaranty Trust Co. v. Green Cove Railroad Co., 139 U. S. 137, 142, 11 S. Ct. 512, 35 L. Ed. 116; Sauter v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. A.) 8 F. (2d) 121; Brown v. Denver Omnibus & Cab Co. (C. C. A.) 254 F. 560, 569;

Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Bankers', etc., Tel. Co., 44 Hun (N. Y.) 400, 406. The equitable foreclosure of the trust deed and chattel mortgage in the manner pursued in the present case was therefore proper in spite of the power of sale conferred by the chattel mortgage. Nor was there error in failing to provide in the decree for an equity of redemption. When a sale is duly consummated pursuant to the power conferred in a chattel mortgage, or a transfer has been duly made pursuant to the terms of a trust deed, all equity of redemption is thereby foreclosed, and the grantor or mortgagor is thereby divested of his entire interest and title. Section 2903, Civ. Code; Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 414; Frese v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 11 Cal. App. 387, 396, 105 P. 265; Bell Mining Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Butte, 156 U. S. 470, 15 S. Ct. 440, 39 L. Ed. 497.

In support of their contention that a court of equity had no jurisdiction to foreclose a trust deed or chattel mortgage which contained a direct power of sale as in the present case, the appellants rely upon the cases of Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256, 73 Am. Dec. 651; Herbert Kraft Co. v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 73 P. 745; and Galusha v. Meserve, 58 Cal. App. 174, 208 P. 348. Neither of these cases are authority in conflict with the foregoing well-established rule to the effect that a specific power of sale conferred by a trust deed or a chattel mortgage, and the ordinary equitable procedure of foreclosure, are mere cumulative remedies, either of which may be pursued in foreclosing a lien. It is true that the statement is made in these cases that an ordinary suit to foreclose a trust deed will not lie. But this declaration was not necessary to the determination of either of these cases, and is dicta having been inadvertently made, and conflicts with the uniform trend of American authorities. In the Koch Case above cited the purchaser of the real property, which was sold pursuant to a power of sale conferred by a trust deed, brought an action in ejectment for the possession of the property. A demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the complaint failed to demand a judicial foreclosure of the trust deed as a mortgage. Final judgment was entered upon this ruling. On appeal the judgment was reversed. The question of whether a trust deed could be foreclosed as a mortgage was not involved in that action. In the Herbert Kraft Case cited by appellants, an action was brought on a promissory note. In a cross-complaint which was filed in that action, the defendant alleged that a sale of property occurred under the provisions of a trust deed, the proceeds from which sale he claimed he was entitled to credit on his promissory note. On motion of plaintiff, the allegations respecting the sale were stricken from the cross-complaint. These allegations were held to be immaterial to the action. The question of the proper method of terminating the lien created by the trust deed was not there involved. On appeal the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. The expression of the court that "on such an instrument, a suit for foreclosure will not lie," was not necessarily involved. Likewise, in the Galusha Case above cited, a suit was brought to set aside a deed executed pursuant to a power of sale conferred by a trust deed. The validity of the sale under the trust deed was the only issue involved in the action. It was not necessary to determine whether a foreclosure of mortgage might also have been a proper method of procedure. The court inadvertently approved the foregoing quotation from the former cases without the necessity of so doing. In the case of Bell Mining Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Butte, 156 U. S. 470, 15 S. Ct. 440, 39 L. Ed. 497, Mr. Justice Field, who also wrote the opinion in the Koch Case, supra, nullified the objectionable language used in the former case when he says at page 477 (15 S. Ct. 443):

> "The power of sale in the indenture, whether we call it a deed of trust or a mortgage, does not change its character as an instrument for the security of the indebtedness designated, but it is an additional authority to the grantee or mortgagee, and if he does not choose to foreclose the mortgage by any of the ordinary methods provided by law, he can proceed under the power added for the sale of the property, to obtain payment of the indebtedness. The insertion of a power of sale does not affect the mortgagor's right to redeem so long as the power remains unexecuted and the mortgage is not, as it may be, foreclosed in the ordinary manner, but when a sale is made of the interest of the mortgagor, his right is wholly divested, embracing his equity of redemption."

The facts of the Bell Mining Case, supra, were almost exactly like the facts of the Koch Case. Mr. Justice Field here recognizes the legal right to terminate the lien created by a trust deed by a sale either as a pledge or by foreclosure.

[5, 6] Moreover, so far as the general question of the right to foreclose a chattel mortgage or trust deed containing a specific power of sale pursuant to the law of pledges by means of the ordinary procedure in equity is concerned, that has become moot in the present case for the reason that the briefs of the respective parties disclose the fact that the judgment has been fully paid and satisfied by the appellants, except as to the items of attorney's fees and taxes. In response to this charge, the appellants admit in their closing brief that:

> "We were compelled to pay the amount of the judgment, except attorney's fees and taxes."

If certain points raised on the appeal are settled and have become moot, the court will not consider them, but will devote its attention to the remaining points in controversy. 2 Cal. Jur. 804, § 472, and cases there cited.

[7] Attorney's fees were, however, improperly allowed in the present case for the reason that the agreement contained in the chattel mortgage to pay counsel fees did not contemplate services for foreclosing the mortgage in a court of equity.

The allowance of attorney's fees depends entirely upon the contract between the parties. 3 Cal. Jur. 683, § 84. Section 1021 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "The measure and mode of compensation of attorneys and counselors at law is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties. * * *"

[8] The only contract for the payment of attorney's fees in the present case is found in the language of the chattel mortgage heretofore quoted, which provides that, in the event of default, the mortgagee may take possession of the property and proceed "to sell the same in the manner provided by law (as a pledge) and from the proceeds (of such sale) pay the whole amount of said note, ———, including the counsel fees not to exceed——— per cent. * * *" Where a provision for attorney's fees is stipulated, but the amount is left blank, a reasonable fee may be allowed. 3 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) 514, § 2059; Alden v. Pryal, 60 Cal. 215. If there is no stipulation in the mortgage for the payment of counsel fees, they cannot be allowed. 3 Jones on Mortgages, supra, 215, § 2059; 5 Cal. Jur. 109, § 50; Fell v. Frierson, 171 Cal. 351, 153 P. 229; Sichel v. De Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493; Boob v. Hall, 107 Cal. 160 40 P. 117. In the case last cited it is said:

> "Neither the prayer in the complaint for its allowance nor the averment of the amount which would be reasonable can supply the necessity of a direct averment that an attorney's fee had been agreed to be paid by the mortgagor."

If, however, the fees are provided for in the note, although they are omitted from the mortgage, under proper pleadings, they may still be allowed. Worth v. Worth, 155 Cal. 599, 102 P. 663; National Bank of California v. Mulford, 17 Cal. App. 551, 120 P. 446. But attorney's fees will not be awarded in a foreclosure suit unless proper averments authorizing the same are incorporated in the pleadings. 19 Standard Ency. of Proc. 1056.

The specific question involved in the present case is whether a contract to allow attorney's fees for the seizure and sale of personal property under a chattel mortgage will authorize the allowance for the performance of entirely different service, to wit, the foreclosure of the mortgage. The respondent claims that the language of the chattel mortgage implies that attorney's fees were contracted to be paid for services performed in satisfaction of the mortgage lien, by whatever procedure this end was accomplished. No case is cited in support of this claim. On the contrary, it is said in 3 Jones on Mortgages, supra, at page 520:

> "Under a provision in a power of sale for an attorney's fee in case of foreclosure by (seizure and sale) no allowance can be made if the mortgage is foreclosed in chancery instead." Van Marter v. McMillan, 39 Mich. 304; Sage v. Riggs, 12 Mich. 313; Hardwick v. Bassett, 29 Mich. 17.

In the case of Brown & Parler v. Kolb, 92 S. C. 309, 75 S. E. 529, it is said:

> "The mortgage provided that on default, the mortgagee might seize and sell the property, and that upon the sale 'he shall apply the proceeds of such sale, after deducting all expenses and charges, including attorney's fees, toward the payment and discharge of the indebtedness,' etc. Under a similar contract, it was held in Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 482, 40 S. E. 887, that the mortgagee could not claim the fees if he foreclosed by action and not by seizure under the power."

The judgment in this last-mentioned case was modified by striking out the amount allowed for attorney's fees. Upon the foregoing authorities, we are of the opinion that the counsel's fees were improperly allowed in the present case.

[9] So, also, the item of $140.04, paid by respondents for taxes, was erroneously allowed, for the reason that the complaint failed to allege that any sum for taxes was paid by the respondents. The question of taxes was not an issue in the trial of the case. In the case of Brichetto v. Raney, 76 Cal. App. 232, 245 P. 235, relied on by respondents in support of this contention, it appears that the complaint there alleged the authorization which was contained in the mortgage to reimburse the mortgagee for any taxes paid by him, together with the fact that he had incurred the expense by so doing, and a prayer for reimbursement.

[10] The respondents contend that the question of the allowance of attorney's fees and of taxes is not reviewable, since the appeal is based solely upon the judgment roll, and since the evidence is not before this court for consideration. And, furthermore, the respondents assert that under article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, a judgment may not be reversed for any defect of pleadings, except when such a defect accomplishes a miscarriage of justice, citing Etienne v. Kendall (Cal. App.) 258 P. 435 [opinion adopted by Supreme Court, see 259 P. 752]. But the facts of that case were entirely different from those in the case at bar. In the present case the record discloses the fact that there was no contract to support an allowance of counsel fees, and no pleading upon which to base an allowance for refunding taxes. The constitutional provision relied upon by respondents was intended to remedy defective pleadings, and the improper admission or rejection of evidence. It is not intended to supply authority to dispense with either pleadings or evidence upon a material issue. Such a construction would be destructive of all rules of pleading and procedure. People v. Schiaffino, 73 Cal. App. 357, 360, 238 P. 725.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is modified so as to eliminate the allowance of $517.67 attorney's fees and $140.04 taxes. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The appellants will recover their costs of appeal.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

DAVIS et al. v. BROWN. (Civ. 3520.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 17, 1928.

1. Automobiles 🔑244(37)—Finding that driving car at excessive speed in tunnel causing it to skid and strike another car, was cause of injury to passenger, held sustained (Motor Vehicle Act, § 113, subd. (a).

In action for personal injuries sustained by passenger when automobile driven into tunnel, proceeding on wet and slippery pavement down grade, skidded when brakes were applied and struck another car, evidence held to warrant jury in coming to conclusions that collision resulted from negligent operation of automobile, and that, if driver had not been propelling same at rate of speed which was dangerous under conditions, collision would not have occurred, by reason of Motor Vehicle Act, § 113, subd. (a), St. 1923, p. 553, providing that no person shall drive any vehicle on public highway at such speed as to endanger life, limb, or property of any person.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1170(9)—In passenger's action for injuries, instruction, though erroneous, held not prejudicial to defendant, who was negligent (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In passenger's action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, instruction that car in which passenger was riding had "necessarily to turn out," though erroneous, because there was no testimony that defendant claimed he had to turn out, held not prejudicial, where defendant was negligent in driving down grade in tunnel, on wet slippery pavement, at excessive speed, especially in view of erroneous instructions which were favorable to defendant, by virtue of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Automobiles 🔑168(1)—That driver of car, driven at excessive speed, did all in his power to stop car, does not relieve owner from charge of negligence.

Fact that driver of car, being driven at excessive speed, does all in his power to stop car and to avoid collision, after discovering car in front of him, does not relieve owner from charge of negligence.

4. Automobiles 🔑242(1)—Inference of negligence in operating car on wet slippery pavement down grade in tunnel, at excessive speed, held warranted.

In action for personal injuries sustained while riding in automobile, where accident occurred while car was being driven down grade on wet, slippery pavement in tunnel, at excessive speed, held that inference of neglect in operating car was warranted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by George Davis and another against E. B. Brown for damages for personal injuries. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiffs had judgment for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis arising from an automobile collision between an automobile controlled and managed by the defendant, in which the said Nora Ellen Davis was riding, and a certain other automobile, known as and called in the testimony the "Chevrolet." The judgment also covered the costs and expenses incurred by the plaintiff George Davis. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The complaint alleges, and the answer admits, that the defendant E. B. Brown, during all the times mentioned in the complaint, was doing business under the fictitious names of Brown's Auto Tours and Brown's Pierce Arrow Auto Tours; that the business so conducted was owned individually by the defendant. The complaint also alleges that on January 14, 1925, while the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis was riding in an automobile as a guest of the defendant, and which automobile was owned and operated by him, northerly on north Broadway, and while traveling northerly through a certain tunnel known as the North Broadway tunnel, the defendant, through his agents and employees, so negligently operated the automobile in which plaintiff was riding that it collided with a certain other automobile then and there driven by one Mrs. E. W. Smith, which automobile was traveling southerly in said tunnel. The answer denies that the automobile was owned by the defendant, but does admit that it was being operated and controlled by the defendant, and was being driven by a chauffeur employed by the defendant. The answer further denies that the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis was riding as the guest of the defendant.

While it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis was riding as a guest of the defendant, and denied in the answer, the facts show that the said Nora Ellen Davis was really riding as a passenger for hire in the automobile controlled and operated by the defendant. The legal status of the parties involved is clearly shown by the statement of facts contained in the appellant's opening brief, from which we take the following excerpts:

> "The accident occurred January 14, 1925, at about 11:30 a. m. in the North Broadway, tunnel which is situate between Temple street and Sunset boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, and runs in a northerly and southerly direction. The automobile involved in the accident was a seven-passenger Lincoln sedan, and had been hired out by the defendant, together with the driver, to a real estate firm which was engaged in the business of selling lots in a new addition. The passengers of the car, including the plaintiff, were prospective purchasers and guests of this real estate firm, and had been picked up at their homes in different parts of the city for the purpose of being transported to the new real estate tract."

The record discloses that after the tour had commenced it was discontinued on account of rain, and the different persons carried in the car were being conveyed back to their respective homes at the time of the collision. It appears that, when the Lincoln sedan had traveled about one-fourth of the way through the tunnel, the driver thereof suddenly applied the brakes in an attempt to prevent colliding with a car in front of him, and in so doing, swung to the left in front of a Chevrolet car traveling in the opposite direction, and the collision occurred which resulted in the injury to the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis. No issue is raised as to the amount of the judgment. The points relied upon by the appellant are, first, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence; second, that the proof discloses no negligence on the part of the defendant; third, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury.

The testimony of the driver of the Lincoln sedan is to the effect that he entered the tunnel from the south, driving in a northerly direction; that his speed was about 14 or 15 miles an hour; that, when he was about a quarter of the way through, all at once a Ford car loomed up ahead of him, spinning around crosswise of the tunnel; that it had been raining and water had been carried into the tunnel by the traffic; that the pavement was very slippery; to prevent striking the Ford he applied his brakes, thereby immediately causing the rear of his own car to skid around sidewise to the left, and that his car was struck by a Chevrolet, which was on the west side of the tunnel traveling in a southerly direction; that the sedan was struck toward the rear end on the left-hand side where the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis was sitting; that he did not attempt to pass any other car in the tunnel, and was at all times on the right-hand side of the road until he applied his brakes, at which time his own car skidded sidewise, and the rear portion thereof went past the center of the road.

The plaintiffs' version of the accident, and as supported by their witnesses, is to the effect that the Lincoln sedan entered the tunnel traveling at a speed estimated from 20 to 25 miles per hour; that the sedan was pulled to the left as if to pass a car in front, and then the driver suddenly pulled the front of the car back to the right, causing his car to skid and slide sidewise to the left of the tunnel and to crash into the Chevrolet car, which was approaching from the south. The width of the portion of the tunnel used by vehicles, as referred to, is 30 feet and 6 inches. There is some testimony to the effect that there would be room for the sedan to have gone between a car in front of it and a car traveling in the opposite direction on the other side of the tunnel.

[1] After summarizing the testimony and argument to the effect that it was not sufficient to show negligence on the part of the driver of the Lincoln sedan, the appellant makes this statement:

> "Taking the highest estimate of the plaintiff and her witnesses, it will doubtless be conceded that the rate of speed of defendant's car did not exceed the limit fixed by the Motor Vehicle Act."

This statement evidently refers to subdivision 7 of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 554), as it read prior to the amendment adopted in 1927. The record in this cause, however, does not support appellant's contention in this particular. The Motor Vehicle Act does not fix any definite number of miles per hour at which speed a driver may propel an automobile and escape responsibility on the claim that he is not exceeding the speed limit designated at so many miles per hour in the act. The first subdivision of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act provides:

> "Any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person."

This subdivision applies, irrespective of whether the automobile is being driven at 15 miles per hour, 20 miles per hour or 40 miles per hour, as the statute now reads. (St. 1927, p. 1436). If the circumstances under which the automobile is being driven requires that it be propelled at a rate less than 15 miles an hour, then any rate of speed in excess of that which the circumstances permit as safe or reasonable in order to protect life, limb or property would be unlawful. In this case the testimony shows that as the automobile entered the tunnel it was proceeding on a down grade which had become wet and slippery by reason of the falling rain, and under such circumstances the driver of the Lincoln sedan was required by the Motor Vehicle Act to drive at a careful and prudent speed and not at a speed which would endanger life, limb, or property of the persons of any of his passengers. If, under such conditions, driving at a rate of 15 miles per hour, the car was likely to skid upon the application of its brakes and crash into cars moving in the opposite direction, such a rate of speed would be unlawful, and the jury would have a right to consider that under the circumstances the driver of the car was not exercising reasonable and proper care or having due regard to the traffic or surface of the highway on which he was traveling. The testimony leaves somewhat in doubt the question as to whether the Lincoln sedan had its headlights burning, but, assuming that the driver of the Lincoln sedan had turned on the lights, in accordance with his statement that "he usually turned on the lights," the conclusion would necessarily follow that he was driving into the tunnel at a rate of speed which, under the conditions, prevented him from having control of his car so that he could stop within the distance that other objects in the tunnel ahead of him could be seen by the use of such headlights.

The testimony of the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis was to the effect that the Lincoln sedan was traveling between 20 and 25 miles per hour going into the tunnel and at the time when they caught up with a line of cars going in the same direction through the tunnel; that the Lincoln was pulled to the left as if to pass the car in front, and then suddenly slowed down and pulled back to the right, when the car began to skid sidewise and skidded over to the left side of the tunnel and crashed into another car.

The testimony of Mrs. Smith, who was driving the Chevrolet with which the Lincoln collided, is to the following effect: There seemed to be a complete line of cars on each side so far as this witness could see. When she was about half way into the tunnel, she saw a car pull out of line and come toward the west side or side of the tunnel on which she was driving, and, as the car got part way across, it seemed to be going back into line. At that time the rear end of the Lincoln started to skid and came toward the Chevrolet. This witness testified that the Lincoln skidded about 100 feet, and hit the front of her car; that her car was standing still at the time; that she was driving a Chevrolet sedan; that the collision pretty nearly demolished the Chevrolet, the radiator was all smashed, front axel broken, all the tires completely ruined, both fenders broken off, and the body of the car was out of alignment. This witness testified that she saw the driver of the Lincoln turn out as if to start around a car in front traveling on the left thereof.

The witness Hazel Curran, also a passenger in the Lincoln sedan, testified that the accident occurred somewhere near the center of the tunnel; that she was sure that they were not going slow; that there was a line of cars coming on the opposite side of the tunnel. This witness testified that she would say that the Lincoln attempted to pass the line of cars in front, and then the driver tried to get back into line again, and, as he did so, the car skidded and crashed into the car coming toward the Lincoln; that it did not seem to her that the Lincoln slowed down any; that the driver of the Lincoln turned to the left and then turned to the right and the car skidded.

The witness Mrs. McKay testified that she was a passenger in the Lincoln sedan; that they were traveling northerly through the tunnel, approximately half way through; that the driver of the Lincoln pulled out as if to pass some machine ahead of him going northerly in the same direction, and then started to pull back into the line of traffic, and the car skidded; that her opinion was that the Lincoln was going quite fast.

A witness by the name of Balderson, who was in the tunnel at the time, testified that the Lincoln appeared to pull to the left and then back into line again; that he had driven cars for quite a while, observed different kinds of cars; that he would judge the Lincoln was traveling between 20 and 25 miles an hour when it turned out of the line of traffic and back in again; that the Lincoln skidded about 100 feet before it struck the Chevrolet, driving it up against the curb and back into the car in which the witness was riding; that the Chevrolet was driven back between 40 and 50 feet.

On the part of the defendant, there was testimony to the effect that the Ford car skidded and bumped into a car in front of it. The Ford car was traveling at a speed of between 10 and 15 miles per hour. The driver of the Lincoln testified that he did not see anything ahead of him; that all at once a Ford car loomed up ahead; it was spinning around in the tunnel; when the Lincoln skidded and was hit by the other car, the end of it was over on the left-hand side going north; that there was no car ahead for him to pass; that he did not attempt to pass any other car in that tunnel; that he did not have skid chains on his car. As to the use of headlights, the driver testified

> "I may have put my lights on; I usually do; I would say I did; I have good headlights. It might have been the length of this courtroom from me when I first saw the Ford. (The courtroom then in use was 55 feet in length.) I don't believe I would be able to state how fast I was going at that time. I didn't see a line of cars in front of me going down the road. I might have had my brakes on these three car lengths, I think I testified, in skidding endwise.

I saw it was impossible to avoid hitting the Ford in front of me. Then I clamped my brakes on and put the car in second gear. That is when I skidded sidewise in the tunnel."

The foregoing excerpts and also summary which we have given of the case we think establishes that there was sufficient testimony to support the verdict and to warrant the jury in coming to the conclusion that the collision resulted from the negligent operation of the Lincoln sedan, and that, if the driver of the Lincoln sedan had not been propelling the same at a rate of speed which was dangerous under the conditions presented, and at a rate of speed which rendered it impossible for him to control the same, the collision would not have occurred.

Has a miscarriage of justice resulted by reason of any alleged erroneous instructions given by the court? Before considering this question, we may refer to two sections of the Civil Code. The complaint would apparently make applicable section 2096 thereof, which reads:

> "A carrier of persons, without reward, must use ordinary care and diligence for their safe carriage."

While the facts as disclosed by the testimony and as set forth by the appellant would make section 2100 of the Civil Code applicable, which reads:

> "A carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage," etc.

The testimony which we have set forth certainly justified the jury in coming to the conclusion that the driver of the Lincoln sedan did not use the utmost care and diligence in the management of the car or in controlling its speed when entering the tunnel on a down grade when the pavement was wet and slippery.

[2-4] The instruction complained of, after quoting a portion of the Motor Vehicle Act specifying on which side of the highway automobiles shall be driven, uses the following language:

> "In this case there is a conflict in the testimony as to whether the defendant was endeavoring to pass another automobile or not. Plaintiffs claim that he was. The defendant claims that he was not, but that an automobile suddenly was, some way or other, placed across the highway, and that it was unavoidable, and he necessarily had to turn out. It is for you to determine which, if either of those things is true."

There is no testimony to the effect that the defendant claimed that he "necessarily had to turn out." There is testimony to the effect that his car did turn out, and that it skidded to the left after application of the brakes. The driver of the Lincoln sedan did testify that a collision with the car in front of him was unavoidable unless he applied his brakes, and the testimony we think shows very clearly that the Lincoln sedan was turned out of the line of traffic. Whether it was turned out for the purpose of avoiding the collision with the car in front, or whether it was turned out as a result of the sudden application of the brakes thereon, is really immaterial to any conclusion that might be reached by the jury in this case. It is probable, and it is a reasonable inference from the testimony, that, after the driver of the Lincoln sedan discovered the imminent danger of a collision with the car in front of him, he did everything which he then and there knew to avoid such a collision. Whatever the cause, it was the skidding of the Lincoln sedan that resulted in the collision with the Chevrolet on the opposite side of the tunnel. Whether it was the turning of the Lincoln sedan out of the line of traffic moving northward, and turning back again, or the sudden application of the brakes that caused the car to skid, resulting in the collision, even though urged as important by appellant, does not appear to us to be a matter out of which prejudicial error might arise, in view of the fact that, had the car been driven at a sufficiently low rate of speed to enable the driver to control the same within the radius of his vision, assuming that the headlights were burning, no collision would have occurred. A wet pavement down grade in a tunnel certainly calls for the exercise of a degree of care that must be measured only by the circumstances and conditions presented, and not by any limited mileage per hour set forth in the Motor Vehicle Act, as being a lawful rate of speed under the conditions mentioned in subdivisions 4, 5, 6 and 7 of section 113 of said act. The first subdivision of said section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act only applies to this case.

A careful reading of all the instructions given by the trial court to the jury in this cause shows that the defendant was not only not prejudiced, but was given the advantage of two instructions which, under the circumstances, we think erroneous. Among other things, the trial court instructed the jury in the following language:

> "If you should find that, at the time and place of the accident, any automobile immediately preceding the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, suddenly slackened its speed or stopped, or attempted to stop, and in doing so skidded out of the line of traffic in the direction in which the automobile, in which plaintiff was riding, was being driven, and that thereafter the driver of the car in which plaintiff was riding, did all in his power to avoid a collision, then he was not guilty of negligence, and your verdict would have to be against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant."

This instruction is directly in line with the instruction condemned by the Supreme Court in the case of Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal.

309, 237 P. 1066, where the court instructed that, if the defendant did all in his power, after discovering the presence of the plaintiff, to avoid injuring him, he was not guilty of negligence. In the instruction just quoted, the court excludes from the jury all consideration of the fact as to the Lincoln sedan being driven into the tunnel at an excessive rate of speed under the conditions presented, and at such a rate of speed, under the conditions presented, that the driver thereof could not exercise reasonable control thereof or take the necessary precautions or do the necessary things to avoid coming into collision with other automobiles that might be using the tunnel at the same time. The fact that the driver of the Lincoln sedan may have done all that could have been done in attempting to stop his car, and to avoid a collision after discovering the car in front of him, by no means relieves the defendant from the charge of negligence. If the Lincoln sedan, at the time of the discovery of the Ford car in front of it, was traveling at an excessive rate of speed under the conditions presented, the fact that he did all he could to stop under conditions which his driving had rendered it impossible for him to stop, instead of relieving the defendant, subjects him to the charge of negligence, and justifies the conclusion of the jury that the negligence and the manner in which the Lincoln sedan was being driven proximately caused the injury of the plaintiff Nora Ellen Davis. Again the court instructed the jury that:

> "The mere happening of the accident in which plaintiff sustained injuries, if any, is not the slightest proof that the driver of the defendant's automobile was guilty of negligence."

The instruction, of which the foregoing is a part, is directly contrary to the holding in the cases cited in Brown v. Davis (Cal. App.) 257 P. 877. In the Davis Case it was held that, in an action for the death of an invited guest resulting from overturning of a car while in exclusive operation and control of the defendant, the presumption of defendant's negligence arose from such overturning, though only ordinary care needs to be exercised by the carrier of persons without reward under the Civil Code, section 2096. The court, in the Davis Case, cites a large number of cases showing that, where an accident occurs and a passenger is injured, which ordinarily would not occur if reasonable care were exercised, proof of the circumstances of the accident and the exclusive control of the car by the defendant raises the presumption of negligence, and that such a presumption is evidence in the case. In the case at bar, we think the circumstances disclosed by the testimony surrounding the accident amply warranted the inference of the negligent driving of the car being operated by the defendant. In Mansfield v. Pickwick Stages, 68 Cal. App. 507, 229 P. 890, in an opinion written by Justice Langdon, we find the following:

> "Proof of the derailment of a train, or of an automobile leaving the highway and going into a gulch, or other similar accident calls for an explanation by the defendant or a possible inference of negligence upon its part."

See, also, Morris v. Morris (Cal. App.) 258 P. 616.

In the instant case the defendant has had the benefit of two instructions which were more favorable than that to which he was entitled, against which there is offset the slightly erroneous instruction complained of and assigned as prejudicial herein. The two instructions cited as more favorable to the appellant than they should have been are not material herein only in so far as they are cited to show that the trial court was endeavoring to give the defendant a fair and impartial trial, and, as we have just shown, taken as a whole, the instructions were more favorable to the defendant than they should have been. Under such circumstances there is no ground for urging prejudicial error. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is a complete answer to the appellant's contentions.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied June 20, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

1. Negligence ⚷83—Plaintiff's negligence, resulting in inescapable danger, and defendant's knowledge and realization thereof and clear chance and failure to avoid injury are essential to invoke "last clear chance" doctrine.

Elements essential to invoke "last clear chance" doctrine are that plaintiff was negligent and present as result in dangerous situation, from which she could not escape by exercising ordinary care, and that defendant was aware of her danger, realized or ought to have realized her inability to escape therefrom, had clear chance to avoid injuring her by exercise of ordinary care, and failed to avoid accident by use of such care.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

2. Negligence ⚷83—Plaintiff need not show physical impossibility of escape to invoke last clear chance doctrine.

To invoke the doctrine of last clear chance, plaintiff need not show that her inability to escape from threatened injury was a physical impossibility.

3. Negligence 🔑83—Last clear chance doctrine applies where plaintiff is unaware of danger, but she must exercise ordinary care after becoming aware thereof.

The last clear chance doctrine applies where plaintiff is unable to escape danger because wholly unaware of it, but having become aware thereof she must thereafter exercise ordinary care for her protection.

4. Negligence 🔑83—Test of last clear opportunity to avoid accident is whether defendant only retains power to prevent accident.

The test of last clear opportunity to avoid accident is whether, when both plaintiff and defendant have been guilty of negligence causing accident, plaintiff has ceased to have any power to prevent it and defendant still retains power to prevent it by exercise of ordinary care.

5. Street railroads 🔑114(19)—Evidence in action for damages from collision between automobile and street car held to justify application of last clear chance doctrine.

In action for damages to automobile and injury to occupant in collision with street car, evidence that motorman negligently operated car in excess of ordinance speed, that automobile driver negligently failed to pull in toward curb and stop between parked automobiles to allow car to pass, but drove into dangerous pocket from which he could not extricate himself by exercising ordinary care, and that motorman saw automobile constantly from moment it entered street until impact occurred and also observed parked automobiles which prevented it from turning off track just before collision, held to justify application of last clear chance doctrine.

6. Negligence 🔑83—One seeing another in dangerous position is not excused by dullness from realizing danger.

A person who sees another in a dangerous position may not rely on dullness to excuse him from realizing danger and must use reasonable diligence in analyzing situation; knowledge of danger being imputed where circumstances are such as to convey to mind of reasonable man fact that another is in position of peril.

7. Street railroads 🔑114(19)—Evidence held to support finding that motorman exercising ordinary care, could have avoided collision by applying brakes immediately after becoming aware of automobile's perilous position.

In action for damages to automobile and injuries to occupant in collision with street car, evidence held sufficient to support jury's conclusion that motorman could have avoided accident in exercise of ordinary care by applying brakes immediately after becoming aware of automobile's perilous position abreast of parked automobile, but negligently failed to do so.

8. Street railroads 🔑117(35)—Whether motorman negligently failed to avail himself of last clear chance to avoid collision with approaching automobile held for jury.

Whether street car motorman, after becoming aware of approaching automobile's dangerous situation abreast of parked automobile, negligently failed to avail himself of last clear chance to avoid collision by applying brakes immediately held a question of fact for the jury.

9. Street railroads 🔑103(3)—"Concurrent negligence" rule held inapplicable, where driver of automobile struck by street car used every reasonable effort to escape from dangerous pocket, into which he negligently drove.

Street railway company held not relieved from liability for damages to automobile and injuries to occupant under rule of "concurrent negligence," where driver of automobile used every reasonable effort to escape from dangerous pocket abreast of parked automobile immediately after negligently driving into it; such rule applying where injured party's negligence continues contemporaneously and actively with that of other party up to very moment of injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Concurrent Negligence.]

10. Negligence 🔑83—Last clear chance doctrine applies only where defendant actually saw plaintiff in position of imminent peril.

Before the doctrine of last clear chance may be applied, it must appear that defendant actually saw plaintiff in a position of imminent peril, and it is not enough that he could have seen him in such position, but for remissness on defendant's part.

11. Trial 🔑296(4, 5)—Instruction using words "could have seen" in dealing with motorman's knowledge of automobile's dangerous situation held not prejudicial error, in view of his admissions and other instructions.

In action for damages to automobile and injury to occupant thereof in collision with street car, last clear chance instruction, using words "could have seen" in dealing with element of motorman's knowledge of automobile's dangerous situation, held not prejudicial to defendant, where motorman admitted actually seeing automobile on track and driver endeavoring to extricate himself from dangerous position, and element emphasized by objection to instruction was substantially covered by instructions given at defendant's request.

12. Trial 🔑296(4, 5)—Instructions that automobile driver's negligence could not be imputed to passenger held not erroneous, if omitting reference to latter's contributory negligence, in view of other instructions.

In action for damages to automobile and injuries to occupant thereof in collision with street car, instructions that automobile driver's negligence could not be imputed to such occupant, if she was a passenger and had no control over driver, held not erroneous, if omitting any reference to her contributory negligence, in view of other instructions, proposed by defendant, supplying such element, and court's instructions fully covering all phases of law of negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Actions, tried together, by Lillian M. Nicolai and Wilhelmina Nicolai, respectively, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. As a result of a collision between a street car owned and operated by appellant and a coupé automobile belonging to Miss Wilhelmina Nicolai and driven by one Cropper, in which her mother, Mrs. Lillian M. Nicolai, was riding, the latter was injured and the automobile was damaged; and separate actions were brought for the recovery of damages, one by Mrs. Nicolai on account of the personal injuries she sustained, and the other by Miss Nicolai for the damages to her automobile. The complaint in each action charged that the collision was caused wholly by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, its agents and servants, in the operation of its street car. The actions were tried together before a jury, and Mrs. Nicolai was awarded a verdict for $2,500 as compensation for her injuries, and Miss Nicolai was awarded $420.75 for the damages to her automobile. From the judgments entered on these verdicts the defendant has appealed. Besides charging the jury upon the subjects of negligence and contributory negligence, the trial court instructed upon the doctrine of the last clear chance, and appellant seeks a reversal of the judgments mainly upon the grounds that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdicts and that the instructions given upon the doctrine of the last clear chance do not correctly state the law upon that subject.

The accident happened on West Fifth street, San Pedro, about 7 o'clock in the evening, midway in the block between Pacific avenue on the east and Grand avenue on the west. West Fifth street extends east and west. It is 40 feet wide between curbs and 600 feet long between the intersecting avenues above mentioned. Along the northerly side thereof appellant maintains a single track over which its east-bound cars are operated against the west-bound vehicular traffic properly using that side of the street; and the northerly rail of said track is laid only 11 feet 8 inches from the northerly curb, so that there is not enough space for automobiles traveling westerly on that side of the street to pass between automobiles parked along the northerly curb and the street car. At the time of the accident there was one automobile parked along the northerly curb in front of a laundry about 160 feet westerly from Pacific avenue, and two others were parked a little farther along on the same side, in front of a dyeing and cleaning establishment. Opposite the westerly line of said establishment there is a telephone pole which stands embedded in the curb, approximately in the middle of the block, 290 feet from Pacific avenue. The street car and the coupé entered the block at about the same time from opposite directions, and the impact occurred nearly opposite the telephone pole.

The circumstances showing the manner in which the collision occurred were established mainly by the testimony of Mrs. Nicolai, the motorman, and a man named Quinn, who was following in an automobile next behind the Nicolai coupé at a distance of 50 or 60 feet, in a position to observe what happened. Cropper was not a witness, being out of the state at the time of the trial, and his testimony was not taken by either side. The testimony of the witnesses mentioned was to the effect that the coupé, after having entered West Fifth street from Pacific avenue, traveled along the right half of the street until it was in front of the laundry. It then turned onto the street car track in order to pass the automobile parked at that point, and continued to travel toward Grand avenue until it reached a point opposite the automobiles parked in front of the dyeing establishment. Whether it pulled off the track to the right between the automobile parked in front of the laundry and those parked in front of the dyeing establishment is disputed; but it would seem to be immaterial, so far as the application of the doctrine of the last clear chance is concerned, whether it did or did not, because up to the time it reached a point opposite the automobiles parked in front of the dyeing establishment its position was not dangerous, the driver of the coupé having had ample opportunity to turn off the track and stop anywhere between the laundry and the dyeing establishment. When it came abreast the automobiles parked in front of the latter establishment, however, it was clearly in imminent peril of being struck by the street car, because it was directly in front of the on-coming car, which was approaching at a rate of speed between 30 and 35 miles an hour, according to respondents' witnesses, and the driver of the coupé was unable to turn off to the right on account of the two automobiles parked at that point. He therefore tried to extricate himself from his dangerous position by suddenly turning to the left as if intending to pass the street car on the left or southerly side, but instantly discovered that the street car was being paralleled on that side by an automobile traveling at the same rate of speed. He then diverted his course quickly to the right, endeavoring by this final effort to reach the curb by passing between the on-coming street car and the last parked automobile in front of the dyeing establishment, but before the rear end of the coupé cleared the track it was struck by the street car, thrown against the telephone pole, and crushed. The evidence further shows that Cropper evidently saw the street car as it approached some distance beyond the point of the collision because it was lighted, its bell was clanging, and it was observed by both Mrs. Nicolai and Quinn; and the motorman admits that he saw the coupé when it entered West Fifth street, that its maximum speed did not exceed 20 miles an hour, and that he watched it constantly as it came toward him until the collision occurred.

[1-4] "The elements of the doctrine of last clear chance, which must be present in any given case in order to warrant the invocation of that doctrine," says the Supreme Court in the case of Darling v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703, "are these: (1) That the plaintiff has been negligent. (2) That as a result thereof she was present in a situation of danger from which she could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care. (3) That the defendant was aware of her dangerous situation and realized, or ought to have realized, her inability to escape therefrom. (4) That the defendant then had a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care. (5) That the defendant failed to avoid the accident by the use of ordinary care. It is not required of the plaintiff to show that her inability to escape from the threatened danger was a physical impossibility. The doctrine applies equally if she be wholly unaware of her danger and for that reason unable to escape it. Whenever she becomes aware of the danger, however, she must thereafter exercise ordinary care for her protection [citing cases]. The test of the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident is whether, when both plaintiff and defendant have been guilty of negligence causing the accident, the plaintiff has ceased to have any power to prevent it and the defendant still retains the power of preventing it by the exercise of ordinary care."

[5] Measuring the evidence of the present case by the foregoing rules of law, it is sufficient in our opinion to justify the application of the doctrine above mentioned. It tended to show at the outset that Cropper and the motorman were both guilty of negligence. The latter was negligent in operating the street car in excess of 20 miles an hour in violation of the law of the municipality, and Cropper was doubtless negligent in not pulling in toward the curb and stopping somewhere between the automobile parked in front of the laundry and those parked in front of the dyeing establishment, so as to allow the street car to pass, instead of attempting in the face of the fast approaching car to travel beyond the automobiles parked in front of the dyeing establishment before the street car reached that point; and manifestly by thus maneuvering the coupé Cropper negligently drove into a dangerous pocket from which he was unable to extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care, although, as shown, he made every effort to do so. When the coupé was driven abreast of the first automobile parked in front of the dyeing establishment, the motorman was evidently aware of the dangerous situation and realized or ought to have realized Cropper's inability to escape therefrom, because he admits having seen the coupé constantly from the moment it entered West Fifth street until the impact occurred, during which time he sounded the bell continuously as a warning. He also observed the automobiles parked along the northerly curb in front of the dyeing establishment which obviously prevented the coupé from turning off the track in that direction, and he saw Cropper attempt to turn first to the left and then to the right in his efforts to avoid being struck by the car.

[6] As held in a number of cases, where a person sees another in a position which is in fact dangerous, he may not rely upon dullness to excuse him from not realizing the danger of the position (Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 P. 359); and if he sees the dangerous situation he must use reasonable diligence in analyzing the same (Starck v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 277, 156 P. 51, L. R. A. 1916E, 58), knowledge of danger being imputed where the circumstances are such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man that the plaintiff is in a position of peril (Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 P. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85).

[7] The remaining question, then, to be considered on this branch of the case, is whether or not there is any evidence in the record supporting or tending to support the conclusion reached by the jury that the motorman, after becoming aware of the danger, could have avoided the accident by the exercise of ordinary care, but negligently failed to do so. We think there is. In this connection the testimony discloses that when the coupé was driven into its perilous position abreast the automobile parked in front of the dyeing establishment, at which time the motorman became aware of the danger, the street car was still 35 or 40 feet distant from the coupé, and although there is no evidence to prove that it was possible to bring the street car to a complete standstill within 50 feet, even if traveling, as the motorman claims, at a speed of only 18 miles an hour, it is reasonable to believe from all the circumstances present that if immediately upon becoming aware of the danger the motorman had applied the brakes, which were in perfect working order, and reversed the power, he could have retarded the speed of the street car sufficiently to have allowed the coupé to reach its objective and turn off the track to the right in safety between the street car and the automobile parked in front of the dyeing establishment, because the front left corner of the street car barely caught the left rear end of the coupé as the coupé was clearing the track. The motorman claims that he did apply the brakes and reverse the power instantly upon observing the coupé coming abreast of the automobile parked in front of the dyeing establishment, but evidence was adduced from which the rational conclusion may be drawn that such was not the case, and that he waited until just a fraction of a second prior to the impact before taking any measures whatever to stop the car or lessen the speed, which, of course, was then too late to be of any effect. In this regard two of the passengers on the street car testified that the collision followed instantly after the brakes were applied; and it was also shown that even after the car came to a standstill, 135 or 140 feet beyond the point where the motorman claimed he applied the brakes and reversed the power, it started a retrograde movement, which fairly indicated that the brakes had not been properly set. Furthermore, the testimony of the motorman was to the effect that, even though the street car were traveling 30 miles an hour, it could be brought to a complete stop within 90 feet by the proper application of the brakes; consequently, if, as he says, he did apply the brakes and reverse the power when he first saw the coupé come abreast of the automobile parked in front of the dyeing establishment, the street car doubtless would have stopped within approximately 90 feet, even assuming it to have been traveling at the maximum speed of 30 miles an hour, as testified to by respondents' witnesses; whereas the fact is, as stated, that it ran on for a distance of approximately 140 feet before it came to a standstill.

[8] In any event, the situation revealed by the evidence adduced on the entire case presented a question of fact for the jury to determine; that it, whether the motorman, after becoming aware of the danger, negligently failed to avail himself of the last clear chance to avoid the accident; and the jury having by its verdicts declared that he was thus negligent, it is our conclusion that there is substantial evidence to sustain its verdicts.

[9] The situation presented is not one which may be disposed of under the rule of concurrent negligence, where the negligence of the injured party continues contemporaneously and actively with that of the other party to the accident, up to the very moment of the injury (Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 746, 210 P. 259), because the evidence shows beyond question that immediately after Cropper drove into the dangerous pocket he used every reasonable effort to escape therefrom.

[10, 11] In dealing with the element of the motorman's knowledge of the dangerous situation, one of the instructions given uses the language: "Could have seen or did see the driver of the automobile upon the railway track, or crossing the same in a dangerous position," etc. (italics ours); and appellant assigns the use of the italicized words as error. As held in the cases cited by appellant, before the doctrine of the last clear chance may be given application it must appear that the defendant actually did see the plaintiff in a position of imminent peril, and it is not enough that he could have seen the plaintiff in such position but for remissness on his part. Here, however, the motorman admitted that he actually saw the coupé on the track and that he also saw the driver thereof endeavoring to extricate himself from his dangerous position, the motorman's testimony being in part as follows:

> "When I first saw it, they came and turned west on Pacific avenue into Fifth, and I saw it all the time after that as it came towards me and I went towards it. When I first saw it, it came about 150 feet with the left wheel about 6 inches over the south rail. I saw it attempt to to turn to the left and then attempt to turn to the right."

And, as already pointed out, the situation was such that he ought to have realized the driver's inability to escape therefrom. Moreover, the particular element of the doctrine of the last clear chance which appellant emphasizes by his objection to the instruction was substantially covered in two instructions given at the request of appellant, designated in the record as "D-31" and "D-44"; which, in part, read as follows:

> "* * * If such person's inability to get off the track is not known to the motorman until he is so close that he cannot stop before striking such person, the motorman is not guilty of any negligence, and in such case there can be no recovery against the railway."

And:

> "* * * It it not the motorman's duty in such a situation to slow down or stop his car merely because he sees an automobile some distance away approaching the car nor until he sees or in the exercise of ordinary care, should conclude that it would go upon the track or fail to drive off the track. If he then uses ordinary care to avoid the accident, that is all that is required of him." (Italics ours.)

For the reasons stated, it would seem that the instruction of which appellant complains could not have operated to appellant's prejudice.

Instructions "P-10" and "P-17," to which appellant also objects, do not relate to the doctrine of the last clear chance, but pertain to the issue of ordinary negligence. The latter instruction which appellant particularly stresses in effect stated that the rules announced therein were to be given effect, "provided, of course, that contributory negligence is not also established as defined in these instructions." Furthermore, part of the premise appears to have been inadvertently omitted from this instruction, which so impaired its meaning that it cannot be said that the jury was misled by it.

[12] By virtue of respondents' instructions "P-40" and "P-41" the jury was charged that if it believed that Mrs. Nicolai was a passenger and had no control over the driver of the coupé, then the negligence of the driver, if any, could not be imputed to her. Appellant contends that said instructions omitted any reference to contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Nicolai, and that, therefore, they are erroneous. If such construction can be placed upon the instructions referred to, the omitted element was supplied in others proposed by appellant, notably instruction "D-42." Moreover, the charge of the court consisted of 49 separate instructions, covering some 27 pages of the printed transcript, most of which related to the subject of negligence, and 35 of them were proposed by and given at the request of appellant without modification. It would seem, therefore, that the jury was fully instructed on all phases of the law of negligence.

Each judgment is affirmed.

UNITED DREDGING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 6241.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 22, 1928.

1. Admiralty 🔑21—Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction in proceeding for compensation for death of deck hand on dredger operating in navigable waters.

Industrial Accident Commission held to have jurisdiction in proceeding for death of helper and deck hand employed on dredger operating in navigable waters as a result of drowning while engaged in duty of transporting employees back and forth from dredger to shore; such labor being not so directly connected with navigation and commerce that to permit rights of parties to be controlled by local law would interfere with essential uniformity of general maritime law.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Evidence as to exact manner in which deceased met death held to sustain award.

Evidence in proceeding before Industrial Accident Commission for compensation for death of deck hand and all-round man on dredger relative to exact manner in which deceased met his death held sufficient to sustain award as not based on speculation.

3. Master and servant 🔑405(1)—Award of compensation may be based on circumstantial evidence.

An award of compensation may be based on circumstantial evidence, probabilities established by evidence supporting inferences in favor of employee, and inferences may support award.

4. Master and servant 🔑417(9)—Provision for interest being separable from award of compensation, proceedings need not be remanded on annulling order as to interest.

Clause of order by Industrial Accident Commission granting interest on award being separable from award of compensation, it is unnecessary on annulling order providing for interest to remand proceedings for further action by commission.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Original application for certiorari by the United Dredging Company and another to review an order of Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Ollie Kopke as surviving widow of Joseph Kopke, deceased employee. Award affirmed in part, and in part annulled.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. In a proceeding filed with such commission against United Dredging Company and its insurance carrier, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Ollie Kopke alleged that she was the surviving widow of Joseph Kopke, an employee of petitioner dredging company, and that her husband, while employed by such company as an electrician's helper, fell off a barge upon which he was working and was drowned. Petitioners herein appeared by answer, and denied the jurisdiction of the commission, alleging in effect that at the time of his death deceased was a member of the crew of a vessel afloat in navigable waters, and that the case was one under admiralty jurisdiction. They further denied that the death arose out of and in the course of the employment. Hearing was had, and it appeared in evidence that the deceased, who was 22 or 23 years of age, was employed as an electrical helper, deck hand, and all-round man on a dredger operated by United Dredging Company, which was dredging in the navigable waters of San Francisco Bay, and particularly in that part known as Richmond Inner Harbor. The dredger was operating in water varying in depth from 21 to 31 feet and was proximately 700 feet from the shore. The dredger was anchored, and was used to suck up the bed of the bay and pump it on the adjacent land. From one corner of the dredger, in the direction of the shore, there ran a line of pontoons, on which lay a pipe through which the dredgings were pumped. On the day the employee met his death he had gone to work about 8 o'clock in the morning, and he was due to quit about 4:30 p. m. Part of the duties of the deceased were to take the men employed on the barge back and forth from the dredger to the shore. The skiff used by the deceased for this purpose was tied on the side of the first pontoon. In order to reach the skiff from the dredger, it was necessary to walk a distance of about 12 feet along a 14-inch plank, which was fastened to the dredging pipe running from the dredger to the first pontoon. On the day in question, Kopke was directed by one Sundeen, his immediate superior, to prepare the boat to take him and another employee to shore. Sundeen remained in the engine room changing some of his clothes, and, when he arrived upon deck, he discovered Kopke missing. The last seen of him alive was when he was leaving the engine room going outside to the outer part of the dredger. At that time he was walking toward the skiff. Investigation was made, and a cap was noticed floating on the water. Further search resulted in the finding of the body about midnight. It was in evidence that death was caused from drowning. On the 28th day of September, 1927, the commission made and entered its findings and award, wherein it granted to respondent Ollie Kopke a full benefit of $4,596 against petitioners herein, and specially found that the accident occurred as follows:

> "While proceeding to get ready a skiff which, under order of a superior, he was to row ashore from the dredger upon which he was employed, he accidentally fell overboard into deep water and was drowned."

[1-4] Thereafter petitioners asked for a rehearing, in which it was particularly set forth that the facts showed without contradiction that the case was one within the jurisdiction of admiralty; that the deceased was a member of a crew of the vessel, and therefore subject to that jurisdiction, and not to the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission. This petition was denied, and the present proceeding followed. The same contention is here made as was made before the commission. We are of the opinion that the question of jurisdiction in cases of this character has been definitely settled by recent decisions of our Supreme Court. The labor which deceased was performing at the time he met his death was not so directly connected with navigation and commerce that to permit the rights of the parties to be controlled by the local law would interfere with the essential uniformity of the general maritime law, as it was local in character. Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. I. A. C., 200 Cal. 579, 253 P. 926; Id., 48 S. Ct. 346, 72 L. Ed. —; Oakland v. I. A. C., 198 Cal. 273, 244 P. 353; London Guarantee & Acc. Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 825. Nor is there any merit in the further claim that the award is based on speculation; there being no evidence to show the exact manner in which deceased met his death, or that anything arising out of the employment proximately caused it. An award may be based upon circumstantial evidence. Probabilities established by the evidence support inferences in favor of the employee, and inferences may support the award. The commission was therefore entitled to draw the inference from the facts proved that deceased accidentally fell overboard and met his death from drowning. And, finally, petitioners claim that the award is illegal because of the fact that it carries interest charges. No objection was made to the award in this particular upon rehearing; the point being raised for the first time in this proceeding. However, as the interest clause is separable from the award of compensation, it is unnecessary to remand the proceedings for further action by the commission. Pacific Indemnity Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 987.

The award of compensation is affirmed. The order providing for interest is annulled.

OLIVER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

(Civ. 6009.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 21, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑878(3)—Acquittal of crimes charged in other counts as overt acts of conspiracy held acquittal of conspiracy (Pen. Code, § 1104).

Where overt acts of criminal conspiracy, charged in one count of indictment, consisted of specific crimes of larceny and embezzlement charged in numerous other counts, and jury acquitted defendants on all counts charging larceny and embezzlement, held, that result was acquittal of offense of conspiracy, since under Pen. Code, § 1104, one of overt acts charged must be proved to permit conviction of conspiracy.

2. Prohibition 🔑10(3)—Acquittal of overt acts constituting acquittal of conspiracy presents proper case for prohibition against further trial on conspiracy charge.

Where court is without jurisdiction to try defendants on charge of conspiracy by reason of acquittal of crimes constituting overt acts of conspiracy, a proper case to afford remedy of prohibition is presented.

Application for writ of prohibition by Fred Oliver and others, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. Writ granted.

Thomas H. Hearn, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The prosecution from the disposition of which this proceeding originated was one by indictment against the petitioners, Lawrence J. Daw and Thomas Williams. This indictment contained 34 counts accusing the defendants therein of grand larceny, embezzlement, and conspiracy. In counts Nos. 1 to 33, inclusive, 11 different unlawful acts are charged, each in a set of 3 counts. In each set the first charge is grand larceny of a certain sum of money; the second, grand larceny of certain property of the same value as that charged in the first of each set; and, in the third, embezzlement of both money and property.

Count 34 charges conspiracy to obtain the money and property exceeding in value $200, alleged to have been the subject of the offenses set forth in the preceding counts. It is also averred to be "a different statement of the same offense and of the same class of crimes and offenses as those set forth in counts 1 to 33 inclusive thereof." Also it is alleged that in furtherance of the conspiracy the defendants committed certain overt acts which are delineated as the same offenses whose commission is charged in the first 33 counts of the indictment.

The defendants were tried, and the jury acquitted petitioners of the crimes charged in counts 1 to 33, inclusive, and failed to agree concerning count 34. Defendants Daw and Williams were convicted of the 11 counts of embezzlement and conspiracy and acquitted of the grand larceny charges. The petitioners further assert that the superior court has set the cause alleged in count 34 for trial, and they insist that this court should prohibit further prosecution thereof because had they been found guilty of the overt acts charged in the conspiracy count they would necessarily have been guilty of the grand larceny and embezzlement counts to which these overt acts respectively pertain, but that the jury having acquitted them as well of all charges of grand larceny and embezzlement, have thereby necessarily acquitted them as well of the conspiracy charge in count 34, and it is said that upon this theory petitioners have heretofore been in jeopardy for the crime of conspiracy, and that the subject-matter of count 34 is now res adjudicata.

The argument is that since Daw and Williams were found guilty of the embezzlement charges and the petitioners were acquitted of the same, the effect of these verdicts of the jury was to decide that the petitioners did nothing in furtherance of the commission of the crimes by way of counseling, advising, procuring, aiding, or abetting; hence that their acquittal of the charges was an acquittal of the commission of any overt act in furtherance of the same, and if no overt act was committed, of course there could be no criminal conspiracy.

[1] It is important to note the fact conceded by respondent, that the only overt acts alleged in count 34 are the specific crimes charged in the other counts; the sole overt acts averred were "larceny and embezzlement." The situation is clearly different from that which would have been presented had the conspiracy charge contained allegations of a number of overt acts which, taken together, would constitute grand larceny or embezzlement. Had the indictment been so drafted, it could not be said that an acquittal of grand larceny or embezzlement would necessarily have been a determination that no criminal conspiracy pertaining to the same transactions had occurred. But here the conclusion cannot be escaped that since each crime, considered and described collectively as a single entity, is alleged to be an overt act, and as the jury fully acquitted these petitioners of each overt act thus alleged, the portion of the count charging conspiracy remaining unadjudicated is insufficient to constitute criminal conspiracy. Moreover, considering the record here presented, by finding that none of the overt acts charged as parts of the conspiracy were committed, the jury, in effect, acquitted the petitioners of the offense of conspiracy. This must be so, since one of the overt acts charged must be proved to permit of conviction of conspiracy under section 1104 of the Penal Code.

[2] We are satisfied that under these circumstances the trial court is without jurisdiction to retry the defendants who are petitioners herein, as it is alleged that it is about to do. A proper case is thus presented to afford the remedy of prohibition. Huntington v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 288, 90 P. 141.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed, prohibiting the superior court from proceeding further with the trial of the cause.

COMMERCIAL SECURITIES CORPORATIONS CONSOL. v. LINDSAY MERCANTILE CO. (Civ. 5472.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 21, 1928.

Chattel mortgages ⚷6, 196—Transaction in form of sale and conditional sale of automobile held chattel mortgage, void as to owner's judgment creditor where not recorded (Civ. Code, § 2957).

In action for claim and delivery of automobile, evidence held to sustain court's finding that instrument, under which plaintiff claimed title to automobile, was chattel mortgage, in that possession of automobile was not delivered by owner at time he borrowed money and indorsed certificate of legal ownership, and conditional sale contract was executed purporting to sell car back to owner; and, no attempt having been made to comply with Civ. Code, § 2957, the mortgage was void as to judgment creditor of owner purchasing automobile at sale under execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action for claim and delivery of automobile by the Commercial Securities Corporation Consolidated against the Lindsay Mercantile Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for appellant.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff commenced this action to recover possession of an automobile, and prosecutes this appeal from a judgment in defendant's favor. One J. R. Hobbs was the owner of the automobile and applied to one E. Allen Abbott for a loan thereon. Hobbs indorsed his certificate of legal ownership in favor of Abbott, who, in turn, executed a conditional sale contract whereby he purported to sell the car back to Hobbs. The conditional sale contract contained the provisions in regard to title remaining in the seller and to defaults on the part of the buyer which are customary in instruments of this kind. The car was then registered in the office of the motor vehicle department in the name of Abbott as legal owner and Hobbs as registered owner. Thereafter, on January 1, 1926, Hobbs desired to borrow an additional sum and surrendered the conditional sale contract to Abbott, who loaned him the sum wanted and executed and delivered to him a new conditional sale contract, the legal title continuing to be registered in the name of Abbott. The conditional sale contract last mentioned and the certificate of legal ownership were then assigned by Abbott to the plaintiff, and on January 13, 1926, a new certificate of legal ownership was issued by the motor vehicle department to plaintiff. Early in January, 1926, and before default by Hobbs on the conditional sale contract, defendant obtained a writ of execution in an action in which defendant herein was plaintiff and J. R. Hobbs defendant, and in which judgment against Hobbs had been taken by default. The automobile in question was levied upon and bought at a constable's sale by the defendant. At the time of the sale plaintiff made a third-party claim to the car and gave notice thereof to all concerned. After default by Hobbs on the conditional sale contract, plaintiff demanded possession of the car from the defendant. Upon defendant's refusal to turn over the car to plaintiff this action was commenced.

Plaintiff now contends that its right to possession of the car is established by the registration of the legal ownership in its name and the conditional sale contract. We are of the opinion that the rights of plaintiff in the transaction were only those of a mortgagee. The case of Bonestell v. Western Auto-Motive Finance Corp., 69 Cal. App. 719, 232 P. 734, seems to be decisive of the question involved herein. In that case one Chrisman applied to the defendant for a loan, offering to secure the repayment of the loan by creating a lien upon an automobile. He gave a bill of sale covering the automobile to defendant, who thereupon executed and delivered to him a conditional sale contract similar in its provisions to the contract in the case now before us. Chrisman defaulted in his payments, and defendant took possession of the car. Chrisman then assigned his rights to the property to plaintiff, who recovered judgment for the possession of the car. In affirming the judgment the court said:

> "The whole transaction, though couched in the form of a bill of sale from Chrisman to the appellant and a conditional agreement of sale from the appellant to Chrisman, was simply a device to secure the repayment of the sum of $750 loaned by the appellant to the said Chrisman. There was no transfer of possession of the touring car from Chrisman to the appellant at the time of the execution of the bill of sale executed and delivered by him, nor was there any retransfer of possession at the time of the execution of the conditional agreement of sale by the corporation to Chrisman. * * * We think the transaction, which we have outlined in brief, comes within the provision of section 2924 of the Civil Code, to wit: 'Every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage, except when in the case of personal property it is accompanied by actual change of possession in which case it is to be deemed a pledge.' The property thereafter was impressed only with a lien, the legal title to the car remained in Chrisman, and the defendant was not entitled to possession unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage. (Civ. Code, § 2927.)"

The court cited as authority the case of Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674.

The facts in the case at bar are very similar to those established in the case from which we have just quoted. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain the implied finding of the trial court that possession of the car was not delivered to Abbott at the time Hobbs borrowed money thereon. The court found that the instrument under which plaintiff claims title to the automobile is a chattel mortgage, and this finding is sustained by the evidence. Section 2957 of the Civil Code provides:

> "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value unless: 1. It is accompanied by the affidavit of all the parties thereto that it is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; 2. It is acknowledged or proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property."

The record discloses that no attempt was made to comply with the provisions of this section.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF PASADENA v. McALLASTER, City Atty. (S. F. 12726.)

Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑865(2)—Municipality's obligation to pay assessment on municipally owned property for improvement constituted "indebtedness" within constitutional limitation (Acquisition and Improvement Act 1925, § 41; Const. art. 11, § 18).

Obligation of city for payment of assessments against municipally owned property pursuant to Acquisition and Improvement Act 1925 (St. 1925, p. 849), being made under section 41 an enforceable obligation against governing body controlling said land, constituted an "indebtedness" or liability within Const. art. 11, § 18, forbidding indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year income and revenue provided without assent of two-thirds of qualified electors.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Indebted—Indebtedness.]

2. Municipal corporations 🔑865(2)—Municipality's obligation to pay improvement assessment against municipally owned property held not "obligation imposed by law" within exception to debt limitation of Constitution (Acquisition and Improvement Act 1925, § 41; Const. art. 11, § 18).

Obligation of municipality to pay assessment for improvement against municipally owned property pursuant to Acquisition and Improvement Act 1925 (St. 1925, p. 849), which obligation under section 41 thereof is made an enforceable obligation against governing body controlling such land, held not to constitute an obligation imposed by law within Const. art. 11, § 18, limiting indebtedness of municipality within general rule allowing exception in case of obligations imposed by operation of law.

In Bank.

Original application by the City of Pasadena for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to R. C. McAllaster, as City Attorney at Pasadena, to require him to institute condemnation proceedings for street improvement purposes. Writ denied.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, James L. Beebe, and Pierce Works, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

R. C. McAllaster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Everett W. Mattoon, Gordon Boller, and H. Woodworth Kennedy, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SHENK, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as city attorney of the city of Pasadena, to institute condemnation proceedings pursuant to an order of April 28, 1927, of the board of directors of the petitioner, city of Pasadena, for the acquisition of property necessary to widen, improve, and extend Holly street between Marengo avenue and Grand avenue, and to widen Grand avenue between Holly street and Colorado street in said city.

As a return to the alternative writ the respondent filed a general demurrer to the petition and also an answer setting forth certain facts which are admitted by the petitioner to be true. The matter is therefore submitted on the undisputed averments of fact set forth in the petition and in the answer. From these averments it appears that on March 15, 1927, pursuant to the provisions of the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 849), the board of directors of the city of Pasadena duly adopted a resolution of intention to order the acquisition of land necessary for the improvement mentioned. It also appears that all of the steps required by the act were duly and regularly taken. It is unnecessary to recite them in detail. The order of April 28, 1927, adopted and established the boundaries of the assessment district, designated as acquisition and improvement district No. 2 of the city of Pasadena, which comprises the property to be benefited by the proposed improvement. The area to be benefited was divided into eight zones, designated as A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H. The order also provided that the expense of the acquisition should be defrayed by the sale of bonds, to be issued in the total amount of such expense; the bonds to bear interest at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and to mature serially within 30 years, approximately 1/25 part of the aggregate principal to be payable annually, begining 5 years after the issuance of the bonds. Payment is to be provided for "by the levy of special assessment taxes upon the lands within the assessment district according to the assessed value of said lands (exclusive of improvements thereon), and in accordance with the zones and percentages," as set forth in the order. A large amount of municipally owned property is situate in this proposed assessment district and is included with zone H thereof. The percentage of the total bond issue allotted to zone H, if the proceedings are completed, is 20.68. The estimated total cost of the acquisition is $1,150,000, making the share of zone H approximately $230,000. No declaration was made in the resolution of intention to omit any of the municipally owned or controlled property from the assessment district, and it is conceded that such publicly owned property, by the terms of the Acquisition and Improvement Act, will be subject to the special assessment tax to the extent of its share of the expense of acquisition. By the provisions of the act the amount of the special assessment tax levied each year against the municipally owned land in zone

H is made "an enforceable obligation against the owner of or the governing body controlling said land, and it shall be the duty of the officer or body having charge of the disbursement of the funds of the owner of said land to pay the amount of said special assessment tax levied from any of the funds thereof available immediately upon its becoming due."

The charter of the city of Pasadena (subdivision 15, § 3, art. 1; section 12, art. 12) limits the tax rate to be levied each year for the purpose of raising sufficient revenue to carry on the various departments of the municipal government for the current fiscal year, exclusive of bonded indebtedness, etc., to $1 for each $100 of the assessed valuation of real and personal property. By subdivision 17 of section 3 of article 1 of said charter, the city is given power to levy taxes exceeding the limit permitted, provided the levy is first approved by two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city voting at a special election called for that purpose by the city council, and by section 21 of article 12 of the charter, if the council shall determine that the public interest requires the construction of any public improvement the cost of which, in addition to the other expenditures of the city, will exceed the income and revenue provided for in any one year, it may, by ordiance, submit a proposition to incur a debt for such purpose, and proceed therein as provided in section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state of California. No proceedings have been had, and it is contemplated that none will be taken, in accordance with these provisions of the city charter or of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution with respect to the proposed indebtedness.

It is admitted by the pleadings that if the city incurs any liability by reason of these acquisition proceedings, the amount of the obligation will exceed the income and revenue of the city in the year in which it is incurred. Petitioner argues that this is not an indebtedness of the city contracted by the city, but is a charge on the land benefited, the obligation of the payment thereof being imposed on the city by law; that payment of the bonds is provided for exclusively out of a special fund derived from the collection of assessments within the district, and therefore not a general obligation against the city; that the levy of an assessment does not create an indebtedness at all, an assessment not being contemplated to be an indebtedness within the meaning of the Constitution.

[1] On the other hand, the respondent insists that the assessment to pay the contemplated bond issue will create an indebtedness or liability of the city in violation of the section of the charter referred to and of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. Section 5 of article 9 of the city charter incorporates in the charter by reference the said Acquisition and Improvement Act. We therefore need be concerned only with the question of whether the issuance of the improvement bonds for the acquisition of said property and the city's obligation to provide money for the payment of the same would be in violation of the provisions of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. That section reads:

> "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor unless before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also provision to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof on or before maturity. * * * Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision, with the exceptions hereinbefore recited, shall be void."

It is conceded by the petitioner that if and when the contemplated bonds are issued they must be paid in part by the city of Pasadena presumably out of general tax money as provided in the act. It is also conceded that the total payments by the city to be made by the city of Pasadena from time to time during the life of the bonds into the bond retirement fund will be in excess of the revenue of any one year during the period from the inception of the acquisition proceeding up to the final retirement of the bonds, and this, coupled with the fact, also conceded, that no assent of the electors of the city is proposed to be obtained in connection with the matter, will result in a violation of the constitutional provision if the obligation of the city so assumed is prohibited by the Constitution.

A survey of the authorities on the subject clearly shows that in the application of the prohibitive language of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution to the situation here presented at least two conditions must concur: First, that an indebtedness or liability be incurred by the city of Pasadena in excess of the income and revenue provided for the year in which it is incurred; and, secondly, that such indebtedness be incurred voluntarily on the part of the officers of the city having an official duty to perform in the matter. If these two conditions be present, the result is not that the indebtedness or liability may not be incurred at all, but that the assent thereto of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city must be first obtained. The first question, therefore, is this: Does the obligation assumed by the city, under the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 and the proceedings in question, constitute an indebtedness or liability on the part of the city? The constitutional language is very broad. It is that no "indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose," etc., shall be incurred except as in the section permitted. Sections 26 to 36, inclusive, of the act prescribe the procedure for the accquisition of property and the sale of bonds to obtain the money to pay the amount fixed by the judgment in condemnation. Section 41 provides that there shall, each year, at the time of levying taxes for general municipal purposes, be levied against and upon all the lands within the district (including, as here, the lands belonging to the municipality), according to the assessed valuation of said lands, exclusive of improvements thereon, a special assessment tax in an amount clearly sufficient, together with any moneys which are or may be in the district fund, to pay all the principal and interest which has become or may become payable on the bonds before the proceeds of another tax levy for municipal purposes may become available. That section further provides that in the event that there be included within the assessment district any land belonging to the municipality, the amount of the special assessment tax levied each year against said land shall be an enforceable obligation against the governing body controlling said land, and it is made the duty of the governing body having charge of the disbursement of the funds of the owners of said land to pay the amount of said special assessment tax so levied from any funds available, immediately upon the assessment tax becoming due. It would be difficult to perceive a more direct obligation imposed on the city authorities to pay into the district bond fund the amount of the assessment chargeable against the city. It is conceded that the city's lands, although in form assessed for the improvement, may not legally be sold to satisfy the assessment in the manner provided for the sale of privately owned lands, or at all. The city's proportion of the acquisition cost must be paid into the district bond fund provided for by the act from the general funds of the city or from the proceeds of some general municipal tax levy. In any event, the taxpayers of the city as a whole bear the burden of the obligation thus incurred.

It is pointed out on behalf of the petitioner that the bond form prescribed by the statute provides that the amount of the principal and interest on said bond is payable exclusively out of the district bond fund, and that "neither said city, nor any officer thereof, shall be holden from its payments otherwise." From this provision of the bonds it is urged that the city assumes no liability thereunder and that the only obligation otherwise assumed by the city is as a property owner within the assessment district. It is obvious that the city's liability does not arise by reason of the form of the bond, and that the holder of the bond may enforce payment thereof only from the district bond fund. But the liability of the city is to pay the assessment, which, when paid into the district fund, becomes available for the payment of the bonds. In the case of privately owned property there is no personal liability under the bonds on the part of the owners of the property assessed. The property itself is security to the bondholder that the assessments will be paid into the district fund. But the publicly owned property cannot be so bound. The city is obligated under the statute to provide the equivalent of the amount assessed thereon and to pay the same into the district fund. When the assessment is thus paid and is then disbursed to satisfy the bonds, the money leaves the public coffers irrevocably. This situation is clearly distinguishable from that presented in Stege v. City of Richmond, 194 Cal. 305,[1] wherein no municipally owned property was involved. It is admitted by the parties that if no municipally owned property be included in the assessment district no questions may arise concerning the constitutional debt limit or the charter tax limit. It seems clear, however, that when, as here, municipally owned property is included in the assessment district and the city is bound under the statute to pay from its general funds and into the special bond fund an amount toward the cost of the improvement which exceeds the constitutional debt limit, it is a mere play on words to argue that the city itself is not liable to pay the assessment because the form of the bond provides that the principal and interest thereon shall be paid only from the special fund provided for that purpose and that the city shall not be holden otherwise. Counsel for petitioner certainly would not suggest that if valid bonds be issued and sold, and if default be made in the payment into the special fund of the city's share of the assessment, a bondholder could not compel the city authorities to transfer from the general funds of the city to the special fund sufficient money to satisfy the city's proportion of the assessment or to levy a tax on all the taxable property of the city to replenish adequately the special fund to the extent of the city's proportion.

It is not the liability of the city generally on the bonds to be issued that presents the crucial questions. The liability of the city generally to feed the fund from which the bonds are to be paid is the vital point. That liability is definite, certain, and irrevocable during the full period of outstanding bonds and for the full proportion of the city's share. In principle this situation cannot be distinguished from that wherein a city is proposing to acquire the land by purchase and is binding itself to provide the funds, either from the general funds of the city or from a levy of a tax on the property in the municipality as a whole to pay the cost of the acquisition. In the event that the bonds be sold to provide the money to satisfy the judgment and the title to the property condemned be transferred to the city, the transaction will be closed so far as the acquisition proceeding is concerned. The proceeding is therefore not one governed by the principles laid down in such cases as McBean v. Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 44 P. 556; and Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 76 P. 958. In those cases the right to the public funds accrued only after the performance of some future service on the part of those whose claims thereto might arise or upon the happening of some contingency which might not arise. In the present case the right to the full purchase price will accrue at once upon the finality of the judgement in condemnation, which finality necessarily would occur prior to the assessment and also prior to the sale of the bonds.

[1] 228 P. 461.

[2] The petitioner relies upon the general rule that no obligation cast upon a municipality by operation of law can be said to be an "indebtedness or liability" within the meaning of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. It is argued that the petitioner's obligation to pay the assessment on its property is one imposed by law because section 41 of the act provides that when the municipally owned property is assessed the assessment tax levied thereon is an enforceable obligation against the governing body controlling the land. It is true that the statute so provides, but it does not follow therefrom that the city's liability thereunder is involuntary. The proceeding is instituted by the same governing body charged with the duty of providing the funds for the payment of the bonds. This governing body was under no compulsion to start the proceeding in the first instance. It was entirely optional with the city to proceed or not to proceed in the commencement thereof. Later it was likewise optional with said governing body to include or exclude from the assessment the property belonging to the city. Acting voluntarily in both instances, the city elected to commence the proceeding and also to include the city property in the assessment. Under these circumstances it would seem idle to argue that the obligation thus assumed is imposed by the law and therefore involuntary. In support of its contention in this respect the petitioner cites Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 P. 1128; Federal Construction Co. v. Wold, 30 Cal. App. 360, 158 P. 340; City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 180 Cal. 52, 179 P. 198; and other cases of like import which need not be specially mentioned. The doctrine announced by these cases is, of course, recognized. It was held in the case of Lewis v. Widber, supra, that "the clear intent expressed in the" constitutional provision "was to limit and restrict the power of the municipality as to any indebtedness or liability which it has discretion to incur or not to incur." The payment of the salary of a public officer whose office was created and whose salary was fixed by the Legislature was held not to be within the prohibition of the constitutional section. It was further stated in that case:

> "That this clause of the Constitution refers only to an indebtedness or liability which one of the municipal bodies mentioned has itself incurred—that is, an indebtedness which the municipality has contracted, or a liability resulting, in whole or in part, from some act or conduct of such municipality. Such is the plain meaning of the language used."

In the Federal Construction Company Case it was held that the obligation of the municipality to purchase all property offered at delinquent sales for the nonpayment of street assessments, in the absence of other purchasers, pursuant to the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730) and the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441), was an obligation imposed on the city by law and was not a liability prohibited by the constitutional provision. In such a case the payment out of the public treasury is for the purpose of a loan or advancement to facilitate and make effectual the proceedings under the act and which the city later may recover. The Long Beach Case involved, basically, the liability of a municipality arising out of torts. In all of these cases it was very properly held that the constitutional prohibition did not apply to the situations there presented.

We are unable to distinguish in principle the case here presented from the long line of cases in which this court has enforced the restriction on municipal indebtedness or liability contained in section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. See Mahoney v. City and County of San Francisco, 73 Cal. Dec. 643; In re City and County of San Francisco v. Boyle, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965; Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925; Arthur v. City of Petaluma, 175 Cal. 216, 165 P. 698; People v. Hanford High School Dist., 148 Cal. 705, 84 P. 193; San Francisco Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641; 18 Cal. Jur. 879.

The petitioner has cited and strongly relies on the case of City of Perry v. Johnson, 106 Okl. 32, 233 P. 679, as supporting the contention that the levy of an assessment against municipally owned property does not result in the creation of an indebtedness as contemplated by section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. In the Oklahoma case the court held that the provision of the Constitution of that state similar to that contained in our Constitution was a "debt" limit and not a "tax" limit and did not apply to assessments for benefits occasioned by reason of public improvements levied against real estate owned by a municipal corporation. The court in that case was mainly concerned with the meaning of the word "indebtedness" in the Constitution of that state. Our constitutional provision is broader, in that it prohibits the incurring of any "indebtedness or liability," without the consent of the electors. But assuming the two provisions were the same, we are unable to arrive at the same conclusion. As pointed out in that case, there is for some purposes a distinction between an assessment for benefits and an ad valorem tax; but when the city pledges its credit, i. e., the credit of the taxpayers of the city as a whole, to pay for a public improvement and, as here, the amount agreed to be paid is in excess of the income and revenue for the year in which the liability is incurred and without the assent of the electors of the city, it seems to us that a liability is incurred contrary to the provisions of section 18 of article 11 of our Constitution as the same has been interpreted by this court since the adoption of the section. Whether the transaction be one of purchase by firm contract in installments, or by voluntarily assuming to pay assessments levied by itself, the city is contemplating an unauthorized expenditure of public funds.

We are quick to recognize a growing and commendable tendency on the part of the legislative branch and of the subordinate governmental agencies of the state to authorize and adopt measures which will enable the taxpayers of the city at large to bear a just proportion of special assessments for benefits on account of public improvements; but we cannot lose sight of the fact that in carrying out this laudable purpose constitutional bounds must be observed. It may also be noted that if the improvements be important enough to warrant expenditure of general funds in excess of ordinary income and revenue, the authorities having the matter in charge should not hesitate to submit the question of the incurring of the liability therefor to the electors for their approval or rejection as plainly contemplated by the constitutional provision.

The respondent urges, as a further reason why the relief sought herein should not be granted, the fact that after the petitioner started the present acquisition proceeding, the Legislature amended the act. It is claimed that the effect of the amendment has deprived the city of jurisdiction to further proceed. Under the act as originally framed, the first interest payment on the district bonds was made payable on the 2d day of the January or the July next succeeding the date of the bonds. In 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1375, § 10) the Legislature amended the act so as to provide that the first payment of interest should be payable on the 2d day of the January or the July next succeeding one year after the date of the bonds. It is urged that the delayed payment of interest under the amendment might result in a lower bid for the bonds and an increased cost of the improvement. It is not made clear, and we do not perceive, how the amendment would increase the cost of the acquisition of the land which of necessity is not determinable by any provision of the bonds but is fixed in the condemnation proceeding. Nor does it appear that the burden of the property owners in the district would be increased by reason of the amendment. We find nothing in the amendment which may not be given effect without prejudice to any right of the petitioner or those who might be required to pay the cost of acquisition.

The peremptory writ is denied.

McNEECE v. WOOD et al. (L. A. 9562.)

Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑103(1)—Courts give full application to rule requiring strict interpretation of lease relative to forfeiture (Civ. Code, §§ 1442, 1641).

The courts do not, in view of Civ. Code, § 1641, hesitate to give full application to the rule of interpretation of a lease, as provided by section 1442, that a condition involving a lease forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it was created.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑103(1)—Lease forfeitures are not favored by courts, and are not enforced if couched in ambiguous terms.

Lease forfeitures as such are not favored by the courts, and are never enforced if they are couched in ambiguous terms.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑103(1)—Lease forfeiture can be enforced only where breach shown is within clear and manifest intention of parties.

A lease forfeiture can be enforced only where there is such breach shown as it was the clear and manifest intention of the parties to provide for.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑103(1)—Burden is on party claiming lease forfeiture under contract to show that such was unmistakable intention.

The burden is on the party claiming forfeiture of lease under terms of contract to show that such forfeiture was the unmistakable intention of the instrument, and, if the agreement can be reasonably interpreted so as to avoid the forfeiture, it is court's duty to so interpret it.

5. Landlord and tenant ⚷105—Under lease providing for forfeiture for unlawful use of premises, declaration of forfeiture was premature when condition causing forfeiture had not continued for stipulated 30 days.

Where lease providing for forfeiture of lessee's rights in the premises for any improper or unlawful use thereof, and also contained a provision relative to conditions of forfeitures existing 30 days before declaration of forfeiture, held, in landlord's suit for breach for bookmaking and possession of whisky on premises, that declaration of forfeiture was premature, since 30 days provided in contract had not expired.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚷105—Forfeiture of lease held improper, where basic act was by sublessees, and lessee attempted to stop act as soon as he became aware of it.

Forfeiture of lease held improper, where unlawful act, violation of bookmaking statute (Pen. Code, § 337a), on which it was based, was by sublessees, and lessee attempted to stop act as soon as he became aware of it.

7. Landlord and tenant ⚷105—Single unlawful act of liquor selling by occupant held not sufficient to work forfeiture of lease (Volstead Act, § 23 [27 USCA §§ 35–37]).

Single unlawful act of liquor selling by occupant of leased premises held, in view of Volstead Act, § 23 (27 USCA §§ 35–37), insufficient to work a forfeiture of the lease providing for forfeiture for use of premises for improper or unlawful purposes, where lessee did not know of the possession of liquor at the time, and, on his discovery thereof, took immediate steps to remedy condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by James H. McNeece against George W. Wood and another. From the judgment, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding former opinion, 260 P. 816.

Luce & Swing, James J. Breckenridge, Titus & Macomber, and Lewis R. Kirby, all of San Diego, for appellant.

A. Haines, John H. McCorkle, and Haines & Haines, all of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant Wood from a judgment declaring forfeited a lease on the McNeece building in the city of San Diego.

By written instrument dated November 1, 1920, the plaintiff leased to the defendant Wood the building in question, which is a business block in said city. On February 17, 1923, Wood subleased the upper four floors to Mrs. Jennie H. Hipwell. Mrs. L. E. Geoghegan, a daughter of Mrs. Hipwell, became manager and had charge of the renting of rooms of that portion of the building leased to her mother. On November 20, 1925, Mrs. Geoghegan rented room No. 438 to Bradley and O'Brien, who took possession of the room 2 or 3 days later. One Logan was employed by Mrs. Geoghegan to operate the elevator in the building and was acting as such at the time of the transactions involved herein. Logan was also employed at the same time by the defendant Wood to keep watch and report to Wood any infractions of the law or other things not proper and right about the building. Bradley and O'Brien installed telephones in room 438 and started bookmaking operations. It is conceded by all parties that the operations of Bradley and O'Brien in said room were in violation of section 337a of the Penal Code. Logan became suspicious of the conduct of Bradley and O'Brien and endeavored to notify defendant Wood, but was unable to locate him. He then notified the police department of what was going on in said room. After the lapse of four or five days the room was raided by the police. The raid took place on December 1, 1925, the guilty parties were apprehended and prosecuted, and the unlawful business ceased to be carried on in said room.

The defendant Wood subleased a room on the ground floor to one Joe England, who conducted a restaurant therein. England employed one Shepard to look after the restaurant during certain hours of the night. On the evening of June 19, 1926, police officers visited the restaurant to search the same for contraband liquor. Shepard was in the restaurant at the time. Five pints of whisky were found on the premises by the officers. Shepard was arrested and he entered a plea of guilty to the charge of unlawful possession.

On December 18, 1925, the plaintiff served written notice of the forfeiture of the original lease on the defendant Wood and his subtenants and 12 days later filed suit to have the forfeiture declared and possession restored to the lessor. Subsequently the plaintiff, by way of supplemental complaint filed on July 2, 1926, set up the alleged unlawful possession of liquor on the part of Shepard on June 19, 1926. The cause was tried and the court declared the lease forfeited for breach of the following covenant of the lease:

> "It is further agreed and understood that said lessee shall not use or permit to be used said premises for any improper or unlawful purpose, and any such improper or unlawful use shall work a forfeiture of this lease."

The trial court refused to consider as having any bearing on the rights of the parties another provision of the lease as follows:

> "It is further hereby agreed that, if the lessee shall at any time refuse or fail to pay rent as herein provided to be paid by him, or shall refuse or fail to keep any of the covenants herein contained, and such condition shall continue for a period of 30 days, then, and in that event, the lessor may at his option declare this lease forfeited, and may retake possession of said premises without process of law."

The first contention of the appealing defendant is that the court should have read both clauses of the lease together, and that when they are so read there is evidence from the document itself that the parties intended no forfeiture to take place until the lessee should have opportunity to remedy any alleged breach of a covenant, and that such opportunity should continue for at least 30 days. Section 1641 of the Civil Code provides:

> "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other."

[1-4] This is a familiar rule of construction and when due regard is given to it there is much force in the contention of the defendant that when these two clauses of the lease are read together the second clause helps to interpret the first and evidences an intention of the parties that no forfeiture should at once take place for a breach of any of the covenants of the lease. At least it must be said that when the two clauses are read together an uncertainty or ambiguity arises requiring a construction to be placed on the language used by the parties in order to declare their intention. As there is nothing in the evidence to explain the uncertainty, and thus determine what was meant, we turn to the law for guidance in the construction of the terms of the lease. At once we are met with the Code provision as follows:

> "A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created." Section 1442, Civ. Code.

Examination of the cases in this state shows that our courts have not hesitated to give this rule of interpretation full application.

> "Forfeitures, as such, are not favored by the courts, and are never enforced if they are couched in ambiguous terms." Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 321, 24 P. 280, 281 (18 Am. St. Rep. 187).
> "A forfeiture can be enforced only when there is 'such a breach shown as it was the clear and manifest intention of the parties to provide for.'" Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 595, 42 P. 976, 977. "The burden is upon the party claiming the forfeiture to show that such was the unmistakable intention of the instrument. If the agreement can be reasonably interpreted so as to avoid the forfeiture, it is our duty to do so." Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285, 289, 60 P. 855, 856.

Reference to cases of like import might be multiplied. See Johnson v. Kaeser, 196 Cal. 686, 700, 239 P. 324; Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield Oil Co., 176 Cal. 1, 167 P. 369; 6 Cal. Jur. 362; 12 Cal. Jur. 633; 15 Cal. Jur. 779.

[5] It seems reasonable to conclude that the parties to the lease here in question intended that the lessor could not take advantage of the breach of any covenant therein on the part of the lessee until the expiration of 30 days after the breach. As 30 days had not expired when the notice of forfeiture was given and action taken in the courts to have the forfeiture declared, the said court action in each case was premature.

[6] Even if our conclusion as to the intention of the parties under the lease might be to the contrary, the equities of the case do not call for the drastic remedy of forfeiture under the facts presented. As to the original cause of action, it appears that room 438 was rented on November 20. Possession was taken by Bradley and O'Brien about November 22. Several days prior to the December 1st following, the employee and agent of the defendant Wood notified the police department of the violation of law in the building and the violators were promptly arrested and prosecuted. What more could the lessee Wood have done? He acted through his agent with the utmost promptness. It would seem to be highly inequitable under the facts here shown to have deprived him of his estate in the property. The fact that Mrs. Geoghegan testified that she knew when she rented the room that bookmaking was to be carried on there would not estop the lessee Wood from taking prompt action to oust the malefactors from the building and thus avoid the forfeiture.

As to the cause of action set forth in the supplemental complaint, it appears that the liquor was in the possession of an employee of the sublessee without the knowledge or consent of the lessee or the sublessee. Assuming, as contended by the plaintiff, that the acts of a sublessee are binding on the lessee, it would also appear to be highly inequitable to forfeit the lease on account of one act of unlawful possession on the part of the employee of the sublessee in the absence of some notice or knowledge of the infraction of the law on the part of the lessee or his subtenant. If such a rule be applied, the lessee of an office building or hotel would indeed be in a precarious position, for any infraction of the law on the part of an employee or guest or invitee or licensee on the premises, and entirely unknown to the lessee of the premises, would ipso facto work a forfeiture of the lease. If such result be contemplated by the parties, it should be evidenced by their agreement in no uncertain terms.

The plaintiff relies on section 23 of the Volstead Act (41 Stats. at Large, 305, 314 [27 USCA §§ 35-37]) as authorizing the forfeiture. That section provides that:

> "Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall, at the option of the lessor, work a forfeiture of the lease." 27 USCA § 37.

It may well be questioned whether an employee or a guest or a licensee of the lessee or tenant in possession is an "occupant" of the premises as contemplated by the section relied upon. Webster defines the word "occupant" as:

> "One who occupies; especially a tenant in possession of property, as distinguished from the actual owner; by extension, in law, one who occupies and claims property that is without an owner."

When this meaning is given to the word the unreasonable and absurd consequences of including within its meaning one who has no responsibility for the conduct of the premises such as to bind the innocent lessee by his unlawful act are obviated.

[7] We conclude that a single unlawful act on the part of such a one is not sufficient to work a forfeiture of the lease under the written agreement and the circumstances here shown. It necessarily follows that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and that the judgment is unsupported.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

8. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—Appellate court may examine evidence to determine whether, on reasonable view, evidence will support finding of commission as to jurisdictional facts essential to award (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917).

Appellate court has power to examine evidence for purpose of ascertaining whether, on any reasonable view that may be taken of it, accepting only statements and inferences most favorable to findings in case of conflict or uncertainty, it will support finding of Industrial Accident Commission, under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 835), as to jurisdictional facts essential to its award, and to set award aside, if no support for it is found.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Ralph R. Powell, claimant, opposed by the Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, insurance carrier, and Delsie L. Isley and another, employers. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, a part of the Department of Industrial Relations, awarding compensation, the insurance carrier petitions for certiorari. Award annulled.

F. Britton McConnell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding by the petitioner to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, which, under the present law dividing the functions of the state government into various departments, is a part of the department of industrial relations. Petitioner is the insurance carrier of Delsie L. Isley, and an award was made against it on account of injuries sustained by one Ralph R. Powell while engaged in wrecking a barn and while in the employ of said Delsie L. Isley.

From the evidence before the commission, it appears that the said Delsie L. Isley was the owner of two trucks, and was engaged in the general trucking and hauling business under the name of "Isley Transfer." This business seems to have been entirely conducted and managed by her husband, Everett Isley, and the business is usually referred to in the record as his business; in fact, the evidence shows but little connection of Delsie L. Isley with the business, except that she was the owner of the trucks used therein, but, as petitioner concedes that the evidence is sufficient to show that Powell was in her employ, no discussion of it from this standpoint is necessary. The scope of the business, as stated by Everett Isley, was that he hauled "anything at all." He also said that he had engaged in one other wrecking job about three or fourth months previous to the wrecking of the barn, but that his wife had no interest at all in that job. Powell, who was the only other witness on this point, stated that the principal business of the Isley Transfer was hauling all kinds of stuff, general hauling or draying, and that to his knowledge "Mr. Isley" had moved buildings before.

Everett Isley learned that certain contractors for whom he was doing hauling had for sale a house and a barn. Desiring to provide himself and Delsie L. Isley with a place of abode, he bought this house and barn, and paid for them by a credit on his wife's account with the contractors. He had the house moved upon a lot, which had already been bought for residential purposes in the name of his wife; and, as soon as the house was moved and made ready, he and his wife began living in it. He proceeded to wreck the barn and haul the materials composing it to this same lot. Part of these materials were used in repairing the house after it had been moved. It was his original intention to use the remainder thereof in building a garage on this lot, but this purpose was abandoned, and the surplus materials were sold.

Powell was engaged in tearing the barn apart, and in the course of that work received the injuries for which the award was made. He was engaged by Everett Isley a short time before these injuries were received under an employment by which he was promised steady work when there was any work to be done, and was to work at anything Isley had to do, and to be paid 50 cents an hour. After doing a couple of jobs of hauling, he was set by Isley at the work of tearing down the barn, doing no hauling in connection with it, and worked a little less than two days thereat before he was injured. After the materials of the barn were taken apart, they were hauled to the lot above mentioned by Everett Isley himself, from time to time, as he had a little leisure from other jobs. There were three men altogether working at the wrecking of the barn, who were each paid $4 per day, and the testimony is undisputed that they could complete the job in not more than five days at a labor cost of not more than $60.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that the applicant, Powell, was employed by Delsie L. Isley and not by Everett Isley, and that "the work in which applicant was engaged at the time of said injury was connected with the regular business of the employer, and was not casual." There were, of course, other findings to which it is unnecessary to refer.

Petitioner claims that there is no evidence on which the findings above quoted as to the nature of the work may be based, and that this finding does not cover the whole issue. The solution of the problems presented by this claim depends upon the following provisions of section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 835):

> "(a) The term 'employee' * * * shall be construed to mean: Every person in the service of an employer as defined by section seven hereof * * * excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer, * * * (c) The term 'casual' as used in this section shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days, without regard to the number of men employed, and where the total labor cost of such work is less than one hundred dollars. The phrase 'course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include all services tending toward the preservation, maintenance or operation of the business, business premises or business property of the employer. The words 'trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include any undertaking actually engaged in by him with some degree of regularity, the trade name, articles of incorporation or principal business of the employer to the contrary notwithstanding."

[1] There can be no doubt that Powell's employment on the barn wrecking job was casual, as that term is defined in the statute above quoted. The work contemplated on that job was to be completed in less than ten working days at a total labor cost of less than $100. We do not think the situation is altered in this respect by the fact that he was under a general engagement to work for Isley. The wrecking of the barn was a separate and independent piece of work which Powell undertook in response to a specific order from Isley, and it must be considered by itself in determining whether it was casual. Rissman v. Industrial Acc. Com'n, 190 Cal. 619, 213 P. 991.

[2] The question remains whether Powell's work on the barn was "not in the course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer." Petitioner contends that the finding of the Commission that the work "was connected with the regular business of the employer" does not meet the issue on this matter, and its argument has much force, but we need not determine the point, because we think the finding, even if sufficient in form, finds no support in the evidence. The employer, it must be remembered, was Delsie L. Isley. Her business, according to all the evidence, was trucking and hauling. No other evidence was needed to show that it did not include the wrecking of buildings. While Everett Isley testified that he had previously wrecked one building, he also said that his wife had no interest in that job, and, hence, it cannot be used to amplify the scope of her business. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, perhaps Powell's testimony that "Mr. Isley" had moved buildings before can be construed to refer to something done by him in carrying on the business of Delsie L. Isley, but, if so, it covers merely the moving, not the wrecking, of buildings. There is nothing to show that Delsie L. Isley had engaged with some or any degree of regularity in the wrecking of buildings. Neither was Powell's service one tending toward the preservation, maintenance, or operation of the trucking business, or of the business premises or business property used in such business. The respondent suggests that it might be so classified because Everett Isley intended to use a part of the materials taken from the barn in building a garage; but there is no direct testimony as to the purpose for which that garage was to be used, and the inference from the fact that it was to be placed on the lot where Mr. and Mrs. Isley had their residence—nothing else appears as a basis for any inference—would be that it was to be used for some purpose connected with their residence, and not with the business. In fact, a part of the lumber was used in repairing the dwelling house, and the remainder was sold, and neither of these operations was in the course of any business carried on by Delsie L. Isley.

The petitioner also contends that the work in question was not covered by the insurance policy which it had issued to Delsie L. Isley, but, in view of our conclusion on the point already discussed, it is not necessary to pass upon this contention.

The award is annulled.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The respondent Department of Industrial Relations has filed a petition for a rehearing, in which several contentions are stated at some length. Most of the points so made were at least suggested in the brief originally submitted to us, and were considered by us before the decision was made, although some of them are not discussed in the opinion. A large part of this petition seems to be based on a misunderstanding of the language of our opinion, which has apparently led counsel to believe that we held the particular work in which Powell was engaged when he was hurt to be the personal business of Everett Isley. Following the example of the witnesses, we referred to the various acts of Everett Isley as being his acts, without specifically stating that they were done by him for Delsie L. Isley; but we fully understood that all of these acts were done by him as her agent, except in the single case of the previous wrecking job to which he testified. We considered the case in the same aspect, except as to that one job, as if all the acts referred to had been done by Delsie L. Isley in person.

As to the casual nature of Powell's employment, respondent complains that the opinion fails to distinguish between the employment and the work done under it. Perhaps the words "specific order," used in the opinion, did not fully express our meaning; but we had the distinction referred to in mind, and were of the opinion that the evidence showed a separate employment of Powell to work upon the barn, which was distinct from his employment to work in the trucking business.

[3] Respondent also argues that this court was in error in its statement that Delsie L. Isley had no interest in the previous wrecking job done by Everett Isley. We have again carefully read the evidence quoted in support of this argument, but can find therein no reason for a different conclusion from that previously reached by us. However, even if we were wrong on that point, a single wrecking job done prior to the one in question would not be sufficient to show that Delsie L. Isley had engaged in the wrecking of buildings "with some degree of regularity," and, hence, by the terms of the act, would not effect an extension of her business beyond its previous scope.

[4] Respondent also claims that because the barn, having been paid for from the proceeds of Delsie L. Isley's business, was her property, therefore any work done on it was incidental to and done in the course of that business. This is not the criterion established by the statute, and if it were adopted it would lead to extreme consequences. The testimony showed that all of the living expenses of the Isleys were paid out of the proceeds of this same business, and hence Delsie L. Isley was no doubt the owner of all food bought for their personal use; but if she had called Powell into her kitchen to peel potatoes for the family dinner, and he had cut himself while so doing, it would hardly be contended that the cut was received by him in the course of her business, and if such contention were made it would receive scant attention. A number of cases are cited which hold that an employee may recover compensation for injuries received by him in doing work which, although not strictly within the scope of his particular employment, is done in the course of the employer's business; but they are clearly not applicable here, where the work was within the scope of Powell's special employment, but was not done within the course of the employer's business.

[5] Another contention is that, because the wrecking of the barn was done in order to put its materials into a haulable condition, such wrecking was incidental to the business of hauling. Several cases are cited where it was held that work which appeared to be somewhat out of the line of the employer's business was nevertheless done in the course of that business. But in all of them it appeared that the work was done at the employer's place of business and was to some extent connected with and arose out of his business operations. No case is cited which is at all similar in its facts to that now before us. This contention would lead to the conclusion that the business of every common carrier includes as an incident the manufacturing of the commodities hauled by such carrier, although such manufacturing had never been engaged in before the occasion which gave rise to the question.

[6] Respondent also refers to the presumption declared by section 8, subdivision (b), of the act, and claims that this is evidence on which a finding that Powell was an employee subject to the act may be based, even in the face of evidence showing the facts to be otherwise. The decisions are in conflict on the question whether a presumption may thus be used to support a finding; but under either rule the presumption referred to is of no avail to respondent. On this subject the act provides:

> "Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act."

Hence, when it appears, as it does in this case, that the person rendering service is expressly excluded by the act from its scope, there is no presumption as to him.

[7, 8] Respondent also claims that the court has exceeded it powers by weighing the evidence. If by weighing the evidence is meant its examination for the purpose of determining which of two or more conflicting statements or inferences from the evidence should be accepted as the basis for a finding, we agree that this court has no power to perform that function in this case. But it does have power to examine the evidence for the purpose of ascertainng whether, on any reasonable view that may be taken of it, accepting only the statements and inferences most favorable to the findings in case of conflict or uncertainty, it will support the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission as to jurisdictional facts essential to its award, and to set the award aside if no such support for it is found. We think we have gone no further in this case.

A rehearing is denied.

SHOWERS v. ROBER. (Civ. 5257.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟾931(1)—Findings being favorable to plaintiff, evidence on appeal must be considered in light most favorable to plaintiff.

Where findings are favorable to plaintiff on appeal from judgment for plaintiff, evidence must be considered in light most favorable to him.

2. Corporations ⟾432(12)—Evidence in broker's action for commission held to sustain finding that one signing contract for corporate purchaser had authority to do so.

In action for real estate broker's commission, evidence held to support finding that general manager, secretary, and director of corporate purchaser who signed contract of purchase in name of corporation was authorized to execute contract, and hence contract was a binding agreement.

3. Corporations ⟾406(4)—General manager's authority to execute contract for corporation need not be evidenced by written instrument.

Authority of general manager of corporation to execute contract of purchase for corporation need not be evidenced by an instrument in writing.

4. Brokers ⟾49(3)—Purchaser's agreement containing terms generally found in such instruments held not substantially different from broker's authorization.

In action for recovery of real estate broker's commission, purchaser's agreement, containing terms which would be supplied by law if not specifically set forth and which are generally found in instruments of such nature, held not fatally at variance with broker's authorization, especially since it was owner's duty to object to any of terms of purchaser's agreement if they were not suitable, so that an adjustment could be made.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Jack Showers, doing business under the firm name and style of San Vicente Realty Company, against H. Mary Rober, for real estate broker's commission. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Victor H. Kendrick and Wm. T. Kendrick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lee R. Taylor and Richard Glass, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant appeals from a judgment in the sum of $1,250 rendered against her in an action in which plaintiff sued for a commission alleged to have been earned in negotiating the sale of defendant's real estate. On November 16, 1923, defendant gave to plaintiff written authorization to sell the land in question, in which it is stated: "I hereby constitute Jack Showers sole agent for the herein described property for 30 days and thereafter until notified in writing to the contrary." The price stated was $25,000, of which $16,300 was to be cash ("down"), and the balance to be covered by mortgage. On November 28, 1923, through the efforts of plaintiff, the South Park Land Company, a corporation, agreed to purchase defendant's property by an instrument which was executed in the name of the corporation by C. M. Crawford, its general manager. By the instrument the purchaser agreed to pay the price fixed by defendant, of which $1,000 was then paid by check. The instrument provided:

> "The balance of the purchase price is to be paid 30 days from date hereof as follows, to wit: ($4,000) four thousand dollars additional to the ($1,000) one thousand dollar deposit to be paid into escrow and the balance when the title has had a report upon. Purchaser to be given possession within ninety (90) days hereof."

Plaintiff then called upon defendant and informed her that he had sold the property. Mrs. Rober refused to talk to plaintiff, shut the door in his face, and directed him to talk to her husband. Plaintiff then told Mr. Rober that he had sold the property to the South Park Land Company, but Mr. Rober said he "told his wife that she should not have signed any card or any listing like that, and that he would not have anything to do with it, and he would keep her from selling if he could." An escrow was started at the Citizens' State Bank at Sawtelle, and the $1,000 deposited there. The cashier of the bank wrote a letter to Mrs. Rober concerning the escrow, and the registration return card was returned to the bank bearing Mrs. Rober's signature by her daughter.

[1-3] Two points are presented by appellant in arguing for a reversal of the judgment. It is first contended that it is not shown by the agreement of the South Park Land Company, or otherwise, that C. M. Crawford was authorized to bind the corporation. Since the findings are favorable to plaintiff the evidence must be considered in the light most favorable to him. The witness Crawford testified that the corporation was buying and selling real estate and that he had conducted practically all of the purchases and sales; that he was handling all of the affairs of the corporation. Witness Martin, the president of the South Park Land Company, testified that Crawford was the general manager of the corporation and that four of the five directors had met and discussed the proposed purchase and had "told Mr. Crawford to close the transaction on either of the terms he wanted to, either for cash or on the payment down and balance on the mortgage." Crawford was secretary of the corporation and a member of its board of directors. It was established that the South Park Land Company was ready, able, and willing to complete the purchase. We are of the opinion that the agreement to purchase secured from the Sourth Park Land Company was a binding agreement and that the finding of the trial court that Crawford was authorized to execute it is supported by the evidence. In 6 California Jurisprudence, p. 1109, it is said:

> "In the case of a corporation organized for commercial purposes, its general manager, or whoever may be given immediate direction or control of its affairs, is its agent, empowered, unless expressly restricted to the performance of certain specified acts, to do, in respect to the management of the ordinary and usual affairs of the corporation, what the corporation itself could do within the scope of its authority." Betts v. Southern Cal., etc., Exchange, 144 Cal. 402, 77 P. 993; Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 509, 185 P. 388; Raftis v. McCloud River Lumber Co., 35 Cal. App. 397, 170 P. 176; Stevens v. Selma Fruit Co., 18 Cal. App. 242, 123 P. 212.

It was not necessary that Crawford's authority be evidenced by an instrument in writing. In McCartney v. Clover Valley Land & Stock Co. (C. C. A.) 232 F. 697, 1 A. L. R. 1127, it is said:

> "In our judgment section 2309 of the California Code, requiring an agent's authority to execute a contract in writing to be itself in writing, does not apply to the executive officers of a corporation. It has never been the practice to require powers of attorney to confer authority upon such agents. We think the statute was intended to apply to agents proper; that is, persons who were not officers of the corporation. The executive officer of a corporation is something more than an agent. He is the representative of the corporation itself."

See, also, Arnold v. La Belle Oil Co., 47 Cal. App. 290, 296, 190 P. 815.

[4] Appellant argues in support of her second contention that the terms offered by the purchaser are not the same as those contained in the authorization to plaintiff. She points out: That by the purchaser's agreement the purchase price was to be paid within 30 days, whereas the agent's authority called for part of the payment immediately ("down"). The purchaser was to be given possession within 90 days from said date instead of 30 days. That the evidence of title to purchaser from owner was to be guaranteed by a responsible title company at the expense of owner. That if improvements were destroyed or materially damaged between date of agreement and consummation of sale, purchaser might at his option declare it null and void. That taxes for the then fiscal year ending June 30 next and insurance, rents, etc., were to be prorated. That the property was sold subject to the approval of owner. That time was of the essence of the agreement. We fail to see any substantial difference between the terms set forth in the purchaser's agreement and the defendant's authorization to plaintiff. The latter is very brief and is silent on most of the points just enumerated. Some of the terms proposed would be supplied by law if not specifically set forth in the agreement. The purchaser's agreement contains merely the items which are generally found in instruments of this kind. One of the items, that extending the time for giving possession, is for the benefit of the seller. The allowance of 30 days before completing the cash payment cannot be held to be a fatal variance, when it is considered that during this period the evidence of title would be produced and the delays customary to the handling of escrows would follow. Moreover, it was the duty of Mrs. Rober to object to any of these terms of the purchaser's agreement if they did not suit her, so that an adjustment could be made. In Cal. Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, 40 Cal. App. 246, 180 P. 625, the court said:

> "It has been held, upon the soundest of reason, where a broker has negotiated the sale of real property to a purchaser able, ready, and willing to take and pay for the property, and any of the terms of the contract as to payment, or the abstract or deed are unsatisfactory to the intending vendor, the latter should object to them on that ground and not refuse absolutely to sell; and that where he fails to make such objection under such circumstances, he will be held liable to the broker negotiating the sale for his commissions if he refuses to accept the purchaser."

Mrs. Rober not only failed to point out wherein any of the terms of the purchaser's agreement were unsatisfactory, but she precluded the possibility of completing the sale by shutting the door in her agent's face and refusing to discuss the matter further. She is not now in position to deny his right to the commission earned. The record discloses that plaintiff procured a purchaser for the property and that he did everything in his power to consummate the sale. He was prevented from doing so by the conduct of the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

The conduct of a meat market is the subject of regulation under the police power of the state or any municipality.

3. Counties 🔑21½—Municipal corporations 🔑592(1)—Counties and cities may make and enforce police and sanitary regulations not conflicting with general laws.

Any county or city may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, or other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1)—Courts will not disturb determination by legislative body that ordinance is essential to protect public health.

Determination by the legislative body that ordinance regulating sale of uncured and uncooked meats is essential to protect public health will not be disturbed by the courts.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑625, 626—Ordinance regulating sale of uncured and uncooked meats held not unreasonable and discriminatory.

Ordinance of city of Fresno prohibiting sale of uncured and uncooked meats between certain hours or on Sundays is not void as being unreasonable and discriminatory in selecting one kind of meat products to the exclusion of others; there being wide distinction between sale of uncooked and other meat products, and in view of fact that fresh and uncooked meats are easily infected and require constant supervision to insure their wholesomeness.

Application by Jake Lowenthal for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Fresno to secure release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violation of city ordinance governing sale of uncured and uncooked meats. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

TYLER, P. J. Habeas corpus. Petitioner was accused of the violation of a certain ordinance of the city of Fresno which imposes certain restrictions upon the sale of uncured and uncooked meats. On application to this court he was granted a writ of habeas corpus by which he seeks to have determined the legality of his arrest and detention. From the return filed herein it appears that petitioner was charged in the police court of the city of Fresno with the violation of Ordinance 1320 of said city as amended by Ordinance 1327, which declares in substance that it shall be unlawful and a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person to sell or offer for sale any uncured or uncooked meats, or to remove the same from any established place of business in said city, or to keep open for business any place where such meats are sold or offered for sale between the hours of 7 o'clock p. m. and 7 o'clock a. m. of the following day, or on any Sunday; that petitioner violated said ordinance and was arrested, and now is held upon such charge by respondent the chief of police of said city. Petitioner seeks his release upon the ground that the ordinance which he is charged with violating is invalid and void for the reason that it is in conflict with the California Meat Inspection Law, and therefore contravenes the provisions of section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution.

[1-4] The law invoked was approved June 3, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1269). In substance it provides that the director of agriculture is given supervision over all establishments used in the business of slaughtering and preparing animals for food purposes in the state of California, except establishments under the supervision of an inspection department of any chartered or incorporated city where inspection is made by certain qualified officers or where inspection is maintained by the bureau of animal industry of the United States department of agriculture, or under and in accordance with a county meat inspection ordinance. The state director is also given broad powers to provide suitable rules and regulations to insure a healthful, wholesome, and safe meat supply for the state of California. Section 8 of the act expressly inhibits any further restrictions than those imposed by the act itself on the sale of meats. It is conceded that the city of Fresno has never adopted a meat inspection ordinance except it has provided by ordinance (970), among other things, that "beef, veal, mutton and pork" shall not be sold unless it has been inspected and bears the inspection stamp of the state authorities. The record is silent upon the question as to whether or not the city maintains an inspection department, though counsel for respondent claims in his brief that the board of health performs this office. Under these facts it is the claim of petitioner that the Legislature of the state of California, by the enactment of the Meat Inspection Law, above referred to, has indicated its intent to legislate fully upon the whole subject of meat inspection and to provide all regulations and restrictions necessary to insure to the people a pure, healthful, wholesome, and safe supply of fresh meats; that the law is a general one applicable to the city of Fresno, as such city has no department to supervise the inspection of establishments slaughtering and preparing animals for food products, no inspectors, nor any ordinance in reference thereto so as to exempt it from the operation of the law. The question of whether or not the Legislature of the state, by the enactment of the Meat Inspection Law, indicated an intent to occupy the whole field of meat supply regulation within the state, and the further question as to whether or not such law is operative in the city of Fresno, are questions that to our minds are not here involved. The ordinance here attacked does not in any manner attempt to prohibit or restrict the sale of meat that has been inspected according to the provisions of the state law, nor does it impose any additional burdens or requirements concerning such meats. The portion of the ordinance objected to regulating the hours of sale of meats is in no manner contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of the state law. The conduct of a meat market has always been the subject of regulation under the police power of the state or any municipality. Ex parte Kohler, 74 Cal. 38, 15 P. 436. Any county or city may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, or other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. In re Holmes, 187 Cal. 640, 203 P. 398. The ordinance under consideration is one designed to protect the public health, and the determination by the legislative body that the regulation is essential, will not be disturbed by the courts. Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 521, 183 P. 230. Its manifest object is to prevent the sale of unfit or tainted meat at a time when those employed to safeguard the people are not on duty. The state law does not attempt to regulate the hours of sale of uncooked meats, but merely deals with the subject of the slaughtering of animals. The ordinance in question in no manner trespasses upon the provisions of the state law, nor is it inconsistent therewith. This is a subject that has received such general attention by the courts that we do not consider a further discussion of it to be necessary.

[5] The further contention is made that the ordinance is invalid and void for the reason that the regulation sought to be imposed is unreasonable and discriminatory, in that it selects one kind of meat products to the exclusion of others. There is a wide distinction between the sale of uncooked and other meat products. Fresh and uncooked meats are easily infected, and it requires constant supervision to insure their wholesomeness, or abuses will arise which may seriously impair the health of the public. The exclusion of other meats or foodstuffs from the operation of the ordinance therefore does not affect any right of petitioner under the organic law, for it is a proper exercise of the police power of the city.

Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

4. Automobiles 🔑9—City parking ordinance providing parking angles and distance from curb held not unconstitutional as in violation of Motor Vehicle Act relative to stopping on highway (Motor Vehicle Act 1923, §§ 136, 145).

City traffic ordinance relative to the parking of vehicles, and stating distance from curb and angle relative thereto, held, in view of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191) § 22, subd. d, as it read prior to St. 1923, p. 517, not unconstitutional as being in conflict with Motor Vehicle Act 1923 (St. 1923, p. 561) § 136, providing for the stopping of vehicles on the highway, since neither by such section nor by section 145 (p. 563) has the Legislature legislated as to method or manner of parking vehicles on streets of cities and towns so as to make stated ordinance conflict with state laws.

5. Automobiles 🔑173(2)—Violation of city parking ordinance held negligence per se.

Violation of city parking ordinance held negligence per se.

There can be no liability for negligence which is not the cause of the injury complained of.

7. Negligence 🔑61(1)—To impose liability, it is not necessary that negligence complained of be sole cause.

To impose liability, it is not necessary that the negligence complained of be the sole cause of an injury, since one is liable if his act concurs with that of another in producing injury.

Proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, when automobile in which she was riding on city streets collided with defendant's parked truck, was truck owner's wrong in parking car so as to be dangerous to traveling public.

10. Automobiles 🔑245(83)—Whether automobile driver, in whose car plaintiff was passenger when injured, was contributorily negligent in colliding with parked truck, held question of fact for jury.

Whether automobile driver, in whose car plaintiff was riding as a passenger when injured, was contributorily negligent in colliding with parked truck, resulting in plaintiff's injury, held a question of fact for the jury.

11. Appeal and error 🔑999(1)—Jury's finding on fact question held conclusive on review.

The finding of the jury on a question of fact held conclusive on reviewing court.

12. Automobiles 🔑243(5)—That other automobile drivers had passed sills on parked truck extending into street held no excuse for defendant's negligence in parking truck, so as to preclude plaintiff's recovery for personal injury from automobile in which she was riding running into sills.

Fact that other automobile drivers had passed sills on a truck parked contrary to a city ordinance so that the sills were extending into the street held no excuse for defendant truck owner's negligence in so parking his truck so as to preclude plaintiff's recovery for personal injury sustained when automobile in which she was riding ran into such projecting sills.

13. Automobiles 🔑245(62)—Whether defendant's negligence in parking truck on city street was proximate cause of automobile collision resulting in plaintiff's injury held for jury.

In action for damages for personal injury sustained in collision between automobile in which plaintiff was riding on city street and truck parked in violation of a city ordinance, whether defendant's negligence in so parking the truck was the proximate cause of the collision and of plaintiff's injury held for jury.

14. Negligence 🔑135—Evidence held not to show negligence, imputable to plaintiff, of driver in whose automobile plaintiff was passenger when injured in collision.

In automobile passenger's action for damages for personal injury in automobile colliding with truck parked contrary to city ordinance, evidence held not to show any negligence of driver of automobile in which plaintiff was passenger imputable to plaintiff.

15. Negligence 🔑93(1)—There can be no imputable negligence in collision of vehicles except where driver is acting as agent of injured plaintiff.

There can be no imputable negligence in collision of automobiles save and except where the driver of the vehicle in which injured plaintiff was riding was acting as the agent of such injured person.

16. Automobiles 🔑245(17)—In personal injury action from automobile collision, jury could take into consideration kind of vehicle negligently parked and causing plaintiff's injury.

In personal injury action, where injury resulted from collision of automobile in which plaintiff was riding with truck parked in violation of city ordinance, jury could take into consideration the kind of vehicle and projections thereon that was so negligently parked as to cause collision and injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by M. J. Flynn and another against the Bledsoe Company. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sweet & Plank, of San Diego, for appellant.

Chester A. Smith, of San Diego, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiffs had judgment against the defendant on account of personal injuries sustained by Coranna Flynn by reason of a collision between a Ford car in which said plaintiff was riding and a parked truck belonging to the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The record shows that about noontime on June 14, 1924, Raymond Flynn, the son of the plaintiffs, was driving a Ford car along a certain street in the city of San Diego, known as and called "C" street, between Sixth and Seventh streets. The mission on which the son was driving was to get his father and bring him home to lunch. The plaintiff Coranna Flynn was riding with him as his guest, upon his invitation. C street is a public thoroughfare in the city of San Diego 52 feet wide from curb to curb, and extends in an easterly and westerly direction. The defendant at that time was conducting a business on the north side of C street between Sixth and Seventh streets, and at the time mentioned had a truck 18 feet and 4 inches in length parked on the north side of said street; the truck being parked almost at an angle of 90 degrees with the north line of C street. The truck was about 6 feet in height. The body of the truck was 19½ inches from the bed of the body to the top of its sides. On each side of the top of the body of the truck there were two loading rails or sills, 2 inches by 3 inches, extending along the full length of the truck, and from 10 to 18 inches to the rear of the rear end of the body. The projecting ends of these sills were supported by steel rods or braces. The body of the truck was painted red. The rails or loading sills were covered with two layers of green carpet. The front wheels of the truck were about 6 inches from the curb. At the time in question a building was being erected on the south side of C street, and building material and equipment extended out into the street from 10 to 12 feet north of the south curb line. At the time under consideration the street was filled with a continuous stream of traffic both easterly and westerly. Raymond Flynn, seated on the left or driver's side of the Ford car, was driving in a westerly direction. His mother, accompanying him, was seated on the right side of the car. In driving along the street above named the Ford car came in contact with the projecting sills on the parked truck, the projecting sills coming in contact with the door on the right-hand side of the Ford sedan, breaking the glass and otherwise injuring the car. The breaking glass wounded the plaintiff Coranna Flynn, and the judgment awarded her compensation therefor. At the time involved in this action, section 15 of the traffic ordinance of the city of San Diego read as follows:

> "Sec. 15. Parking at an Angle. On all streets where there are no street railway lines in operation, and on all streets or portions of streets having a width of 85 feet or more from curb line to curb line, vehicles when parked at the curb shall stand at an angle of approximately 45 degrees to the curb with the front of such vehicles towards the curb and with the right front wheel of such vehicle not farther than six inches distant from the curb line; provided, all vehicles parked under this section shall be so parked that no portion of such vehicle shall extend beyond the prolongation of the property line adjacent to and parallel with the nearest curb line of the nearest intersecting street."

There is no railroad on C street.

[1] The complaint originally was in two counts, one based upon negligence of the defendant in parking its truck contrary to the provisions of the ordinance just quoted. The second cause of action was based upon negligence in parking its truck in such a manner as to render the projecting sills dangerous to traffic, etc. To this complaint the defendant filed a general demurrer in the following language: "That said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant," and then added three specifications of ambiguity, uncertainty and unintelligibility directed against the first cause of action. The trial court overruled the demurrer as to the first cause of action and sustained the demurrer as to the second cause of action set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint. In so doing it must have overlooked the rule set forth in 21 California Jurisprudence, p. 17, § 76, supported by a long line of California cases to the effect that where a complaint sets forth two causes of action and a general demurrer is filed directed to the whole complaint, and one of the causes of action is sufficient, "a general demurrer to the complaint containing more than one count should be overruled if there is one good count stating a cause of action." However, as the plaintiff proceeded to trial upon the first cause of action, we are necessarily confined only to what is stated in the first count. Upon this appeal it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; that it shows no negligence on the part of the defendant; that the manner of parking the truck was not the proximate cause of the collision; that the driver, Raymond Flynn, was guilty of contributory negligence; that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the traffic ordinance of the city of San Diego; and also that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury. Some of these objections are presented in different forms, but need not be considered in their variations.

[2] The negligent manner of parking the truck in this case, in violation of the traffic ordinance of the city of San Diego, is the gravamen of the charge. The ordinance in question requires vehicles to be parked at an angle of approximately 45 degrees to the curb with the front of the vehicle towards the curb and not farther therefrom than 6 inches. The testimony is practically undisputed that the automobile, 18 feet 4 inches in length, was parked practically at right angles to the curb.

This is set forth as negligence per se. The defendant's violation of the ordinance is practically admitted, but it is urged in avoidance that the plaintiff is not in a position to take advantage of the violation of such ordinance, and in this particular, advances the argument that the traffic ordinance requiring vehicles to be parked at an angle of 45 degrees was enacted for the purpose of subserving the convenience of the parking public; that is, to provide a parking system which would accommodate a greater number of automobiles than if such vehicles were permitted to be parked at right angles with the curb line. In support of this contention, the appellant cites 19 California Jurisprudence, 635, § 66, which reads:

> "A violation of a statute or ordinance within the above rule is actionable negligence only as to those persons for whose benefit or protection it was enacted, and if a plaintiff does not come within that class, a violation does not supply the element of duty owing."

And, also, the case of Corbett v. Spanos, 37 Cal. App. 200, 173 P. 769, relative to a fire ordinance prohibiting certain coverings for stairways, and also the case of Toomey v. So. Pac. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 374, 24 P. 1074, 10 L. R. A. 139, relating to signals at crossings where the injury to the plaintiff did not occur at a crossing.

The parking of a vehicle 18 feet and 4 inches in length diagonally on a crowded street of a city is a complete answer in and of itself to the appellant's contention that the traveling public, using said street, was not intended to be benefited by the ordinance under consideration. We cannot exhibit parked automobiles in this opinion, but one glance at the photographs in the record of the defendant's truck with its projecting sills is a stronger argument than mere words as to what was or is included within the intent and meaning of the parking ordinance of the city of San Diego. Obstruction to a street is a serious menace to the automobile public and is as great a consideration as could be presented to a city council to induce the enactment of an ordinance which would tend to minimize the obstruction thereof by parked vehicles.

[3] We cannot shut our eyes to the common knowledge, possessed by every one, that automobile drivers on our crowded city streets must keep close watch of on-coming traffic in order to avoid collision therewith, and we cannot assume that the members of the city council of the city of San Diego were any less conscious of this necessity than other people, and therefore did not have in mind the safety of the general traveling public when enacting an ordinance which, if complied with, would give the widest possible space usable for moving vehicles. The natural inference would be that the members of the city council had all these matters in mind and intended by the ordinance to afford to the traveling public the maximum possible degree of safety. To do this, the parking of vehicles on the street would necessarily have to be so aligned as to limit to the least degree all obstructions. The cases relied upon by appellant do not limit in the least what we have here said. In the case of Toomey v. So. Pac. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 374, 24 P. 1074, 10 L. R. A. 139, it was sought by the appellant to invoke the protection of a statutory provision requiring the ringing of a bell or blowing of a whistle when a train drawn by a steam locomotive was approaching a crossing, and therefore, as the plaintiff was upon defendant's railroad track within a distance of a crossing where he would have heard the signal had it been given, he could have avoided injury. The court held, as it could not reasonably hold otherwise, that the requirement of giving the signal was for the safety of the general public using the crossing in question, and not for the benefit of trespassers upon the defendant's property who might be near enough to the crossing to hear such signal. In Corbett v. Spanos, 37 Cal. App. 200, 173 P. 769, the ordinance in question related to the manner in which stairways, etc., should be covered, had nothing to do with the general public, and was a matter of fire protection only.

[4] Appellant, in further attack upon the traffic ordinance of the city of San Diego, insists that it is void as being in conflict with section 136 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923. Section 136 of the Motor Vehicle Act, so far as pertinent here, reads as follows:

> "Stopping on Highway. No person shall park or leave standing any vehicle whether attended or unattended upon the paved or improved or main traveled portion of any public highway, outside of a business or residence district when it is practicable to park or leave such vehicle standing off of the paved or improved or main traveled portion of such highway; provided, in no event shall any person park or leave standing any vehicle whether attended or unattended upon any public highway unless a clear and unobstructed width of not less than fifteen feet upon the main traveled portion of said highway opposite such standing vehicle shall be left for the free passage of other vehicles thereon." St. 1923, p. 561.

To support this contention appellant cites the case of In re Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30, which refers to the cases of In re Mingo, 190 Cal. 769, 214 P. 850, and Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172. These cases, however, are based upon subdivision D of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191) as it read prior to the act approved May 30, 1923 (Stats. 1923, chap. 266). The subdivision to which we have referred, and upon which the cases cited were founded, expressly made the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act exclusive as to the subjects mentioned in the subdivision, to wit, regulation of speed, etc. Subdivision D of section 22 of the act, upon which the cases cited were based, by its very terms excluded city legislation upon certain subject-matters which were dealt with by the section. Section 136 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 relates to stopping upon the highway, and does not contain one word as to the manner of parking vehicles within the corporate limits of cities and towns. It does not purport to be exclusive upon that subject, but is absolutely silent thereon. It requires only a casual reading of section 136 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 to enforce the conclusion that the Legislature had in mind only the stopping of motor vehicles on highways outside of cities and towns where the improved portion of the highway would be confined to a comparatively narrow portion thereof, leaving ample space on both sides of the improved strips for stopping automobiles or other vehicles needing immediate repair or mechanical adjustments. Nor does section 145 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 in any particular limit or control the power of cities relative to the method or manner of parking automobiles upon the streets thereof. Section 145, supra, has to do with the movement of traffic, the safeguarding of crossings, and the installation of signal devices, etc. This legislation partakes of, and is akin with, the section of the Motor Vehicle Act relating to the speed at which vehicles may be propelled, and give cities authority to legislate upon that subject in so far as it pertains to crossings or intersecting portions of the streets. The Legislature not having legislated as to the method or manner of parking vehicles on the streets of cities and towns, there can be no conflict created by a city ordinance regulating the same. It follows, therefore, that we have no need of reviewing cases having to do with a conflict between a city ordinance and an act of the Legislature.

[5-8] That violation of a parking ordinance of the city of San Diego was negligence per se is amply supported by the cases of Berkovitz v. American Gravel Co., 191 Cal. 195, 215 P. 675; Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 140 P. 706. See, also, page 144 of 24 Cal. App. (140 P. 710), where this court held that driving in excess of the speed limit was negligence per se in an action involving an injury caused by an automobile when traveling at an unlawful rate of speed. To meet this situation appellant argues that the negligent parking of the defendant's automobile with the projecting loading sills was not the proximate cause of the injury, arguing that other automobiles had passed by without being impaled on the projecting sills. It is, of course, true that if the plaintiff had not been riding on C street between Sixth and Seventh streets in the city of San Diego at the time in question, she would not have been injured. The logic of the appellant, therefore, applied to this case would be that the plaintiff Coranna Flynn was guilty of a contributory act of negligence in riding on C street. The fact is that said plaintiff was where she had a right to be, and the projecting sills of the defendant's truck were where the defendant had no legal right to place them. It would scarcely relieve a defendant from negligently placing a pile of stones upon a highway by insisting that the stones were stationary, and that an automobile driver who did not see them in time to avoid an injury was solely responsible for the same on account of his contributory negligence. As stated in 19 California Jurisprudence, p. 556, § 9, there is a distinction between proximate cause in law and proximate law as reasoned out by a logician. The latter portion of the section referred to is applicable here:

> "There can be no liability for negligence which is not the cause of the injury complained of, but to impose liability it is not necessary that the negligence be the sole cause, for one is liable if his act concurs with that of another in producing the injury, and a primary cause may be the proximate cause though it operate through successive instruments."

[9-12] Here the liability of the defendant is on account of its negligence in parking the automobile. Without this negligent act the lawful act of the driver of the automobile in traversing C street would not have resulted in any injury. Thus the proximate cause of the injury was the wrong of the defendant in leaving an automobile parked in such a manner as to be dangerous to the traveling public. The only possible theory upon which contributory negligence might be charged against the automobile driver would be that he should have, as a reasonable person, seen the projecting sills in time to have avoided the collision. This, of course, was a question of fact submitted to the jury and is in no sense a question of law as urged by appellant, and the finding of the jury against the appellant is conclusive here. It requires only the mere statement of the question whether an automobile driver, watching the on-coming traffic of a busy street to avoid collision, should or should not have seen the small projecting sills, in addition to observing the large body of the truck, to show it is a question of fact for the jury, and this especially in view of the further fact that the smaller objects might readily have blended with other larger objects so as not to have been easily observed. Again, the height of the truck shows that these projecting sills were somewhat above the range of ordinary vision of the driver of the Ford car in watching the traffic moving in an opposite direction. The fact that others had passed by without injury furnishes no excuse for the defendant. The testimony shows that there was considerable obstruction on the opposite side of the street on account of the presence of building material, that there was a continuous stream of traffic moving in the opposite direction, and it required only a slight deviation of the eastbound traffic to necessitate a corresponding deviation in the line of the westbound traffic, in which direction the Ford car was traveling, and while a careful and experienced driver could very readily slightly change the course of his machine to avoid on-coming traffic, and also avoid colliding with the rear end of the truck, the projecting sills were in such a position that a collision therewith would be probable even though there was plenty of room for the passage of the Ford car without striking the rear end of the large body of the truck.

[13-15] Under all these circumstances we think it clearly presented a case where the jury was justified in concluding that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the collision and of the plaintiff's injury. Again, appellant overlooks the question that there is no imputable negligence to the plaintiff Coranna Flynn in this case. There is no evidence to show that Raymond Flynn was acting as her agent. Two cases cited by respondent we think conclusive of this question, to wit: Bryant v. Pac. R. R. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385, and Nonn v. Chicago City R. R. Co., 232 Ill. 378, 83 N. E. 624, 122 Am. St. Rep. 114. These cases hold that there can be no imputable negligence save and except where the driver is acting as the agent of the injured person. We may here state that the driver of the Ford car testified that he saw the truck, but did not observe the projecting sills. The testimony further shows that the Ford car was moving only between five and six miles per hour, and that the curved or bulging portion of the body of the Ford sedan was the portion of the car that came in contact with the projecting sills.

[16] As a final objection it is argued that the court erred in refusing the following instructions requested by the defendant, to wit:

> "The court instructs you that under the issues in this case the sole basis of the plaintiff's claim of negligence on the part of the defendant is the alleged improper parking of defendant's truck; and I further instruct you that the presence of any projecting sills or beams or sticks of wood at the rear of the body proper of the truck, or any other feature of its construction is not to be regarded by you as any element whatever of negligence in this case."

And further that—

> "Where the evidence is as consistent with a neglect of duty or ordinary care on the part of Raymond Flynn as it is with neglect of duty or ordinary care on the part of the defendant, then plaintiffs cannot recover in this action."

We do not very well see how there could be any division in the negligent parking of the truck. The whole vehicle, including running gear, body, and projecting sills, constituted the one instrumentality placed in a position dangerous to the traveling public. It may be admitted that if the truck of the defendant had no projecting sills, the negligence of the defendant would have possibly been less dangerous, but because the truck was so constructed that negligent parking made it doubly dangerous to the public is no reason why the jury should not take into consideration the kind of vehicle which was negligently parked. The truck was there as a whole. It was parked as a whole and not in separate parts or parcels, and the appellant, by the proposed instruction, was evidently trying to exclude from the jury the very reason why its negligent parking of the truck was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, and to in some manner relieve itself from its negligent conduct.

[17] As to the second instruction complained of, there is no testimony upon which to predicate such an instruction; there being nothing to show that Raymond Flynn was acting as the agent of the injured plaintiff. At the request of the defendant, however, the court did give the following instruction:

> "The court instructs you that if at the time of the collision involved in this case Raymond Flynn was operating the Ford sedan as the agent of the plaintiff M. J. Flynn, and that if you find from the evidence that the collision was proximately caused, in even the slightest degree, by the failure of the said Raymond Flynn to use due care and caution in the operation of said Ford sedan, at and immediately prior to such collision, then you must render your verdict for the defendant."

Thus the appellant had given to the jury everything to which it was entitled in the way of instructions, and more than the testimony called to our attention justified.

The appellant assigned as error the denial of the court to grant its motion for a nonsuit, and also its motion for a directed verdict. It also presents some other objections, but they are only repetitions and variations of the objections which we have considered, and therefore do not merit any separate setting forth in this opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action by Bernice N. Hammond against W. D. Hammond. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dennison, Towner & Kleber, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for divorce on the grounds of willful neglect and extreme cruelty. No evidence was introduced upon the latter cause of action. An order to show cause was issued against the defendant, but thereafter a stipulation was entered into by and between the parties, through their attorneys, that such order might be set aside, which was done. The defendant did not plead to the complaint, and after expiration of the legal time counsel for plaintiff requested the clerk to enter his default. The record before us does not disclose whether or not the clerk ever entered the default, but we take it that he did inasmuch as the case was set down for hearing as a default case and counsel in their briefs treat the case as though the default had been regularly entered. After plaintiff had put on her case, the trial judge, noticing the defendant in court, called him to the witness stand. To this plaintiff's counsel entered an objection upon the ground that such proceeding was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objection was overruled and the court proceeded to examine defendant. The examination elicited testimony tending to prove the support of plaintiff by defendant, and revealed a number of canceled checks which defendant testified were given for the support of plaintiff. Counsel for plaintiff asserted in open court that the checks were spurious, that the plaintiff had been surprised with their production, and asked time in which to respond to this evidence. This proceeding was had on Thursday, December 6, 1923, and the court remarked: "We will take a recess now till next Friday." The reporter's transcript shows the next hearing to have been on January 23, 1924. Meantime we learn from the clerk's transcript that an answer and cross-complaint was filed, but there is no record of any proceeding relieving defendant from his default. However, both sides to this appeal refer to the taking of the default and the relief therefrom as facts in the proceeding, and the court in the course of the proceedings does likewise. We shall therefore assume the default to have been entered and set aside. Much discussion was had as to whether the trial on January 23d should proceed without regard to the testimony taken before the relief from default, but it appears to have proceeded as an adjourned hearing and not de novo. The court denied the prayer of plaintiff and gave no relief under the so-called cross-complaint. This appeal is on behalf of the plaintiff, who summarizes her points as follows:

[1, 2] "(1) That plaintiff has proven her case of willful neglect by uncontradicted evidence in the default case and is entitled to a decree of divorce on that ground."

We have read the record in its entirety and find that the parties lived together up to within about 90 days before the action was brought, and that plaintiff worked and kept her earnings, although the court was not informed as to the extent thereof nor whether or not they were reasonably sufficient for her needs. Much testimony was introduced tending to show that defendant expended considerable money for plaintiff's use, and this was fortified by bank checks. This testimony was inconsistent with plaintiff's testimony. Under the circumstances, we cannot disturb the finding of the trial court. Upon the point that willful neglect is not established if while the spouses are living together (we do not here intimate that living together or separate would or would not change the rule) the wife works and earns sufficient to provide for herself and she is permitted to use it, the trial judge referred to Hansen v. Hansen, 27 Cal. App. 401, 150 P. 70. The cited case was pertinent, and had it been read, counsel for plaintiff, who doubted that the Supreme Court would support the doctrine therein announced, would have ascertained that the case was itself based upon decisions of the Supreme Court in Washburn v. Washburn, 9 Cal. 476, Rycraft v. Rycraft, 42 Cal. 445, and Locke v. Locke, 153 Cal. 56, 94 P. 244.

[3, 4] "(2) That the trial court had not the right to set aside the default of the defendant without an affidavit of merits as contemplated in section 473 C. C. P., after the default case had been tried and finished."

This statement assumes a premise not sustained by the facts, in that it states that the default case had been finished. True, counsel for plaintiff had stated that he had no more to offer, but the court, desiring information, called the defendant to the stand as a witness, as it had a perfect right to do. This examination was left unconcluded, through the request of plaintiff's counsel, and was only terminated after the resumption of the trial more than a month later. Whether or not an affidavit of merit in connection with the motion to set aside the default was ever submitted to the court we cannot say, for the record is silent and there seems to be a difference between counsel on that point. It is unimportant, however, as no affidavit is required. We think the testimony of defendant, after having been called as a witness by the court, was sufficient to justify the court in opening the default. The following quotation from Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, at p. 92, 145 P. 1020, 1022, states the situation in apt words:

> "The rules of practice applicable to divorce actions differ in many respects from those which govern other actions. In an action for divorce, upon very slight showing the court will set aside a default, if application for relief be made in due time. And although in other actions a party seeking relief from default must support his motion by an affidavit of merits, no such affidavit is required on motion to set aside the judgment in an action for divorce. The law is at all times very solicitous to preserve the integrity of the * * * family, the foundation of society. It cannot be destroyed by the mere consent, whim, or caprice of the parties to the marriage, nor can it be stipulated away in judicial proceedings. The relation can be dissolved only by consent of the state, and upon statutory grounds, presented in good faith to a court of competent jurisdiction. An action for divorce concerns not only the parties immediately interested, but also the state. The attorneys in the case represent the respective parties —the court in a sense represents the state. It is the duty of the court, representing the state, in accordance with the letter and policy of the law, to guard strictly against fraud, collusion, or imposition when the husband or wife seeks to dissolve the bonds that bind them together."

"(3) That the record in this case shows that defendant had attorneys who appeared for him herein prior to the entry of the default."

This is undisputed, and has absolutely no significance.

"(4) That the judgment denying to plaintiff a decree of divorce on the ground of willful neglect should be reversed and the trial court directed to enter its interlocutory decree granting a divorce to plaintiff and appellant."

This is the same as point No. 1, in different words.

We are constrained to remark that a proper briefing of authorities would have convinced counsel for appellant that this appeal was without merit, and would have enabled counsel for respondent to have cited pertinent authority in support of their side of the case, without putting this court to the necessity of searching for the proper doctrine and authorities in support thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

ALAMEDA CITY LAND CO. v. MORTIMER.★ (Civ. 6356.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1928.

1. Corporations 🔑90(1)—Some delinquent stockholders may be sued, while proceeding against others in ordinary manner (Civ. Code, § 349).

Civ. Code, § 349, does not preclude institution of actions against some delinquent stockholders for assessments on their shares, while at same time proceeding in ordinary manner and taking ordinary relief by selling delinquent stock as to other stockholders.

2. Constitutional law 🔑70(3)—That construction of statute as written would render it unjust is matter for Legislature, not courts (Civ. Code, § 349).

Argument that construction of Civ. Code, § 349, as permitting institution of actions against some stockholders for delinquent assessments, while proceeding at same time in ordinary manner and taking ordinary relief by selling delinquent stock as to other holders, would render it unjust should be addressed to Legislature, not courts.

3. Licenses 🔑39—Permit to issue stock for realty, to be conveyed subject to mortgage, held not void.

Permit to issue stock in exchange for certain realty, to be transferred to company subject only to taxes or assessments and mortgage not exceeding stated amount, on certain conditions, none of which were violated, held not void, so as to preclude recovery of delinquent assessment from stockholder, because realty was conveyed free of debt and thereafter mortgaged, nor because each prospective shareholder executed joint guaranty of mortgage, and deed omitted two acres used for road.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by the Alameda City Land Company, a corporation, against W. J. Mortimer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for appellant.

Stanley Pedder, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover an alleged delinquent assessment on shares of stock alleged to be owned by the defendant. The defendant appeared and answered, and a trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff. From a judgment entered on those findings the defendant has appealed and has brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions is so brief that it covers only two pages of the transcript and contains little, if anything material to the points presented by the defendant.

[1, 2] The first point made by the defendant is that under section 349 of the Civil Code the plaintiff had no right to institute actions against some of the delinquent stockholders and at the same time, as to other stockholders, to proceed in the ordinary manner and take the ordinary relief of conducting a sale of the delinquent stock. In making this contention the defendant asserts that section 349 of the Civil Code should be construed as though it were worded as follows:

> "On the day specified for declaring the stock delinquent, or at any time subsequent thereto and before the sale of the delinquent stock, the board of directors may elect to waive further proceedings under this chapter for the collection of (unpaid) delinquent assessments, or any part or portion thereof (remaining unpaid) and may elect to proceed by action to recover the amount (of the unpaid part) of the assessment and the costs and expenses already incurred, or any part or portion thereof (so remaining unpaid)." Words in parentheses are interpolations.

We are wholly unable to follow counsel in this contention. To do so would be judicial legislation. We have no such power. 23 Cal. Jur. 727. It is earnestly argued that any other construction renders the provisions of the statute unjust. We do not concede that following the statute as written its provisions are unjust. But even though they may be the argument should be addressed to the Legislature, and not to the courts. The statute has stood on the books since 1872 and this is the first time that it has been claimed that the statute is unjust. A similar statute exists with reference to every taxpayer. Pol. Code, § 3899. But whether just or unjust, the action was properly brought against the defendant.

[3] In the next place the defendant contends that he never became a stockholder. This point is based on the facts surrounding the organization of the plaintiff on April 9, 1917. A few days later it applied to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to issue stock. Later a permit was issued. That permit, among other things, contained the following passages, which we have numbered 1 and 2:

> (1) "Pursuant to its application, Alameda City Land Company is permitted to sell and issue shares of its capital stock to the present subscribers therefor, not exceeding in the aggregate to any one or all of them 9,991 shares, in exchange for all that certain real property described in said application first to be transferred to said company, subject only to any taxes or assessments that may be a lien on said property at the time of said transfer, and to any mortgage or deed of trust of said real property now existing or hereafter to be executed prior to said transfer securing the payment of a principal sum not exceeding $500,000, together with interest then accrued thereon."

(2) "This permit is issued upon the condition that all certificates for any of said shares, when issued, shall be forthwith deposited with the commissioner of corporations, or with such other depositary as may be selected by the certificate holder and approved by said commissioner, to be held as an escrow pending the further order of said commissioner, and that while the same shall be so held, shares evidenced thereby shall not be sold or offered for sale or otherwise transferred without the consent of said commissioner shall have been first obtained in writing so to do."

It will be noted that in paragraph 1 it is stated that certain real estate will be conveyed to the corporation subject to a mortgage debt of $500,000. As the organization proceeded the real estate was conveyed free and clear of any debt. Still later the plaintiff corporation executed a mortgage, which act was performed after it received its permit. The fact that the real property was conveyed to the corporation free of mortgage debts was not in violation of the permit, but in harmony therewith. The fact that thereafter the real property was mortgaged was foreign to the provisions of the permit, which neither gave nor withheld the power to mortgage.

As a part of this same point the defendant calls to our attention that, after receiving its permit and as a part of the execution of the mortgage, each prospective shareholder executed a joint guaranty under the provisions of which each stockholder guaranteed the mortgage in the proportion of stock held by such stockholder. Reverting to the terms and provisions of the permit, it will be noted that there was nothing in that transaction that was in any respect in violation of the provisions of the permit. Another subdivision of the point made by the defendant is that when the real estate was actually conveyed the deed omitted two acres which were at all times used for a road. The finding of the trial court was that the conveyance was a substantial performance of the terms of the application. There is nothing in the record to show that it was not.

Relying on the items just discussed, the defendant contends that the permit was void. He cites no provision of the statute and no decision supporting the contention. Again reverting to the terms of the permit it will be noted that all of the conditions thereof are contained in paragraph 2. It is not even contended that a single one of those conditions has been violated. The facts were otherwise in Stark v. Shemada, 187 Cal. 785, 204 P. 214. It is not in point. As the contrary does not appear, we hold the permit was not void.

The next point made by the defendant in his opening brief is expressly waived in his closing brief. We pass, therefore, to the fourth point. In that point he calls to our attention that he interposed a counterclaim in which he pleaded his contention that the permit was void, and, not being informed as to the facts of its invalidity, he had paid $1,000, which in equity and good conscience the plaintiff should return. Thereupon he asserts that the judgment of the trial court should have been in his favor on the counterclaim. As we have shown above, the permit was not void. It is unnecessary for us to further discuss the point.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 23, 1928.

Descent and distribution 🔑47(1)—Decree distributing to daughter one-half of shares of stock and proceeds held proper, where children of deceased daughter had not been provided for by the will (Civ. Code, §§ 1306–1308).

Where testatrix made no provisions for grandchildren, the children of a deceased daughter, but bequeathed to living daughter certain shares of stock, and provided that on liquidation of company daughter should have proceeds up to $5,000, held that, under Civ. Code, §§ 1306–1308, decree of distribution, providing that daughter was to receive one-half of bequeathed shares of stock and $2,500 of proceeds on liquidation, was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary J. Thomas, deceased. From a decree directing distribution, Grace C. Brown appeals, making Caroline S. Martin executrix, etc., and others parties respondent. Affirmed.

Percy E. Towne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. W. Macdonald, Harrison S. Robinson, and Harry L. Price, all of Oakland, for respondent First Presbyterian Church of Berkeley, Cal.

STURTEVANT, J. Mary J. Thomas died testate in the county of Alameda on the 7th day of June, 1926. She left her surviving a daughter, Grace C. Brown, and two grandchildren, Bernard V. Goe and Eleanor Wolf Caroe, the children of a deceased daughter. In her will she designated several devisees and legatees, but did not mention in any way her grandchildren. At the time the will was written the decedent owned 10,000 shares of the capital stock of the Five Thirty-Six Oil Company. Before her death the oil company reduced its stock and issued to decedent a certificate for 5,000 shares in lieu of her 10,000 shares. Afterwards the oil company commenced to liquidate. It had paid, before the death of the decedent one or more dividends in liquidation and the decedent had been informed that on her stock there might be further payments amounting to $5,000 or $7,000. The will was admitted to probate and in due time a decree of distribution was made. By that decree the trial court made certain provisions protecting the rights of the grandchildren. Excepting as will hereinafter be noted, no objection is made to the decree on that ground.

Among other things, the decedent inserted in her olographic will a passage as follows:

> "I give and bequeath * * * ten thousand shares of Five Thirty-Six Oil Co. * * * to my daughter Grace C. Brown stipulating that when the affairs of the Five Thirty-Six Oil Co. are finally settled and the company dissolved, all amounting above five thousand dollars coming as my part of the ten thousand shares in my name she shall give as a legacy by me to the First Presbyterian Church, Berkeley, Cal."

At the time of the entry of the decree the executor had received dividends from the oil company amounting to $1,500.

Among other things, the decree provided as follows:

> "Grace C. Brown is entitled to receive 2,500 shares of the capital stock of Five Thirty-Six Oil Company, a corporation; provided, however, that when the said Grace C. Brown, or her successors in interest have received from said corporation by way of cash dividends, whether the same be regular dividends or dividends in liquidation, the sum of $2,500 of which the sum of $750 is distributed herewith * * * leaving a balance of $1,750 to be received by her, then and in that event the title to said stock shall go to and vest in said First Presbyterian Church of Berkeley. * * *"

The daughter, Grace C. Brown, attacks the quantity $2,500, and asserts that it should be $5,000. If the trial court did not err in using the expression $2,500, the decree should be affirmed; otherwise, the decree should be modified.

The appellant cites and relies on the provisions of section 1308 of the Civil Code. Omitting irrelevant parts, that section provides:

> "When any share of the estate of a testator is assigned to * * * the issue of a child, omitted in the will, as hereinbefore mentioned, * * * so much as may be necessary must be taken from all the devisees or legatees, in proportion to the value they may respectively receive under the will, unless the obvious intention of the testator in relation to some specific devise or bequest, or other provision in the will, would thereby be defeated; in such case, such specific devise, legacy, or provision, may be exempted from such apportionment, and a different apportionment, consistent with the intention of the testator, may be adopted."

We think the section is not helpful on the question before us. It is not contended that the trial court erred in taking 50 per cent. from each devisee or legatee. But that is the subject-matter to which the section is addressed.

The Five Thirty-Six Oil Company being in process of dissolution, the meaning of the will, so far as the stock in the oil company is concerned, is not different than though it had contained two separate passages as follows:

> "To my daughter, Grace C. Brown, I give and bequeath $5,000 of the proceeds obtained from my stock in the Five Thirty-Six Oil Company.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

To the First Presbyterian Church of Berkeley I give all of the balance of the proceeds obtained from said stock."

If the will had been so written and the probate proceedings had presented the same facts as this record discloses, the legacy to Grace C. Brown would have been reduced 50 per cent.—that is, it would have been cut down to $2,500—and the legacy to the First Presbyterian Church would likewise have been cut down 50 per cent. However, if we look back at the terms of the decree, it will be seen at once that such was the effect of the decree. From the legacy of Grace C. Brown was taken 50 per cent. and from the possible legacy to the First Presbyterian Church there was taken the same percentage. The amounts so taken were given to the grandchildren. Nothing less would have complied with the statute. Civ. Code, §§ 1306, 1307, 1308. In other words, the decree might have been worded in terms of dollars and cents instead of in terms of shares of stock. Arguing in terms of shares of stock is to present a false issue. As the Five Thirty-Six Oil Company was in liquidation, the shareholders were interested in proceeds (dividends in liquidation as well as ordinary dividends), as distinguished from shares of stock. Of the proceeds Grace C. Brown was originally entitled to $5,000. When it transpired that the grandchildren had not been provided for, her possible legacy of $5,000 fell to $2,500. The other $2,500 passed to the grandchildren.

We find no error in the record.

The decree is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by W. M. Avis and F. W. Wehn, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Avis & Wehn, against J. G. Rebhan and wife, for real estate broker's commission. Judgment for the defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Allard & Mitchell, of Pomona, for appellants.

Frank T. Bates and Walter E. Byrne, both of San Bernardino, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs commenced the action to recover the sum of $1,075 alleged to have been earned as brokers' commission in the sale of defendants' ranch and certain personal property thereon. The appeal is prosecuted from a judgment in favor of defendants. On August 17, 1923, defendant J. C. Rebhan and Jennie L. Wagner met, through the instrumentality of plaintiffs, at defendants' ranch and signed the following memorandum agreement for the purchase and sale of the property:

"Pomona, Cal., Aug. 17, 1923.

"Received from Jennie L. Wagner $500.00 on account of a total purchase price $33,000, for the 30½ acre ranche of J. G. Rebhan, bounded on the N. by S. P. R. R., on the east by Ramona Ave, on the south by Chino Ave, with all stock, tools and equipment except team of horses and ¼ interest in the well, the buyer to assume a government first mortgage of $8,000.00 and a second mortgage of four thousand dollars. To pay $2,500.00 cash on or before Sept. 20, 1923, and $500.00 or more monthly thereafter with interest on the deferred payments quarterly at 7%. All parties hereto agree to the above, also to enter into escrow at the bank Monday Aug. 20th where more details of the above will be entered into. Insurance to be prorated as of Sept. 20—2—21—milk cows and a bull go.

"J. G. Rebhan.
"Jennie L. Wagner."

At the time the memorandum agreement was signed, Mrs. Wagner paid $500 on account of the purchase price. On August 20th plaintiff W. M. Avis, Mrs. Wagner, and the defendants met at the First National Bank at Ontario, and there a contract for the purchase and sale of the property was prepared by an officer of the bank and signed by Mr. and Mrs. Rebhan as sellers and Mrs. Wagner as purchaser. By the terms of this contract the purchaser was to pay $2,500 by September 20, 1923, and $500 each month thereafter until the entire purchase price should be paid. The sum of $500, which had been paid by Mrs. Wagner, was by consent of all parties turned over by Mr. Avis to Mr. Rebhan. The contract itself, which was not signed in duplicate, was left with the bank. The defendants also left with the bank a bill of sale covering the personal property and a letter instructing the bank to pay to plaintiffs the sum of $1,075 out of the payment of $2,500 which Mrs. Wagner was to make on September 20th. A few days later Mr. and Mrs. Wagner wished to make certain changes in the contract, and accordingly they met the defendants at the bank and attached a rider to the original agreement embodying the changes agreed upon. On September 19, 1923, the Wagners informed defendants that they would not for financial reasons be able to comply with the terms of the contract, and Mr. Rebhan then told the Wagners to "let it drop." On October 4, 1923, Mrs. Wagner and Mr. Rebhan met at the bank, and an officer of the bank, with the consent of Mrs. Wagner, delivered the contract to Mr. Rebhan, who retained the sum of $500, the original payment made by Mrs. Wagner.

The trial court found, among other things, that the agreement by which plaintiffs were authorized to sell defendants' property is invalid for lack of a sufficient description of the property involved, holding that plaintiffs are prevented from recovering by the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code. On one side of the listing card the defendant J. G. Rebhan signed an agreement to pay commission for the sale of "the property herein described." On the other side of the card the following appears:

"Name J. G. Rebhan, Dairy Price 40,000
Mort. 12,000
Residence, Chino R.D. No. 3 Phone 6146
Location, Bet. Riverside and Chino on Ramona

[1, 2] It was shown by the evidence that defendants resided on the property which was the subject of the contract between defendants and the Wagners. Upon being asked where the memorandum agreement was signed, defendant J. G. Rebhan answered: "Down at my ranch where I was living at the time." In their answer defendants allege that they own the property described in the complaint and that they employed plaintiffs to sell it. Plaintiff Avis testified that the words "Riverside," "Chino," and "Ramona" are the names of streets. This evidence was proper under the circumstances, although it was on motion of defendants stricken out by the court as being a voluntary statement by the witness. Defendant J. G. Rebhan was asked by counsel for plaintiffs if the property listed consisted of the ranch on which he lived at Chino and if he owned any other property in the vicinity of Chino. Objections to these questions were erroneously sustained by the trial court. In an action to recover a broker's commission, parol evidence is in some instances admissible to cure a defective description. Plaintiffs should have been allowed to prove that defendants did not own any land in the vicinity of Chino other than that on which they resided. However, we are of the opinion that, notwithstanding the court struck out the testimony, there is enough in the record to show that the description in the listing is sufficient to comply with the provisions of the statute of frauds. In Macknight v. Davitt, 37 Cal. App. 720, 174 P. 77, the court said:

> "Much greater liberality is allowed in construing and curing defective descriptions in broker's contracts than in a deed of grant of land, for, so far as the statute of frauds is concerned, the terms of the employment are the essential part, and such contracts will not be declared void merely because of a defect, uncertainty, or ambiguity, in the description of the property to be sold or exchanged when such defect can be cured by the allegation or proof of extrinsic facts and circumstances."

In Cowing v. Wofford, 68 Cal. App. 538, 229 P. 883, plaintiff sought to recover a broker's commission. The court said:

> "In Maze v. Gordon [96 Cal. 61, 30 P. 962], supra, the rule is laid down that a contract to employ a broker need not describe the lands specifically if the terms of employment can be made definite without it, and if the circumstances surrounding the transaction disclose that one owns property of similar dimensions to that insufficiently described, it is enough for a contract of this character. The office of a description is not solely to identify the land but also to furnish a means of identification."

See, also, Anderson v. Wilstrup, 34 Cal. App. 771, 168 P. 1150; Tolosano v. Will, 62 Cal. App. 622, 217 P. 803.

The terms of the employment of plaintiffs, the "essential part" of the written authorization, are clearly set forth in the case before us. It is readily disclosed from the listing that the property involved is a 40-acre dairy ranch on which is the residence of J. G. Rebhan; that the postal address of said residence is "Chino R. D. No. 3"; that the property is located on Ramona street; that there is a six-room house with garage thereon; and that the place is planted to walnuts and alfalfa. This description is sufficient to identify the property in an action of this kind, even without the testimony of plaintiff that "Riverside" and "Chino" are the names of streets.

Defendant Nellie I. Rebhan did not sign the listing card. No evidence is in the record showing that, as to her, there was a compliance with subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code.

[3] Plaintiffs contend that they produced a purchaser with whom defendants made a binding contract for the sale of the property. The trial court made the following finding:

> "* * * That said instrument of sale and purchase signed (on Aug. 20th) by and between said Jennie L. Wagner and said defendants, to wit, 'Exhibit B,' was never completely executed by the parties thereto, in that there was never any delivery therof, for the reason that the same was only deposited in the Bank of Ontario, Cal., and held for the benefit of said defendants, and for their convenience only, and that the understanding and agreement of the parties to said instrument at the time of the signing thereof, and at all times, was that the same was not to be delivered to said purchaser or be effective for any purpose until the payment of $2,500 was made to or for defendants as provided in said instrument."

This finding is supported by the evidence. Defendant J. G. Rebhan testified that "the contract was to be left there (at the bank) until the next payment was made, and then it was to be turned over to Mrs. Wagner." The witness further testified that he did not at any time direct or authorize the delivery of the contract to Mrs. Wagner. Mrs. Wagner testified that "the contract was to be left with the bank until the $2,500 was paid." The president of the bank testified: "They deposited the contract with us for collection." The document signed by the parties was never in the possession of Mrs. Wagner. The finding of the trial court that there was no delivery of the instrument, being sustained by the evidence, is binding upon the appellate court.

[4, 5] A different situation is presented by the instrument signed by defendant J. G. Rebhan and Mrs. Wagner on August 17th at the ranch. This instrument contains the elements necessary to constitute a binding contract for the sale and purchase of the property. The terms are clearly stated and the property sufficiently described. Manual delivery of the document to either party was not necessary. In Oneto v. Restano, 89 Cal. 63, 26 P. 788, it is said:

> "In regard to a lease, the mere fact that the instrument has always been in the possession of the lessor is not conclusive evidence that it has not been delivered so as to become operative. An ordinary deed is usually of value only to the grantee. The maker has no further interest in it. But an indenture of lease is a very different thing. It continues to be of fully as much interest to the landlord as to the tenant, and he has fully as much occasion for its possession. Such agreements are usually executed in duplicate. But where it is retained by either party with consent of the other, it must be considered as delivered, if both understand that it has been executed and is in operation."

The pleadings and the findings are silent on the question of the delivery of this instrument. No evidence was offered to show who retained possession of the instrument after it was signed; nor was evidence offered to show whether the parties left it with any one with the understanding that it was binding and in effect. A new trial will be necessary to enable the trial court to make findings on the question presented by the agreement of August 17th, upon the evidence to be presented and upon such amended pleadings, if any, as the parties may care to file in accordance with the views herein expressed. If it should be found that Mr. Rebhan and Mrs. Wagner signed the instrument of August 17th with the understanding that it was in effect as a binding agreement, it would follow as a matter of law that plaintiffs are entitled to their commission under the theory that they procured a purchaser who was accepted by defendant J. G. Rebhan and who entered into a valid contract with him. In such a case plaintiffs are not deprived of their right to demand their commission by the subsequent failure or inability of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the contract or by the voluntary release of the purchaser by the seller. 9 Cal. Jur. 631. A good statement of the rule applicable to the case is found in 4 Ruling Case Law, 309:

> "Once the customer procured by the broker is accepted by the employer, the latter is thereafter estopped from denying the purchaser's ability or willingness to complete the contract, inasmuch as he is not bound to accept the offer of such person without a reasonable opportunity to inquire and satisfy himself in relation to it. Consequently his acceptance should estop him from alleging anything against the claim except fraud on the part of the broker in inducing the acceptance."

This statement has been approved in a number of cases in our jurisdiction, among them being Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 147 P. 225, and Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 173 P. 1109.

The trial court made the following finding:

"That at the time the terms of the instrument marked 'Exhibit B' to the second amended complaint were agreed upon and said instrument was signed by the parties thereto, it was then agreed upon between the plaintiffs and defendants that the plaintiffs were to be paid a commission on account of the transaction only when said instrument so signed became a valid and binding and enforceable contract upon the parties thereto when and upon the first payment of $2,500 therein specified was made and not otherwise."

No evidence whatever appears in the record to sustain this finding.

In so far as the judgment of the trial court affects defendant J. G. Rebhan only, it is reversed. The judgment is affirmed as to defendant Nellie I. Rebhan.

WESTERN FOREST PRODUCTS CO. v. WOODHEAD LUMBER CO.

(Civ. 5393.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 24, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑181(12)—Seller's evidence of grade of lumber could not be disregarded because relating to place of shipment, in absence of evidence showing change en route.

Where amount of lumber loaded and shipped by seller was same as amount received by purchaser, seller's testimony as to grade of lumber could not be disregarded entirely in suit for purchase price because it related to lumber at place of loading, in absence of evidence showing lumber had been changed en route; it being assumed that lumber taken from car was same as lumber loaded.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1), 1011(1)—Finding that lumber was as represented by seller, based on conflicting evidence and supported by substantial evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Where evidence in action for purchase price of lumber on issue as to grade of lumber delivered was conflicting and there was substantial evidence to support finding that lumber was as represented by seller, such finding cannot be disturbed.

3. Sales 🔑178(4), 179(4)—Purchaser's appropriation and sale of lumber held waiver of objection of inferior quality and supported finding of acceptance.

In action to recover purchase price of lumber sold, whatever right purchaser reserved when it objected that grade of lumber was inferior to grade ordered was waived, by purchaser's deliberate appropriation and sale of lumber, and hence finding that purchaser did not refuse to accept lumber was not unsupported by evidence.

4. Principal and agent 🔑111(3)—Agency to sell personalty held not to extend to adjusting claim for damages from sale (Civ. Code, § 2323).

Extent of agent's authority as agent to sell personal property held not to extend to adjusting claim for damages that might arise out of sale made by him under Civ. Code, § 2323.

5. Principal and agent 🔑169(3)—Agent's agreement to adjust controversy, if enforceable, held not ratified by seller denying breach on being informed of purchaser's rejection of property.

Where agent selling lumber to defendant wrote seller that defendant had rejected car because of poor stock and that he had told purchaser to unload and he would get matter adjusted, but seller's only response was to deny lumber was not up to grade, seller could not be held to have ratified agent's agreement to make proper adjustment if such agreement was enenforceable.

6. Sales 🔑288(2)—Selling agent's promise to make adjustment for poor quality held no greater than purchaser's right to accept lumber and offset in damages difference between contract price and market value.

Promise to purchaser by agent making sale of lumber to make proper adjustment for inferior quality of lumber shipped was no more than right given purchaser by law to accept lumber and claim as offset in damages difference between contract price and market value of lumber.

7. Sales 🔑89—Finding that seller, not authorizing agent to make adjustment, never agreed to accept less than contract price for lumber, held not unsupported by evidence.

Where promise by agent making sale of lumber to purchaser to see that matter of poor quality of lumber would be adjusted, though implying agreement to compromise, was too indefinite to form basis of enforceable agreement, and agent had no authority to bind seller to accept less than order price, finding that seller never agreed to accept sum less than full contract price could not be held to be unsupported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by the Western Forest Products Company against the Woodhead Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Loyd Wright and Charles E. Millikan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This action was brought for the recovery of the sum of $1,889.88, less freight charges, claimed by plaintiff as owing from the defendant for a carload of casing lumber shipped by the plaintiff from its mills in Seattle, Wash., to defendant's plant in Los Angeles, Cal. The answer admitted the receipt of the carload of lumber in question, totaling 28,571 feet but claimed that the quality of the lumber was not according to agreement, and that by reason of the inferior character of a portion of the lumber, the entire carload was of the reasonable value of only $1,298.77. Judgment, however, went for the plaintiff for the full amount of its claim, and defendant appeals.

It appears that one W. P. Frambes, of the firm of Fletcher & Frambes, who designated himself as a "wholesale commission merchant," took defendant's order for a carload of casing lumber which Frambes represented would be delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff company. The order provided that the carload was not to exceed 30,000 feet, of which amount not less than 90 per cent. was to be of No. 2 casing lumber, and the balance of No. 3 casing. The price, according to the order, was $66.50 per thousand feet for No. 2 casing, and $51.50 per thousand for No. 3 casing.

Upon the arrival of the car on the siding in defendant's yard in Los Angeles, Davis Woodhead, president of the defendant company, was not satisfied with the character of the casing, concluding that over half of the lot was No. 3, or inferior, casing. He at once called Frambes on the telephone and informed him that he would not accept the lumber because of its inferior quality. Thereupon Frambes requested him to unload the car, and promised to take the matter up with the plaintiff and secure an adjustment. Relying upon this promise, the defendant unloaded the car. The first information respondent had of any dissatisfaction on the part of appellant with the casing was received when Fletcher & Frambes wrote a letter to respondent, the material portion of which reads as follows:

> "Woodhead Lumber Company has rejected the car of casing shipped him on account of the poor grade of stock and the very poor milling of it. The writer went out to see this stock this morning and I must say that this is about as poor a car of finish as I have ever seen. Knowing that there was no chance to sell this elsewhere, he told them to go ahead and unload this, and that we would see that this matter was adjusted."

Respondent immediately wrote appellant advising it of Frambes' letter informing it of appellant's rejection of the car, and expressed surprise that there was any criticism of the grade of the lumber. In the somewhat extended correspondence that followed between appellant and respondent, respondent vigorously contended that the lumber was up to grade, and appellant was just as positive that less than half was No. 2 grade. It was finally agreed that an inspector from the Pacific Lumber Inspection Bureau should make an inspection of the lumber and report. When the inspector arrived at appellant's plant, he discovered that all of the casing lumber, except 5,251 feet, had been milled, or sold by appellant. Hence his report related only to what was left, and that showed 2,318 feet was No. 2, 1,916 feet was No. 3, and 1,017 feet was not classified, but described as lumber that could be trimmed to make No. 2.

Witnesses for the plaintiff who checked and helped load the car at Seattle testified that the lumber put into the car consisted of 27,898 feet of No. 2 casing and 653 feet of No. 3 casing. Witnesses for defendant estimated the amount of No. 2 casing at from 30 to 40 per cent. of the carload, grading the balance as No. 3. These estimates were based upon a casual survey of part of the lumber, or of the lumber in the car before it was unloaded. None of defendant's witnesses claimed to have made a check of the entire lot of lumber.

In urging a reversal of the judgment, appellant makes three points: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the carload of lumber contained 27,989 feet of No. 2 clear casing and 653 feet of No. 3 clear casing. Second, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the defendant did not refuse to accept the carload of lumber, and that no agreement was entered into in relation to the holding of the lumber by the defendant. Third, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the plaintiff did not at any time agree to accept less than the full contract price for the lumber.

[1, 2] As we have already indicated, the evidence as to the amount of No. 2 casing and the amount of No. 3 casing is in marked conflict. Appellant attempts to avoid this conflict by urging that the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses on this question is of no weight because it relates to the lumber as and when placed in the car at Seattle, while appellant's testimony related to the lumber as it was unloaded in Los Angeles. There is no merit in this contention. Appellant concedes that there was a total of 28,571 feet of lumber on the car when it arrived in Los Angeles, and this is the amount which respondent claims was loaded into the car at Seattle. To make any differentiation in the weight of the testimony because of the point where the lumber was loaded and checked would necessarily assume that some one had, while the car was en route, removed a portion of the No. 2 lumber and substituted in its place the exact number of feet of No. 3 lumber. Lacking any evidence to show that the lumber had been changed en route, it must be assumed that the lumber which was taken from the car in Los Angeles was the identical lumber that was loaded into it at Seattle. The evidence upon this issue was clearly conflicting, and inasmuch as there is substantial evidence to support the finding attacked, we cannot disturb it.

[3] As to appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the defendant did not refuse to accept the carload of lumber, a complete answer is found in the undisputed fact that, notwithstanding its declaration to Frambes that it would not accept the casing, shortly after the lumber was unloaded appellant began to use and sell it, and so continued in using and selling the lumber until the time the inspector arrived, when most of the casing had been disposed of. Whatever right appellant reserved when its objection was made to Frambes was waived so far as acceptance was concerned, by the deliberate appropriation and sale of the lumber.

[4] As to the remaining points urged, appellant's argument is based largely upon the assumption that Frambes was the agent of respondent, with full authority to bind respondent to an agreement to make a proper adjustment of the disputed question of the grade of the lumber. Woodhead, president of appellant, testified that when he told Frambes over the telephone that he would not accept the lumber, Frambes "asked us to unload it and said we would agree on the undergrade of it, and agree to make a proper adjustment." Assuming, for the sake of argument, at this point, that this statement of Frambes constituted an agreement of sufficient certainty to enable it to be enforced, it does not appear to be anything more than an agreement on the part of Frambes that he or his firm, together with appellant, would make the adjustment. Frambes does not pretend to say that the respondent would make a proper adjustment, as, indeed, there is no evidence in the record that Frambes was authorized to bind respondent to any such agreement. The extent of Frambes' authority as an agent to sell personal property did not extend to adjusting a claim for damages that might arise out of a sale made by him. Section 2323, Civ. Code; 9 Cor. Jur., p. 524.

[5, 6] Nor does the record support appellant's contention that respondent ratified Frambes' agreement to "make a proper adjustment," if that statement or promise can be said to constitute an enforceable agreement. While it appears that Frambes' firm did write respondent, advising it that appellant had rejected the car of casing on account of poor stock, and that Frambes had "told them to go ahead and unload this and that we would see that this matter was adjusted," respondent's only response was to write appellant vigorously contending that the casing was up to grade, and refuting the suggestion that more than half of the carload was No. 3 casing. In fact, Frambes' promise to make a proper adjustment amounted to nothing more than the law gave to appellant, i. e., the right to accept the lumber and claim as an offset in damages the difference between the contract price and the market value of the lumber. Such was undoubtedly the interpretation put upon Frambes' language by appellant as is indicated by the special defense set up in the answer.

[7] Appellant's last point, that the finding that respondent never agreed to accept a sum less than the full contract price for the lumber is not supported by the evidence, cannot be sustained. In the first place, Frambes' so-called promise "to see that the matter would be adjusted," while implying an agreement to compromise, is too indefinite to form the basis of an enforceable agreement; and in the second place, as we have already pointed out, Frambes had no authority to bind respondent to accept less than the order price.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

GREGG v. H. & M. DRILLING CO. et al.
(Civ. 5812.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 24, 1928.

1. Improvements ⚷4(4)—Five-acre tract held not essential to convenient use and occupation of improved driveway, within materialmen's lien statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

Five-acre tract, sublet by lessee of larger tract for oil development purposes, held not essential to convenient use and occupation of improved driveway, used by sublessee with owner's consent for ingress and egress from and to highway, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, making surrounding land, required for convenient use and occupation of improved land, subject to lien for materials furnished.

2. Improvements ⚷4(4)—Use of improvement, not of adjoining land, determines extent of materialmen's lien under statute subjecting adjoining land, required for convenient use and occupation of that improved, to lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

It is not the use to which land adjoining an improvement is to be put, but rather the use for which the improvement was constructed, that determines the extent of materialmen's lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, making surrounding land required for convenient use and occupation of that improved subject to lien.

3. Improvements ⟹4(4)—Market value of improved land cannot be considered in establishing extent of materialmen's lien under statute subjecting adjoining land thereto, where required for convenient use of that improved (Code Civ. Proc. § 1185).

Market value of improved land is not an element to be considered in establishing the extent of materialmen's lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, making adjoining land, required for convenient use and occupation of that improved, subject to lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by A. H. Gregg, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Sycamore Canyon Gravel Company, against the H. & M. Drilling Company and James Lyle Hagey and wife. From a judgment establishing a mechanic's lien on a portion of defendants Hageys' land, they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

J. H. Ardis and W. S. Knott, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dorland & Sewell, of Whittier, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The action which gives rise to this appeal is one wherein the plaintiff and respondent sought to enforce as a mechanic's lien a claim for $1,425 for gravel sold and furnished to the defendant H. & M. Drilling Company, and placed upon a strip of land in preparing the same for road purposes, which was a portion of a larger tract of land owned by defendants and appellants. From a judgment establishing plaintiff's claim as a lien on a portion of the lands of appellants, this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellants were the owners of a tract of land, irregular in shape and comprising about 24 acres. The northerly boundary line of the land extended in a straight line easterly and westerly for a distance of 1,985 feet. The easterly four acres of the tract projected out, as it were, from the main body of the land like an arm. Along the easterly boundary of this portion of the tract lay the county highway. The main body of the land is exceedingly irregular in form, no two sides being parallel and no corner forming a right angle. The entire tract was leased by appellants to one Daynes for oil development purposes. He in turn subleased to the defendant H. & M. Drilling Company a portion of the land lying in the northeast corner of the tract. The record discloses that the evidence presented to the court as to what portion, or how much of the entire tract was sublet to the H. & M. Drilling Company, was far from satisfactory and in fact quite indefinite. The only evidence in the record bearing upon this point is the testimony of one of the appellants, who stated that he heard that the tenant expected to drill for oil on the northeast five acres of the tract.

The H. & M. Drilling Company, in order to haul their supplies and equipment to the ground upon which they were to drill, and have ingress and egress thereto from the county highway, obtained permission from appellants to use a strip of land lying along the northerly boundary line of the tract for driveway purposes. Plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant H. & M. Drilling Company 570 yards of gravel, which was spread upon this strip of land to be used for driveway purposes over a width of from 8 to 12 feet. To collect his bill of $1,425 for the gravel, plaintiff filed his lien against the entire 24-acre tract owned by appellants. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff establishing his lien upon the strip of land upon which the gravel was placed, which hereafter will be referred to as the "driveway," and also upon the "northeasterly five acres" of the 24-acre tract.

From this judgment appellants have taken this appeal, and urge as grounds for reversal: First, that the court committed error in establishing the plaintiff's lien upon the northeasterly five-acre tract; and, second, that the description of the ground as the "northeasterly five acres" is void for uncertainty.

[1] Section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "The land upon which any building, improvement, well, or structure is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment, is also subject to the lien," etc.

Appellants admit that respondent is entitled to a lien upon the strip of ground referred to as the driveway upon which the gravel was placed, but urge that to extend the lien to the northeasterly 5-acre piece is contrary to the provisions of section 1185, Code of Civil Procedure.

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that because the defendant H. & M. Drilling Company had the right to drill for oil on the so-called northeasterly 5-acre piece, and that the driveway in question was improved so as to provide ingress and egress to the leased land, that therefore the 5-acre piece constituted a convenient space about the improvement, or space, that was convenient for the use and occupation of the improvement.

Respondent bases his contention in the main on the case of Western Well Works v. California Farms Co., 60 Cal. App. 749, 214 P. 491. There the lien claimant had drilled a test water well on a 40-acre tract of land, which well was intended to be used in furnishing water for the irrigation of two adjoining tracts of land. The trial court restricted the lien to the actual ground upon which the well and the derrick were located, and a circular space having a diameter of 100 feet about the well as a center. Upon appeal the court sustained appellant's contention that he was entitled to a lien upon the 40-acre tract upon which the well was located for the reason that the well was put down to furnish water for this tract and, without the land to irrigate, the well would be useless. In sustaining this view, the Court of Appeal said:

> "In determining what would be a convenient space for the use and occupation of an irrigating well consideration must be given to the reasonable and beneficial use of the waters of the well, since the well is useless without the use and application of its waters upon sufficient land to render an adequate return for the cost of its creation and use."

In the case of Springer Land Ass'n v. Ford, 168 U. S. 513, 18 S. Ct. 170, 42 L. Ed. 562, the court having under consideration this same question in relation to the extent of the lien for the construction of an irrigating system, said:

> "The truth is that what area of land is subject to lien in a given case largely depends on the character of the improvement. The extent of ground proper and necessary to the enjoyment of a building, a wall, or a fence, would not be the same as that required for or appertaining to an irrigation system, but the principle of determination is the same."

In the case of Cowan v. Griffith, 108 Cal. 224, 41 P. 42, 49 Am. St. Rep. 82, an attempt was made to enforce a mechanic's lien arising out of the construction of a dwelling house upon a 40-acre tract of land upon which the house was located. The trial court established the lien on the entire tract, as contended for by the plaintiff, but the Supreme Court, in reversing the judgment, declared:

> "For the convenient use and occupation of this dwelling house it is very evident that 40 acres of land is not necessary. The statute does not contemplate anything of that kind. It means exactly what it says—a sufficient space around the dwelling for its convenient use and occupation. It does not contemplate that sufficient land around the dwelling house to support the owner while living there be set apart."

Again, in Tunis v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, 98 Cal. 285, 33 P. 63, 447, an attempt was made to foreclose a mechanic's lien arising out of the construction of a hotel and a saloon situate on 60 acres of ground upon which was also located fair grounds, a race track, racing stables, and other improvements. The trial court established the lien upon the entire tract, but the Supreme Court in reversing the judgment said:

> "In the present case it is easy to see that the race track with its training stables, grandstand, corrals, and other improvements, may be necessary to create business for the hotel, clubhouse, and saloon, for which the building in question was constructed, but it is not at all apparent that they are necessary to the convenient use and occupation of the building for the purposes indicated. Their uses are foreign to its purposes, except as they may tend to bring custom to its doors."

These, as well as other cases that might be cited, declare the principle that should control in determining the extent of ground that will in each case attach to the improvement. In the instant case, the convenient use of the driveway, which is the improved property, is not in any sense dependent upon the possession or control of the northeasterly 5-acre tract. The driveway was to serve one purpose only, and that was to drive over and furnish ingress and egress between the highway and the 5-acre tract. It appears quite as clearly that the 5-acre tract is no more essential to the convenient use and occupation of the improved driveway than was the 40-acre tract for the convenient use of the dwelling in Cowan v. Griffith, supra, or the entire 60 acres for the convenient use of hotel and saloon in Tunis v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, supra.

[2] It is not the use to which the land was to be put that adjoins the improvement that determines the extent of the lien, but rather the use for which the improvement was constructed. In the cases cited by respondent involving the construction of wells and irrigation systems, the uses for which the improvements were constructed determined the extent of the liens. In the instant case, the improvement was constructed for the use of vehicles and pedestrians. Such use, at most, would require only sufficient space at the easterly terminus of the driveway that would enable vehicles to turn around so as to again reach the highway. Clearly, 5 acres would not be necessary for such purpose.

[3] It is suggested by respondent that the driveway would have little or no market value without having attached to it the 5-acre piece of land. But market value is not an element which the statute provides the court shall take into consideration in establishing the extent of the lien; nor would reason give its approval to such a consideration.

In view of these conclusions, we are of the opinion that the evidence does not support the finding that the northeasterly 5-acre portion of the 24-acre tract is necessary and required for the convenient use and occupation of the driveway in question.

Inasmuch as our ruling upon the first point required a retrial of the case, we do not deem it necessary to discuss in detail the second point raised. The description of the ground as the "northeasterly five acres of that parcel," etc., is exceedingly vague and difficult, if not impossible, of determining. However, upon a retrial of the case it is quite likely that the difficulty presented in the description will not again arise.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded, for the purpose of determining the amount of ground at the terminus of the driveway in question that will be necessary for the convenient use of said driveway to enable vehicles using the driveway to turn about.

PEOPLE v. ADAMS. (Cr. 1612.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 17, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Misconduct of deputy district attorney during argument in consistently questioning defendant's character and stating facts within personal knowledge held reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Misconduct of deputy district attorney during argument to jury, in consistently referring to question of character of defendant and lack of evidence respecting character after court requested him to refrain therefrom, and in stating facts within his personal knowledge without having taken stand and testified relative thereto, held reversible error, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½.

2. Rape 🔑48(1)—Evidence of substance of complaint by prosecutrix to father, mother, and grandmother held admissible whether or not part of res gestæ.

In prosecution for rape, evidence as to substance of complaint made by prosecutrix to her father, mother, and grandmother, to effect that defendant had ruined her, not constituting a relating of a conversation detailing offense, held admissible whether or not it constituted a part of res gestæ.

3. Criminal law 🔑783(2)—Instruction that testimony relative to offer of settlement was admitted only for impeachment improperly limited impeachment to prosecutrix only.

In prosecution for rape wherein testimony was introduced concerning offer to settle with defendant without publicity for a certain amount, instruction relative to such evidence, being admitted for purpose of impeachment, improperly limited impeachment to prosecutrix only.

4. Rape 🔑60—Verdict finding defendant guilty of rape held sufficient under information charging forcible rape and evidence showing prosecutrix was 21 years old (Pen. Code, § 1151).

In prosecution for rape under information charging commission of rape accomplished without consent of prosecutrix and when her resistance was forcibly overcome by defendant, with uncontradicted evidence showing prosecutrix was 21 years of age, verdict finding defendant guilty of rape held sufficient without specifying kind of rape, since under Pen. Code, § 1151, general verdict of guilty imports a conviction of offense charged in indictment.

5. Jury 🔑131(4)—Action of court, after examining jurors, in requesting counsel to proceed with peremptory challenges, held not error, in absence of request for questions not covered by examination.

Action of court in examining prospective jurors and in stating that in his opinion examination for grounds upon which to base a challenge for cause was sufficient, and in asking counsel to proceed with exercise of peremptory challenges, held not error, in absence of showing that counsel desired to ask question not covered by examination or that such question would have been disallowed if counsel had made request.

6. Jury 🔑131(13)—Collective examination of jurors, without framing questions calling for physical manifestation betokening affirmation or negation, held not error under circumstances.

Questioning prospective jurors collectively, without framing question as to call for physical manifestation on part of individuals betokening affirmation or negation which might be translated by the reporter into the record, held not erroneous, in view of silence of counsel and apparent understanding and assent to the proceeding, particularly where counsel after exercising six peremptory challenges stated that they passed the jury for cause.

7. Criminal law 🔑913(1)—Denial of new trial on ground defendant was adjudged insane after sentence held not error, without positive showing defendant was of unsound mind during trial.

Denial of motion for new trial based on fact that defendant, after pronouncement of sentence, was adjudged insane and committed to hospital for treatment, with subsequent discharge as restored to sanity, held not to constitute error, in absence of positive showing that defendant was not of sound mind at time of trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

George R. Adams was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

A. S. Maloney and Duckworth & Harrison, all of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., and C. O. Thompson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of rape committed by force and violence upon the person of a woman over the age of 21 years. He was found guilty by the verdict of the jury and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts are very much in dispute, and it would serve no useful purpose to recite in detail the testimony of the prosecutrix and the appellant, and those who corroborated them. It may be fairly said that the testimony established a growing intimacy between appellant and prosecutrix, who had been in his employ for some months prior to the alleged offense, covering a period of four or five weeks and evidenced by theater and dinner engagements and rides in appellant's automobile, and declarations of love by appellant for prosecutrix. He flatly disputes her testimony relating to the alleged offense and says that what occurred while they sat in the rear seat of his Hudson brougham on Shandon Hill outside of San Bernardino city, at which time she says the offense was committed, might be described in the vernacular of youth as a "necking party." Suffice it to say that there are incidents which strongly tend to support her version of the affair, and there are also, as the evidence appears to us from the printed page, incidents indicating that his statement is the true one. Evidence was introduced by the prosecution from the father, mother, and grandmother of her complaint, after reaching home and while in the bathroom, and that her clothes were covered with blood. Testimony was also offered by the defense tending to contradict their statements. This latter testimony was produced through the medium of a Mrs. Cummings, a cousin of appellant, and another witness who was a neighbor of hers, who say that they visited the prosecutrix during the night of and not long after the alleged offense and found her calm and composed, without sign of bruise or hysteria, and who say that she said to them in effect that if they could get "a large enough settlement there would not be any publicity." Testimony was also introduced by the defense to show that the prosecutrix knew that appellant was putting $5,000 into a business corporation of which she was to be assistant secretary, and that before a complaint was sworn to an attorney employed by Mr. Halley, her father, had, in an interview with defendant's counsel, offered to settle for $5,000.

While the appellant argues that there is not sufficient evidence to support the verdict, we have concluded, after a careful and thorough study of the transcript, that this assignment does not require us to set forth in detail testimony which, but for the error to be noted hereafter, would be quite ample to uphold the verdict.

[1] Appellant also assigns as a reason why the judgment should be reversed the misconduct of a deputy district attorney during the argument to the jury, and in this we think he must be upheld. Part of the objectionable matter is as follows:

"Ah, ladies and gentlemen, is the American Legion or is a soldier of America proud of a man that would hide behind his record of service to his country to defend him for conduct like this? Why hasn't he brought some of his good American Legion friends in here to have his character for morality and standing in the community—

"Defense Counsel: Just a moment. We object to that and assign it as error, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: Counsel, I think that is without the evidence. The remark will be stricken out and the jury will disregard the comments.

"Deputy District Attorney: Ah, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, if I were on trial, and I believe if you were on trial, under the law they could not impeach—

"Defense Counsel: Object to that and assign it as error on the ground that is not the law; that the state has a right to impeach the character.

"The Court: There is no evidence either way on the question of character, and the subject should not be discussed.

"Defense Counsel: Let's get the record clear. We wish to assign it as error.

"The Court: There is nothing in the record showing that the remark was completed, but the subject of the character of the defendant is not an issue and will not be commented upon by counsel.

"Deputy District Attorney: Ladies and gentlemen, if I were on trial for an offense like this I would not stand on a war record in defense of my character. I would bring the people of my community, with whom I lived and with whom I had done business, and I would let those people set upon the witness stand and tell you as to my moral character.

"The Court: * * * The Court ruled that you were not to refer to the question of the character of the defendant, as to the evidence or lack of evidence respecting his character.

"Deputy District Attorney: I am simply talking about standing on his war record.

"The Court: Refrain from any question as to the witness testifying as to his character and not testifying as to his character. Those remarks will be stricken out and the jury are instructed to disregard them." (Italics ours.)

These statements of the deputy district attorney are clearly misconduct and although the court endeavored to undo the damage wrought by the uncalled-for and entirely illegitimate remarks, the deputy exhibited a disregard for the court and for the rules of evidence and failed to display that judicial frame of mind which should characterize those who hold the high office of deputy district attorney. He displayed great persistence in his effort to impress upon the jury the fact that defendant had failed to call character witnesses. In fact, his attitude in this regard is accentuated by the mildness (at least as it appears from the record) of the court's rebuke. Counsel would not have been dealt with harshly had the court imposed a much more severe reproof.

The next matter assigned as objectionable relates to the testimony of two witnesses for the defense who testified that Mr. Richards offered to settle the affair for $5,000, and the testimony of Richards for the prosecution that he did not. Richards also testified that the deputy district attorney was present during at least a part of the conversation, but the latter did not take the stand. The record is as follows:

> "Deputy District Attorney: She told you she waited there until Dave Richards came in, and after Dave Richards came in she went out with him and went to this office around there and got those personal effects and had the conversation on Fourth street at the corner where it enters the court, and from there she went to the county jail to see Adams, and returned to Mr. Maloney's office about noon. That was her testimony on cross-examination. Maloney knows it, Harrison knows it, and this jury knows it, and I say, ladies and gentlemen, I was in that office and I saw Mr. Richards come in. I heard him introduced to Mrs. Cummings.
> "Defense Counsel: He didn't go on the stand, and I object to his testifying.
> "The Court: The jury will be instructed that any statements of counsel are not to be received as evidence.
> "Deputy District Attorney: I am discussing the testimony. Richards said he was introduced. I was there and I know that Dave Richards told you the truth.
>
> "Defense Counsel: If the court please, just a moment. I assign it as error, that remark where counsel says he was there. He didn't go on the stand, and I assign it as error.
> "Deputy District Attorney: Dave Richards said I was there.
> "The Court: Proceed with the argument.
> "Deputy District Attorney: And I know, ladies and gentlemen, that Dave Richards, when he entered that office, did not say, 'It can be settled for $5,000,' and Maloney knows it too. I was there. Dave Richards did not say it could be settled for $5,000, and Dave Richards says he never said it at any time, and I believe Dave Richards told you the truth. That is what I believe about it.
> "Defense Counsel: Now if the court please, I object to the statement of counsel where he passed the lie to me, and assign it as error and misconduct upon the part of the district attorney, for the reason that we did not have an opportunity to cross-examine him.
> "The Court: Proceed with the argument.
> "Deputy District Attorney: I want to ask you one thing, ladies and gentlemen. If Dave Richards had been there previous to my being there and had been introduced to this woman, as the defense claim, wouldn't it have been an extraordinary thing for him to have received a second introduction on this same morning in the same office to the same woman within a very few minutes? What do you think about it? Do you mean to tell me that if some one would come to your office and you gave them an introduction to a party, and in a few minutes they came back you would give them another introduction to the same party? You would not do it, and I don't think Maloney would do it; and I did hear him, as Dave Richards said in his testimony, I did hear him introduce Mrs. Cummings to Dave Richards.
> "The Court: Counsel, I hardly think you have a right to testify. You are not under oath.
> "Defense Counsel: If the court please, I believe we should make our record clear on this. We object to the statement of the testimony by Mr. Thompson before this jury, and request at this time that the jury be instructed to disregard it, and assign it as misconduct on behalf of the district attorney.
> "The Court: Any remarks on the part of the court or on the part of counsel on either side as to what the facts are in this case are not to be received as evidence by the jury. They are to look only to the evidence produced in open court.
> "Defense Counsel: If the court please, we don't want to interrupt again, but we want it understood that our objection goes to his statements along this line that he makes as to his own testimony. We don't want to interrupt him again, and he can go on forever if he wants to.
> "The Court: I think that counsel should confine his argument to the evidence in the case." (Italics ours.)

The tenacity of the offender might have been admirable if employed in proper channels, but not where it evidences an attempt to pervert the course of justice. Not once, but four different times, he persisted in testifying: "I was in that office and I saw Mr. Richards come in. I heard him introduced to Mrs. Cummings." After being told in effect to desist, he offended: "I was there, and I know that Dave Richards told you the truth." The court failed to reprimand counsel or to instruct the jury, and for the third time counsel throws his testimony without privilege of cross-examination into the scales against the defendant: "And I know, ladies and gentlemen, that Dave Richards when he entered that office, did not say, 'It can be settled for $5,000,' and Maloney knows it too. I was there." For an unaccountable reason the trial judge again neglected to administer the stern reprimand of the court or set the minds of the jury on the right trail, and counsel again took up the burden of a voluntary unsworn witness: "And I did hear him, as Dave Richards said in his testimony, I did hear him introduce Mrs. Cummings to Dave Richards." (Italics ours.) The respondent argues that the court corrected the error in the first assignment, and the defendant waived the failure of the court to correct it in the second assignment, and, further, that the deputy district attorney had the right to argue as he did in the matter last assigned as objectionable. We think a complete answer to respondent's contention is found in the language of People v. Valliere, 127 Cal. 65, 59 P. 295, as follows:

> "In addressing the jury, among other matters, the prosecuting officer said: 'This trunk was not searched for this theft in Chico, but for another theft that I know of to my own knowledge.' This statement was in the nature of testimony. It was the assertion of a damaging fact not only not proven, but in regard to matters which had been expressly ruled out. The misconduct was much more flagrant than that in People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415 [21 P. 752]. Indeed, among the numerous cases discussed in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459 [34 P. 1078], there is none worse. In my opinion, the examination was inexcusable, and the statements contained in the closing address were an outrage upon justice, which ought not to be allowed to pass. The court promptly rebuked the attorney, but that did not cure the injury. Rebukes do not seem to have any effect upon prosecuting officers, and probably as little upon juries. The only way to secure fair trials is to set verdicts so procured aside."

And also in People v. Westcott (Cal. App.) 260 P. 901, wherein it is said:

> "The argument which we have quoted shows a persistent disregard by the district attorney of the directions and admonitions of the court, and an apparent intent so to impress the matter on the jury that they could not forget it, no matter what the instructions of the court might be. It manifests a complete departure from the spirit of fairness which should animate the conduct of that officer, and must be regarded as prejudicial misconduct. People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 P. 266; People v. Hail, 25 Cal. App. 342, 358, 143 P. 803; People v. Keko, 27 Cal. App. 351, 149 P. 1003; People v. Irby, 67 Cal. App. 520, 528, 227 P. 920; People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 381, 136 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881; People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 273, 139 P. 78; People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 196 P. 47. * * * In short, we are unable to determine whether appellant would or would not have been convicted had the testimony as to that declaration not been admitted and the argument of the district attorney thereon not been made. In such case section 4½ of article VI has no application to uphold the judgment. People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 226, 146 P. 522; People v. Irby, 67 Cal. App. 520, 530, 227 P. 920; People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567–606, 234 P. 129; People v. Black, 73 Cal. App. 13, 38, 238 P. 374."

We have examined all of the authorities cited by the attorney general, and in none of them wherein the error was held either to have been cured or unprejudicial, do we find misconduct so repeated and persisted in as in the present case. We cannot fail to agree to the statement found in People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 459, 167 P. 891, that where the misconduct "is so pronounced and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget or disregard its prejudicial effect, then manifestly a mere admonition or any number of admonitions will not suffice to right the wrong done, and the only remedy remaining is to be found in a reversal of the judgment." Here the evidence is not of such a character that this court can say that the appellant would have been convicted had it not been for the argument of the prosecutor. In fact, when he added his testimony by way of argument in so persistent a fashion he must have had a tremendous effect upon the mind of the jury. And in our consideration of whether the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution may be invoked as a protecting mantle to cover up the shortcomings of the deputy district attorney, we advert to the language of our present Chief Justice while on the District Court of Appeal, in the case of People v. De Vries, 52 Cal. App. 705, 199 P. 867, as follows:

> "The records in appealed criminal cases disclose an increasing persistence on the part of prosecuting attorneys to go beyond the line of proper conduct in their arguments. So frequently is this being done, that while we disavow any imputation of willful misconduct in the instant case, we are becoming convinced that overzealous prosecutors sometimes do it intentionally, and rely on the appellate court to save a conviction by the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. There are bounds beyond which the saving grace of that provision may not pass, and the appellate courts should not be called upon to spread it, like 'a mantle of sweet charity,' over intentional acts of misconduct. Frequent warnings in relation to the practice proving ineffectual reversals on appeal must be anticipated if right of defendants to a fair trial is to prevail."

And also in this same respect we cannot fail to observe that the deputy district attorney in his argument in the present case again passed beyond the bounds of legitimate argument, although it is not assigned as misconduct, in his implied indorsement of the righteousness of a father in taking the law into his own hands when he said:

> "Were he in that beautiful southland where his counsel says he was nurtured and reared I do not believe, gentlemen and ladies, that this would be the kind of case that would be tried in court, but true to the tradition of the southland that has protected womanhood, I assume that if this case were in the southland from whence he came that the father of this girl would be on trial to-day for his life probably, protecting the honor of his daughter." (Italics ours.)

Altogether this case is such that the constitutional provision cannot save it from a reversal.

[2] Appellant complains of the admission in evidence of the substance of the complaint made by prosecutrix to her father, mother, and grandmother. In effect it was that appellant had "ruined her" and that "he did it." According to her testimony, these statements were made within a very few minutes after the alleged offense and when for the first time she was not afraid that if she gave an alarm "he might come after" her "again." A complete answer to this claim of appellant is found in the case of People v. Lopez, 33 Cal. App. 530, 165 P. 722, wherein it is determined upon the authority of People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 P. 838, that the witness may tell what the nature or subject of her complaint was and "whether he phrased it as that she complained of a rape, or that she said, as he stated, that she had had sexual intercourse with the defendant, is not material." It is undoubtedly true that where the complaint made is not a part of the res gestæ, the witness may not relate a conversation detailing the offense said to have been committed, but here we find no such objectionable recital. It is therefore not necessary for us to determine whether the complaint was a part of the res gestæ, although made shortly after the alleged occurrence and when the witness says she was still laboring under its excitement.

[3] We have heretofore recited sufficient of the testimony concerning the offer said to have been made to settle with appellant without publicity for $5,000 to understand the nature of his objection to an instruction given by the court as follows:

> "You are instructed that the court has permitted the examination of witnesses and the introduction of evidence relative to a proposed settlement. In this connection, you are instructed that the testimony of the prosecutrix may be impeached by evidence of a conspiracy to extort money or property from the defendant, in which she is a coconspirator. She cannot be impeached upon the theory that a conspiracy existed to extort money or property from the defendant, by showing acts and conversations of others in which she had no part, unless it is proven that she authorized the same or the same was done by her authorized agent. In this same connection, you are instructed that this line of examination and the introduction of testimony in this respect was permitted for the sole purpose of impeaching the credibility of the testimony of the prosecutrix. A settlement, if there was any such settlement, or a proposal for such settlement, if there was any, is not of itself a defense to the crime charged, and even after hearing such evidence, if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed the crime charged against him, you should find the defendant guilty as charged, even though you may believe that there was a proposal to make a settlement with the defendant."

It is clear that the instruction would have been more accurate had the words O. T. Halley, Mrs. O. T. Halley, and Mrs. Emma Herndon been added thereto following the word prosecutrix, or had it been so framed as to state that the testimony was permitted for the sole purpose of impeachment, but not as constituting a defense to the crime charged. While in and of itself the failure to accurately word the instruction might not be sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a reversal, we call attention to its defect in order that on a retrial such care may be taken in its construction as to obviate an attack upon it

[4] Appellant urges that the verdict of the jury, which reads, "We the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant guilty of rape," is insufficient because it fails to specify the kind of rape, and as he says, "without making any recommendation as to the punishment in the event by their verdict they intended to find the defendant guilty of statutory rape." The information in this action charged the commission of rape and that it was accomplished without the consent of prosecutrix and "when her resistance was forcibly overcome by said defendant." The uncontradicted evidence shows that she was 21 years of age. In other words, there was but one offense of which the defendant could be found guilty. Under section 1151 of the Penal Code, which provides that a general verdict of guilty "imports a conviction of the offense charged in the indictment" and the authorities which declare that the form of the verdict is immaterial if the intention to convict of the crime charged is unmistakably expressed (People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 61, 67 P. 42; People v. Mercado, 59 Cal. App. 74, 209 P. 1035; and People v. West, 73 Cal. 345, 14 P. 848), it is apparent that the verdict is sufficient in form and substance.

[5, 6] Appellant also assails the judgment because the judge of the trial court examined the prospective jurors and at the conclusion of his examination stated that in his opinion the examination for grounds upon which to base a challenge for cause was sufficient and asked counsel to proceed with the exercise of their peremptory challenges. Nowhere does it appear that counsel desired to ask a question not covered by the examination theretofore conducted, and nowhere does it appear that such a question would have been disallowed if counsel had made the request. Under these circumstances and on the authority of People v. Edenburg (Cal. App.) 263 P. 857, we cannot say that error was committed by the court in this regard. Counsel also complains, and the transcript discloses, that the questions by the trial judge were propounded to the prospective jurors collectively and not individually. The record also discloses that the questions were not so framed as to call for some physical manifestation upon the part of the individuals betokening affirmation or negation which might be translated by the reporter into the record. We have had occasion heretofore to doubt the wisdom of collectively examining prospective jurors (People v. Riordan, 79 Cal. App. 488, 250 P. 190; People v. Edenburg, supra), and especially is this true where the record is not so kept that we may be able, or counsel might have been able at the time of the trial, to ascertain the minds of those whom the court was questioning. We cannot say, however, from the state of the record, particularly in view of the silence of counsel and their apparent understanding and assent to the proceeding, that the defendant was denied a trial by a fair and impartial jury. So far as is manifest from the record, each and all of the twelve jurors were entirely satisfactory to the defendant. Indeed, counsel after exercising six peremptory challenges stated, "We pass the jury for cause." With these facts before us it does not appear that defendant was deprived of any substantial right in the questioning of prospective jurors. People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920, and People v. Craig, 196 Cal. 19, 235 P. 721.

[7] The last ground assigned by appellant relates solely to the motion for a new trial based upon the fact, as was made to appear by affidavits, that some time after the pronouncement of sentence the appellant was adjudged insane and committed to the Southern California State Hospital for treatment, whence he was subsequently discharged as restored to sanity. Coupled with these averments, the affidavits set forth that the appellant conducted himself strangely during the course of the trial. It might possibly be that if the testimony made it positively clear to us that the defendant was not of sound mind at the time of the trial, we should be authorized to interfere with the sound discretion lodged in the trial court. It does not, however, make such impression upon us, and the fact that the trial judge had ample opportunity to observe his actions and demeanor during the course of the trial makes patent the reason why the discretion is lodged there rather than in the appellate tribunal.

Judgment and order reversed.

CLAPP et ux. v. LORRAINE et al.★

CLAPP et al. v. CLAPP et al.

(Civ. 3524.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑262(1)—Where property was conveyed to wife by instrument in writing, presumption is title vested in wife as her separate property (Civ. Code, § 164).

Where property was conveyed to wife by an instrument in writing, presumption is that title was thereby vested in her as her separate property, under Civ. Code, § 164.

2. Trusts 🔑44(2)—In action to quiet title, evidence supported finding that plaintiff bought property from mother outright, and did not hold property in trust.

In action to quiet title, evidence held to support finding that transaction between plaintiff and mother was an absolute sale to plaintiff, and not a transaction whereby plaintiff was to hold title to property in trust for benefit of himself and brothers, share and share alike.

3. Quieting title 🔑46—Whether plaintiff obtained deed from mother and brothers' consent to sale by mother through fraud were immaterial in suit between plaintiff and brothers while mother was still living (Civ. Code, § 700).

Whether plaintiff had obtained deed from mother, who was living at time of trial, through fraud and misrepresentation, and whether plaintiff's brothers were induced by fraud and misrepresentations to consent to sale of property by mother to plaintiff, as immaterial in suit between plaintiff and brothers to quiet title, since plaintiff's brothers, having mere expectancy as heirs, had no interest in subject-matter of suit, under Civ. Code, § 700, and their consent to sale by mother was unnecessary to its consummation and added nothing to its validity.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Where evidence supported finding that defendants had no interest in property involved, they cannot attack other findings.

Where evidence in action to quiet title supported finding that defendants had no interest in property involved in suit, they were not in position to attack the other findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Ralph B. Clapp and wife against Grant M. Lorraine, Robert M. Clapp, Randall C. Clapp, and others, in which Robert M. Clapp and Randall C. Clapp filed cross-complaint. From the judgment, cross-complainants appeal. Affirmed.

James B. Ogg, of Alhambra, and Zach Lamar Cobb and Earl A. Littlejohns, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Walter M. Campbell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs were given judgment, in accordance with the prayer of their complaint, quieting their title to the real property described in the complaint, subject only to a lien in favor of defendant Cynthia B. Clapp for support and maintenance during the remainder of her life and a mortgage lien in her favor securing the payment to her of the plaintiff's promissory note. Robert M. Clapp and Randall C. Clapp, defendants and cross-complainants, have appealed from the judgment. The plaintiff Ralph B. Clapp, the cross-defendants Archibald W. Clapp and Albert A. Clapp, and the appellants are the sons of Cynthia B. Clapp, who is a widow. The property in suit was purchased in the year 1897 with community funds of Cynthia B. Clapp and her husband, the father of the other parties named, and was conveyed to Mrs. Clapp, in whom the record title thereafter stood until February 23, 1923, at which time she conveyed the same to plaintiff Ralph B. Clapp. The husband died in the year 1911. In their answer the appellants alleged that "Cynthia B. Clapp acquired and held title in said real property in trust for her five sons, * * * under the agreement with their deceased father that the title thereto would vest in said sons, share and share alike, upon her death," and that the conveyance from Cynthia B. Clapp to Ralph B. Clapp "was made with the verbal understanding and agreement between them" that the plaintiff "would hold the title thereto in trust for the benefit of said five sons, share and share alike." In their cross-complaint, appellants alleged that the property in suit was the community property of their parents at the time of their father's death, and that they each succeeded to and now own an undivided one-fifteenth thereof, and that their mother's said conveyance of February 23,

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

1923, "was made upon the express understanding that the title to said property was being vested in Ralph B. Clapp, in trust for her support" and for her said five sons, "and that said Ralph B. Clapp would manage and control the same, and distribute the issues and profits thereof to said beneficiaries, and upon a sale of all or any part would distribute the proceeds to the beneficiaries." Appellants also alleged that Cynthia B. Clapp was induced to make the conveyance of February 23, 1923, and they to consent thereto, by certain false representations made by plaintiff Ralph B. Clapp.

In no sense did the appellants represent their mother in the action. She was duly served with summons, but failed to answer the complaint, and her default was entered. She appeared as a witness for the plaintiffs, and testified in their behalf.

[1] The property having been conveyed to her by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title was thereby vested in her as her separate property. Civ. Code, § 164. There is no evidence that she ever held the property in trust for her sons or that it was at any time the community property of herself and husband, and the court found against appellants on those issues. Unless, therefore, the conveyance of the property by Cynthia B. Clapp to Ralph was intended to create a trust, as alleged by the appellants, they have no interest therein or in the outcome of this action. The deed of conveyance is absolute in form. It is conceded, however, that the deed and two other writings are to be construed together as a single instrument. One of these writings is in the form of identical letters from Ralph to his four brothers. The other is in the form of an agreement, to which is attached a copy of the letters. Omitting dates and immaterial parts, they are as follows:

> "In accordance with my letter of February 14, 1923, to my brothers, as per copy attached hereto, regarding the purchase of Mother's place by me, I hereby agree to pay $21,000 for the place, under the terms stipulated, and to carry out the proposals in that letter. In the event of my death while Mother is still alive, Florence will carry out the provisions of this agreement. In accordance we have signed our names as follows: Ralph B. Clapp.
> "Florence H. Clapp."

> "I have a proposition to make which I believe will solve one of our problems. * * * The plan, therefore, that I believe will solve the prolem is for us (plaintiffs) to build on Mother's place and move there and be responsible for her care. We can do this by selling our own place which is now on the market. If we carry this out, we should want to buy Mother's place outright, pay off the mortgage, fix up her house for her, and put the grounds into presentable condition and keep the place as it should be. As to the price, * * * we will be willing to take it at $21,000. * * * providing you will all agree as to terms and conditions. As a first payment, will apply the $1,100 mentioned below which I have advanced. We will agree to build on the place just as soon as possible and to pay off or assume the mortgage, and to fix up Mother's house as soon as possible and to make it comfortable for her, and to immediately assume complete responsibility for her care and maintain her on the place as long as she is with us. It is to be understood that we would not pay interest, as such, to Mother but that our care of her would offset this as long as she lives and for a period of 5 years thereafter. At her passing on I would become indebted to her estate for $20,000, for which I would give a note secured by a mortgage on the place or other acceptable security, this note to bear interest in accordance with statement above, and to be for such time as would be mutually agreeable. It would, of course, be understood that we would not sell the place while Mother is alive and that she would have a home there for that time or as long as she desired. * * * We have talked this over very fully with Mother, and she has a copy of this letter to which she agrees, and she is anxious to have the plan carried out, but I don't want to go ahead with it unless it meets with the approval of all you."

[2] It is very clear that the foregoing writings do not create or prove a trust in favor of the appellants. It appears therefrom unequivocally that Ralph was "to buy Mother's place outright," and to pay "her estate" the unpaid part of the purchase price. Since the mother is still living, the appellants have no interest in "her estate," and may never succeed to any part thereof, because it is within her power to dispose of all her property, by deed or will, to others. The mere "expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind." Civ. Code, § 700. Ralph testified that the transaction was "an outright sale of the property" to him. Cynthia B. Clapp, who was of the age of 81 years at the time of the trial, testified that she saw the letter referred to before Ralph sent it to her other sons, that she made the deed "according to the terms of that letter," and that she was "actually conveying the ownership to the property to Ralph" when she made the deed. As might well be expected from one of her age, some of Mrs. Clapp's testimony, given on cross-examination, is somewhat inconsistent with parts of her foregoing statements, but her testimony as a whole tends strongly to show that the transaction with Ralph was what the written evidence thereof indicates. Appellants rely upon the following statement contained in a letter from the mother to Robert, under date of February 17, 1923, as showing her intention in making the conveyance to Ralph:

> "I am writing to you all regarding a letter that will come to you from Ralph—and which I fully approve of—and I hope you and the other boys will look at it as I do—you will none of you lose a dollar by means of it—the place will—by being put in order and kept so—rise in value—and it is not to go out of the family—only as you all agree later on—and you will share according to my will—just the same—and very much more to your advantage."

While some of the statements in the letter, considered alone, may tend to show that the mother intended to retain ownership of the property, there is nothing therein to show that she intended to create a trust in favor of her sons. The statement that Randall "will share according to my will" tends to show that it was not the mother's intention to give him any interest in the property during her lifetime, and her declaration that she fully approved of Ralph's letter, which contained the statement that he desired "to buy Mother's place outright," strongly tends to show that she understood the transaction to be what it purports to be on the face of the writings evidencing it. Transactions which have been reduced to writing are not to be lightly overthrown, and in this case the evidence abundantly supports the findings of the court to the effect that the transaction in question was an absolute sale, and that the appellants have no interest in the property or in the moneys due from Ralph to the mother on account of the selling price thereof.

Appellants offered in evidence a letter written by the mother in 1914 and her will executed in 1917. The court sustained the plaintiff's objections thereto. The parts of the letter relied on by appellants are as follows:

> "Some time ago I wrote a letter to be opened by you after my death, in which I tried to make everything plain as to what I wanted done about the property. * * * Ralph has the papers, and I leave it for you all to settle among yourselves—whatever is left after everything is square I wish divided equally among you. * * * I want you each to have the same."

The will contains the following:

> "I give, devise and bequeath all of my estate of which I shall die possessed of every kind and character unto my sons (naming all of them) share and share alike."

There is nothing in either writing inconsistent with the mother's action in selling the property to Ralph. At the trial she testified that it always had been and then was her desire that all of her sons share equally in whatever property she might own at the time of her death.

[3, 4] Appellants attempted to prove that Ralph obtained the deed from the mother through fraud and misrepresentation, and that the agreed price of the property was more than that stated by him. However important these issues would have been if tendered by the mother, they were wholly immaterial as between Ralph and the appellants; they not having shown that they had any interest in the subject-matter of the suit. It is immaterial in this action whether appellants were induced by fraud or misrepresentations to consent to the sale of the property by the mother to Ralph, because their consent to the sale was unnecessary to its consummation and added nothing to its validity. Objection is made to some of the findings. The findings are sufficient, and fully supported by the evidence, to the effect that the appellants have no interest in the property involved in the suit. Having no interest therein, they are not in a position to attack the other findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

On his way back from such deviation, but nevertheless at a point at least four blocks outside of any direct or reasonable course from the place the suitcase was obtained, to the place of its intended destination, the accident occurred for which petitioner claimed compensation.

Much has been written and great learning displayed by various courts and text-writers concerning the legal questions affecting a situation such as is presented in the instant matter. So exhaustively has the subject been treated it is thought that nothing that this court might contribute would either add to the net result of such discussions, or advance or retard the development of the legal principles involved. While authorities from other jurisdictions are not entirely harmonious one with the other, so far as this state is concerned, the correctness of the ruling by the respondent commission is attested by the following authorities: Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com'n, 182 Cal. 612, 187 P. 42; California C. I. Exchange v. Industrial Acc. Com'n, 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257; Balboa Amusement P. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com'n, 35 Cal. SCOTT et ux. v. LOS ANGELES MOUNTAIN PARK CO. (Civ. 3533.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1078(1)—Sufficiency of identification of property in agreement to convey or complaint in action for breach thereof, need not be considered, where not argued on appeal (Civ. Code, § 1624).

Whether memorandum of agreement to convey land and allegations of complaint in action for breach thereof are sufficient to comply with Civ. Code, § 1624, need not be considered, where want of identification of property, either in agreement or complaint, is not argued on appeal.

2. Corporations 🔑426(6)—Agent's signing of corporation's name to memorandum of agreement to convey land held not ratified, where conditions and restrictions referred to in directors' resolution authorizing sale were not agreed on.

Where conditions and restrictions, referred to in corporation directors' resolution authorizing president and secretary to consummate sale of land, subject to such conditions and restrictions as they deem necessary, were not agreed upon, there was no unconditional ratification of agent's act in signing corporation's name to memorandum of agreement relied on by plaintiffs in action for breach of contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑17—Buyers, not agreeing to conditions to be inserted in corporation's deed according to directors' resolution authorizing sale, were not entitled to specific performance, and hence could not recover damages for breach of contract.

As corporate seller would have to show, in suit against buyers for specific performance, that conditions and restrictions, to be inserted in instrument conveying land according to directors' resolution authorizing certain officers to consummate sale, were agreed to, buyers, not having agreed thereto, were not entitled to specific performance, and hence could not maintain action for damages for breach of contract.

4. Evidence 🔑317(14)—Plaintiff's testimony as to third person's identification of landowner and his agent held inadmissible as hearsay in action against corporation for breach of contract signed by such agent in its name.

In action for breach of contract to convey land, plaintiff's testimony as to another's statement that certain person owned land and that one signing contract in name of defendant corporation would be man to see, because he had charge of such owner's business, held properly stricken as hearsay.

5. Corporations 🔑432(6)—Plaintiff's testimony as to representations of person signing contract as defendant corporation's agent held inadmissible to show his authority.

In action for breach of contract to convey land, plaintiff's testimony as to representations made by person signing contract as defendant corporation's agent with reference to his connection with defendant and property conveyed held inadmissible to show his authority to act as defendant's agent.

6. Corporations 🔑432(12)—That one signing contract in corporation's name was director does not establish his agency.

That person signing contract to convey land in name of corporation sued for breach thereof was a director of such corporation does not establish his agency.

7. Corporations 🔑298(1)—Power to manage corporation's affairs is vested in directors as board, not as individuals (Civ. Code, § 305).

The power and authority to manage the affairs of a corporation is vested in the board of directors as a board, not as individual members, under Civ. Code, § 305.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⚿17—Directors' resolution, authorizing corporation officers to sell land subject to conditions and restrictions deemed necessary, did not constitute acceptance of offer (Civ. Code, § 1585).

Resolution of board of directors that corporation accept offer for land owned by it, and that president and secretary be authorized to consummate sale, fixing such conditions and restrictions as they deem necessary, did not constitute an acceptance, under Civ. Code, § 1585; not being absolute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by B. W. Scott and wife against the Los Angeles Mountain Park Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and Irving H. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiffs began this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $96,000 as damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiffs by reason of the failure of the defendant to convey a certain tract of land in the county of Los Angeles, embracing about 2½ acres, being a part of a larger tract of land alleged to belong to the defendant, situate northwest of Santa Monica, in said county. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted and judgment thereon entered. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The complaint alleges that during the times mentioned therein the defendant was the owner in fee of a large tract of land consisting of several hundred acres in the county of Los Angeles, and that on or about the 7th day of January, 1925, the defendant entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs agreed to buy from the defendant, a part of said tract of land, consisting of 2½ acres, more or less, for the sum of $12,000 per acre, one-quarter in cash and the balance due in one, two, and three year equal payments; the unpaid portion of the purchase price bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The complaint then sets forth at length a purported agreement between the defendant and the plaintiffs concerning the execution of escrow papers, the placing of the escrow papers with the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles, and then alleges that the agreement for the sale of the premises referred to was executed and delivered on the 17th day of January, 1925, setting forth the memorandum of agreement, which is as follows:

"Receipt for Deposit on Sale of Property.

"Los Angeles, California, January 17, 1925.

"Received of B. W. Scott one thousand dollars ($1,000.00), as deposit out of escrow on purchase of approximately two and one-half (2½) acres of land fronting on state highway and Marquez road northwest of Santa Monica, as per sketch showing approximate east and west lines. North line extends to the south side of Marquez road, and south line of property extends to state highway fronting Pacific Ocean.

"It is understood and agreed that the Beverly boulevard highway is proposed to go through the south side of this property, and, if the Beverly boulevard is constructed as proposed and shown in sketch, the purchaser of this tract is to contribute this right of way without cost to the city or county.

"Price and terms: Twelve thousand dollars ($12,000.00) per acre for the approximate acreage of two and one-half (2½) acres.

"Option payments: Cash, or one-fourth cash and the balance one, two, and three years, equal payment, at seven per cent. (7%) interest from date.

"Los Angeles Mountain Park Company,
"By H. A. Lloyd, Agent.
"B. W. Scott.
"L. Vivia Scott."

[1, 2] It is further set forth in the complaint that the plaintiffs offered to perform all their part of the agreement in accordance with the terms of the memorandum thereof just set forth herein; that the defendant has refused and neglected to make conveyance of the said 2½ acres of land; that the plaintiffs have been damaged by reason thereof in the sum of $96,000. To this complaint the defendant interposed a general demurrer that it did not state a cause of action, and also that the complaint was ambiguous and uncertain in certain particulars. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered denying that the corporation executed the memorandum of agreement set forth in plaintiffs' complaint. While it would appear that neither the memorandum of agreement with the sketch attached, nor the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to comply with the provisions of section 1624 of the Civil Code, under the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases of Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 105, 69 P. 853, Eaton v. Wilkins, 163 Cal. 742, 127 P. 71, Proulx v. Sacramento Land Co., 19 Cal. App. 529, 126 P. 509, and other cases having to do with the same questions, but, as the want of identification of the property, either in the agreement or in the complaint is not argued upon this appeal, we pass this question by. The memorandum of agreement upon which the plaintiffs rely was signed in the following manner: "Los Angeles Mountain Park Company, by H. A. Lloyd, Agent"—and the defense was in the court below, and is here, that there is no showing of agency on the part of H. A. Lloyd, and no showing of any ratification by and on the part of the defendant of any action taken in relation to said 2½ acres of land by H. A. Lloyd, or of anything done by him.

A careful reading of the transcript fails to disclose any testimony showing any act on the part of the corporation appointing H. A. Lloyd its agent or authorizing him to enter into any contracts or agreements by or on behalf of the defendant corporation. The minutes of the corporation of a special meeting of its board of directors, under date of January 26, 1925, contains the following:

> "Resolved that the Los Angeles Mountain Park Company accept the offer of $12,000.00 an acre for approximately 2½ acres of land situated between Marquez avenue and the Malibu state highway in parcel 7, subject, however, to the location of Beverly boulevard at that point.
> "Resolved, further, that the president and secretary be and are hereby authorized to consummate the sale fixing such conditions and restrictions as they deem necessary, and to execute in the name of this corporation the necessary papers.
> "There being no further business, the meeting was adjourned at 2:30 p. m.
> "Respectfully submitted,
> "Claude A. Wayne, Secretary."

[3] The record shows that the $1,000 mentioned in the memorandum of agreement was delivered by the plaintiffs to H. A. Lloyd in the form of two checks, one for $100 and one for $900; that these checks were never delivered by him to the corporation, but were held by him for a considerable period of time, and, after the date of the institution of this suit, redelivered to the plaintiffs. The record fails to show, in such a form as can be considered herein, the conditions and restrictions which were, or may have been considered necessary by the president and secretary of the corporation, the conditions and restrictions appearing in the record only by way of statement of counsel to the effect that they were intended to prohibit boring for oil and other like explorations upon the premises referred to, and that an offer was made by the defendant to convey by a deed containing such conditions and restrictions, and acceptance thereof refused by the appellants. The only point which we can consider here is the fact that, whatever the conditions and restrictions may have been that were to be written into the instrument of conveyance do not appear to have been agreed upon between the parties or accepted by the plaintiffs herein, and to that extent the record fails to show that there ever was a meeting of the minds of the respective parties referred to relative to the sale and purchase of the 2½ acres of land. In other words, the alleged ratification was subject to conditions and restrictions which do not appear to have been agreed upon, and to that extent there never was an unconditional ratification by the defendant of the act of H. A. Lloyd in signing the name of the corporation to the memorandum of agreement relied upon by the plaintiffs. To show that this is true we have only to reverse the situation. In a suit for specific performance by the corporation against the plaintiffs, it would have been necessary to show that the conditions and restrictions to be contained or inserted in the instrument of conveyance had been agreed to by the plaintiffs. Thus, if an enforcement could not be had by the defendant against the plaintiffs, it results that a situation is presented where specific performance or enforcement could not be had by the plaintiffs against the defendant. If this is true, no action for damages can be maintained.

[4, 5] In so far as the complaint contains allegations relative to an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant acting through H. A. Lloyd for the signing of escrow papers, it is sufficient to state that there is not one word of testimony in the record showing that H. A. Lloyd was ever authorized to act by and on behalf of the defendant in negotiating or consummating any such agreements, or was at any time the authorized agent of the defendant. In this particular we will consider the appellants' contention that the court erred in excluding certain testimony. While the plaintiff Mrs. Scott was on the witness stand, she was asked as to a conversation had with a Mr. Myers relative to land situate along the ocean shore. The question asked of the witness was: "Did he tell you who he thought owned it? A. He said that Mr. Bell owned it. Mr. Lloyd would be the man that he would have to see because he had charge of Mr. Bell's business; that he was his confidential man." Upon motion of counsel for the defendant, this answer was stricken out as hearsay. The testimony called for was so clearly hearsay that no citation of authorities is necessary to show the correctness of the ruling of the trial court. While the same witness was on the stand, she was asked the following question, intended to elicit a statement of representations made to her by Mr. H. A. Lloyd: "Q. What representations did he make to you with reference to his connection with the defendant in this case?" To which question the respondent objected that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that the statements made by an alleged agent are not admissible for the purpose of proving his authority. Mrs. Scott was further asked the following question: "Q. What representations (referring to Mr. Lloyd) did he make to you, if any, about the property described in your complaint?" To which the court also sustained the defendant's objection. The court further sustained an objection to a question asked Mrs. Scott as to whether the defendant Lloyd was a director of the defendant company, but afterwards the secretary of the defendant company was permitted to testify that H. A. Lloyd was a director of the company as shown by the records thereof.

The court also sustained an objection to the admission in evidence of a by-law of the corporation which reads as follows:

> "The directors shall have power to conduct, manage, and control all affairs and business of the corporation and to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with these by-laws for the guidance of the affairs and management of the affairs of the corporation."

In support of their contention that the testimony referred to and sought to be elicited was admissible to prove the agency of H. A. Lloyd, the appellants cite the rule stated in 2 Corpus Juris, 933, which reads as follows:

> "The rule that the declarations of an agent are as against his principal inadmissible to prove the fact of his agency does not apply to his testimony as a witness on the trial in which such fact is in issue; and consequently the testimony of the agent, unless he is disqualified for some other reason, is competent to establish the fact of his agency, and the existence of facts from which the agency may be inferred,"—citing, also, Raftis v. McCloud River Lumber Co., 35 Cal. App. 397, 170 P. 176.
